Forbes argued for the plaintiff.—By sect. 41 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), "It shall be lawful for any local board, by agreement with the trustees of any turnpike road, or with any corporation or person liable to repair any street or road or any part thereof, . . . to take upon themselves the maintenance, repair, and cleansing, or watering of any such street, or any part thereof . . . or of any part of the said roads within their district, . . . on such terms as the local board and the trustees or corporation or person or surveyor aforesaid may agree upon between themselves." By sect. 4, "This Act shall be construed together with and be deemed to form part of the Public Health Act 1848, . . . and the provisions of each of the said Acts shall, so far as may be consistent with the provisions of this Act, respectively, be applicable to all matters and things arising under the other Act." And by sect. 144 of the said Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) it is enacted that "full compensation shall be made out of the general or special district rates to be levied under this Act to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act; and in case of dispute as to amount the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided by this Act." The defendants, under the 41st section of the Act of 1858, took upon themselves the maintenance and repair of part of this road; and in raising the level of the footway, which may be included in the repair which they undertook, the defendants caused damage to the plaintiff by reason of the exercise of the powers of an Act which is to form part of the Act of 1848. Express power is given to local boards, by sect. 68 of the Act of 1848, to cause the soil of any street, being or which at any time becomes a highway to be raised, lowered, or altered as they may think fit; whether houses form a street or not was decided by Reg. v. Fullford (33 L. J. 122, M. C.), to be a question of fact, and the arbitrator has here found that this part of Whalley-road is a street.

Crompton for the defendants.—The plaintiff's proper remedy for this damage would have been by action, to which the defendants might have pleaded any justification which they could have derived from the authority of the turnpike trustees which was transferred to them:

Mill v. Hawker, L. Rep. 10 Ex. 92.

There is no provision by which damage can be recovered by arbitration for this injury. Sect. 68 of the Act of 1848 does not apply to longitudinal sections of a street, nor does it apply to turnpikes. And sect. 41 of the Act of 1858, which applies to turnpikes, gives no power to raise the level of any part of them. If it had been intended to give a board the same powers with respect to turnpikes as they had with respect to streets by sect. 68 of the Act of 1848, it would have been easy to state as much in sect. 41 of the Act of 1858. The case of Southampton and Itchin Bridge Company v. Local Board of Southampton (8 H. & B. 801) is an authority that an action is the proper remedy for a wrong which is not the subject of compensation under sect. 144 of the Public Health Act 1848.

Forbes in reply.

(Cockburn, C.J.)—I consider this a shabby defence, but our judgment can only be for the defendants. I seriously doubt whether the 41st section of the Act of 1858 has any application to repairs of a longitudinal section of a road; without that, the defendants had no power to make the agreement contained in their resolution of Feb. 1865. A local board may by that section take upon themselves the maintenance or repair of any street or road or any part thereof; but the words themselves and the subsequent provisions concerning mortgages of the tolls contain nothing pointing to a division of a length of road for the purposes of repair, so that the responsibility for a transverse section should be on more than one body. I base my judgment, however, chiefly on the other ground of objection by the defendants, viz., that this is not damage under sect. 144 of the Act of 1848, by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of that Act. The part of the Act which deals with the management of streets begins at the 68th section, which enacts "That all present and future streets being, or which at any time become highways within any district, and the pavements, stones, and other materials thereof, and all buildings, implements, and other things provided for the purposes thereof by any surveyor of highways, or by any person serving the office of surveyor of highways, shall vest and be under the management and control of the said local board of health. And the said local board of health shall from time to time cause all such streets to be levelled, paved, flagged, channelled, altered and repaired, as and when occasion may require. And they may from time to time cause the soil of any such street to be raised, lowered, or altered as they may think fit, and place and keep in repair fences and posts for the safety of foot passengers." This section refers only to streets which are highways, and not at all to turnpike roads; there is no section of that Act which treats at all of such roads. By the Act of 1858, however, for the first time a board may agree with turnpike trustees to repair or maintain turnpike roads; the powers and liabilities which the board may undertake are only those of the trustees who transfer them; and even if the words "maintenance and repair" include alteration of level, there is no provision for compensation by arbitration for any damage caused by the board in dealing with such turnpikes. The only remedy which the plaintiff could have had against the turnpike trustees for the damage he has suffered, before the defendants undertook the repair of this road, must have been, if any remedy existed, by action. It is not necessary to decide whether there was such a remedy; clearly there was none by arbitration, nor can there be any by that means against the defendants now. I much regret that the plaintiff has been put to this useless expense, but I think he cannot possibly recover the compensation to which he is thus found to be entitled.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion on both points, but my view of the first objection is much stronger than that of my Lord. It might be convenient to divide a road transversely into parts for the purposes of repair, but I cannot think that the 41st section of the Act of 1858 was ever intended to distribute longitudinal sections of a road between different repairing bodies. Such a proceeding would introduce a double jurisdiction in the same area, and could not have been contemplated by the Legislature. I think, therefore, that it was not in the power of the defendants to make the agreement contained in their resolution, and any damage resulting to the plaintiff in carrying it out was not by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of either of the Acts of 1848 or 1858.

ROBINSON (app.) v. STEVENITT (resp.) (a)

Highway—Liability of surveyor—Conviction for neglecting to repair—Evidence without view—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, ss. 20 & 94.

By sect. 20 of the Highway Act 1835, if a surveyor shall neglect his duty in anything required of him by that Act, for which no particular penalty is imposed, he shall forfeit for every such offence any sum not exceeding 5l.

By sect. 94, if any highway is out of repair, justices may order a view, and if satisfied thereof upon the view, may convict the surveyor who is liable for the repair in any penalty not exceeding 5l., and shall make an order appointing a time for the necessary repair.

Justices convicted the appellant, a surveyor, under sect. 20, upon evidence in the ordinary way, of neglecting his duty by neglecting to repair a footpath for which he was liable.

Held, upon a case stated, that the justices could convict for non-repair only upon adopting the course provided by sect. 94; and that this conviction was therefore bad.

This was a case stated by two of Her Majesty's justices in and for the parts of Kesteven, in the county of Lincoln, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on the questions of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

1. On the 10th Dec. 1877 an information was preferred by Thomas Stevenitt (hereinafter called the respondent) against John Robinson (hereinafter called the appellant), under sect. 20 of the Highways Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), charging for that he, the said appellant, on the 3rd Dec. 1877, at the parish of Caythorpe, in the said parts and county, then being the surveyor of the highways for the said parish, unlawfully did neglect his duty as such surveyor by then and there neglecting to repair a certain footpath in the town street of Caythorpe, leading from Caythorpe towards Newark, as he was required to do by the Act of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, contrary to the same statute. The information came on for hearing before four of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in special sessions in and for the division of Sleaford, in the said parts, on the 17th Dec. 1877, and was adjourned at the request of the appellant's solicitor. At this hearing no question was raised by or on behalf of the appellant as to the jurisdiction of the justices to hear and determine the case under sect. 20 of the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50).

2. At the special sessions, holden at the place before mentioned on the 7th Jan. 1878, the said information again came on for hearing before three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the said division.

3. Before the hearing of the case on the last-named day, the appellant's solicitor raised an objection to the jurisdiction of the justices, on the ground that the information ought not to have been preferred under sect. 20 of the Highway Act, and that proceedings ought to have been taken

(a) Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div.] THE MAYOR, &C., OF MONMOUTH, AND CHURCHWARDEN, &C., OF MONMOUTH. [C.P. Div.]

under sect. 94 of the same Act, and could not be taken under any other section than the latter. The justices overruled this objection, and proceeded to hear the case, when it was proved that the footpath in question had been wholly picked up for the purpose of making a new and better path in the month of September last, and was left in a rough state covered with broken stones, and unfit for use as a public footpath, from that time up to 3rd Dec. last, the day named in the information, and therefore they convicted the appellant and fined him 1s. with costs. On the part of the appellant it was contended that he was not able to procure gravel to form the surface of the footpath before the day named in the information; but this was not proved to the satisfaction of the justices, who were of opinion that due diligence had not been used in reinstating the footpath in question.

4. The appellant being dissatisfied with the determination upon the hearing of the said information as being erroneous in point of law, duly applied to the said justices to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf. And the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, stated this case.

5. The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court are, whether the justices had jurisdiction to hear and determine the information, and convict the appellant under sect. 20 of the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), or whether they ought to have followed the course prescribed by sect. 94 of the same Act, previously to hearing the case, and before they had jurisdiction to convict the appellant.

6. If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said conviction is to be quashed, or the court is to make such other order as to the court may seem fit.

Evans argued for the appellant.—No doubt sect. 20 of the Highway Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50) provides a penalty for certain offences created by the Act, but it does not give an alternative mode of conviction for non-repair to that which is particularly enacted in sect. 94. By sect. 20 it appears "that if any surveyor or district surveyor, or assistant surveyor, shall neglect his duty in anything required of him by this Act, for which no particular penalty is imposed, he shall forfeit for every such offence any sum not exceeding 5l." This applies to the offence of neglecting to impound cattle under sect. 74; and probably, if the conviction be properly worded, to an offence under sect. 73; although a conviction purporting to be under sects. 20 and 73 was held bad in Morgan v. Leach (10 M. & W. 558). By sect. 94, if any highway is out of repair, and information is duly given thereof, a justice may summon the surveyor of the parish chargeable with such repairs to appear before justices at special sessions; "and the said justices shall either appoint some competent person to view the same and report thereon to the justices in special sessions assembled, on a certain day and place to be then and there fixed, at which the said surveyor of the highways or other party as aforesaid shall be directed to attend; or the said justices shall fix a day whereon they or any two of them shall attend to view the said highway; and if to the justices at such special sessions, on the day and at the place so fixed as aforesaid, it shall appear either on the report of the said person so appointed by them to view, or on the view of such justices, that the said highway is not in a state of thorough and effectual repair, they, the said justices at such last-mentioned special sessions, shall convict the said surveyor or other party liable to the repair of the said highway in any penalty not exceeding five pounds, and shall make an order on the said surveyor or other person, or bodies politic or corporate liable to repair such highway, by which order they shall limit and appoint a time for the repairing of the same." It does not appear upon the case that any view of this footpath was had, and it must be taken that the justices did not convict under this sect. 94.

The respondent did not appear.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this conviction cannot stand. Sect. 94 provides a particular course to be adopted before a conviction for non-repair of a highway, which the justices in this case altogether neglected. There is also a particular penalty of 5l. imposed by that section for the offence, and it is required that the justices shall further order a time for repairing the highway. This being so, sect. 20 does not apply to this offence. It enacts that if a surveyor shall neglect his duty in anything required of him by this Act, for which no particular penalty is imposed, he shall forfeit the penalty therein provided. There are offences created by the Act to which that section may apply, but it cannot apply to a surveyor's neglecting to repair a highway.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The conviction must be quashed.

THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF THE BOROUGH OF MONMOUTH (BY THE TOWN COUNCIL) AND THE CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS AND ASSISTANT OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF MONMOUTH.(a)

Bating—Public Health Acts—Local Paving Act—Town and borough of Monmouth—General rate invalid—Implied exemption—58 Geo. 3, c. 81 (local and personal). 35 & 36 Vict. c. 79, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 89, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55.

By a local Act (58 Geo. 3, c. 81) certain persons therein mentioned were appointed commissioners for the purpose of paving the footways and cleansing, lighting, and watching the streets in the town of Monmouth. By s. 59, "the said commissioners shall and are hereby authorised and required once in every year to rate and assess any sum not exceeding one shilling in the pound upon or in respect of all houses, &c. . . . being within the limits of the said town of Monmouth." By s. 67, "all and every person or persons paying the rates and assessments hereby authorised to be levied within the said town shall be and they and every of them is and are hereby exempted and discharged from all charges and expenses of paving, lighting, watching, cleansing, or fencing off any part or parts of the footways and cross paths of the said town and borough." By the Public Health Act 1872 the borough of Monmouth (within which was the town of Monmouth) was created an urban sanitary district, and the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough acting by the town council the urban sanitary authority for such district. By s. 16, "All expenses incurred or payable by an urban sanitary authority under the Sanitary Acts shall . . . be defrayed . . . in the case of the council of a borough out of the borough fund or borough rate." By the Sanitary Law Amendment Act 1874, all the powers and duties of the commissioners under the said Local Paving Act relating to any objects or purposes of the Sanitary Acts were transferred to the council. By the Public Health Act 1875, s. 144, "Every urban authority shall, within their district, exclusively of any other person, execute the office of and be surveyor of highways, and have, exercise, and be subject to all the powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities of surveyors of highways." By s. 207, "All expenses incurred or payable by any urban authority in the execution of this Act, and not otherwise provided for, shall be charged on and defrayed out of the district fund and general district rate leviable by them under this Act." The town council, as the urban sanitary authority for the borough of Monmouth, made a general borough rate to meet expenditure, which included the paving, lighting, and cleansing of the town. A ratepayer, who occupied a house within the borough, but outside the town of Monmouth, appealed on the ground that the rate was made in part for raising money towards defraying the expenses of carrying the Monmouth Paving Act into execution.

Held, that the rate was invalid.

CASE.

1. This is a special case, stated by consent under the provisions of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, in order to have determined the question of the validity of a rate made by the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of Monmouth.

2. The borough of Monmouth is one of the boroughs mentioned in schedule A, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and the corporation consist of the mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors. The area of the borough includes the whole of the parish of Monmouth and a considerable part of the adjoining parish of Dixon, a plan of the said borough accompanies and forms part of this case.

3. By an Act of Parliament of 58 Geo. 3, c. 81, intitled "An Act for paving the footways and cleansing, lighting, and watching the streets in the town of Monmouth," certain persons therein mentioned were appointed commissioners for the purpose of executing the said Act so far as related to the paving, repairing, cleansing, lighting, and watching the said town. A copy of the said Act accompanies this case.

4. Sect. 28 is as follows :

And in order that the footways of the streets, lanes, and other public passages and places within the said town and borough may be properly paved and repaired, and that the said streets, lanes, and other passages may be lighted, cleaned, and watched, be it further enacted that from and immediately after the passing of this Act the property of and in all the present and future pavements in the streets, lanes, and other public passages and places within the said town, in the footways and of all materials, implements, watch houses, stands, lamp irons, posts, and other things which shall be provided for the purposes of this Act, and all the soil, dung, manure, and dirt which shall arise or be made in any of the said streets, lanes, passages, and places, and of all ashes, cinders, dirt, and rubbish to be taken and carried away from the houses in the said streets, lanes, passages, and places, shall belong to and be the property of and the same are hereby vested in the mayor of the said town of Monmouth for the time being in trust for the said commissioners; and he is hereby authorised to bring or cause to be brought an action, or to prefer any bill of indictment, as the case shall require, against any person or persons whomsoever who shall steal, take, or carry away, detain, spoil, injure, or destroy any of the matters or things herein so mentioned and vested, or any part or parts thereof.

5. Sect. 30 is as follows :

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any of the roads, ways, or passages which have been usually paved, amended, or repaired by the trustees acting in the execution of an Act of the fiftieth year of the reign of his present majesty, intitled "An Act for enlarging the term and power of three Acts of his late and present majesty for repairing several roads therein mentioned leading to through and from the town of Monmouth, and for making a new piece of road communicating therewith, nor to any part or parts of the carriage roads and ways only which have been usually repaired by the inhabitants at large of the parish of Monmouth, except or so far as may be necessary for the purposes of this Act, or such part or parts of the said roads as the said commissioners shall contract with the trustees of such roads, or with the surveyors of the highways of the parish of Monmouth for the paving, maintaining, or repairing, which contract or contracts it shall be lawful for the said commissioners to make and enter into.

6. Sect. 31 is as follows :

And be it further enacted that it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, and they are hereby authorised and empowered to new pitch and pave any of the footways of the streets, lanes, highways, public passages, and places in the said town, and from time to time when and so often as they shall think proper, to cause all or any of the present or future pavements or footways in the several streets, lanes, and places in the said town to be taken up, raised, lowered, altered, relaid, pitched, paved, or repaired in such manner as the said commissioners may think proper. And that the footways in the several streets and places where the same can properly be set and left shall be laid with a pavement of flagstone, and also to cause the said several streets, lanes, passages, and places within the said town to be cleansed, and all nuisances and encroachments therein to be removed, and the present drains, sinks, gutters, and watercourses for conveying the water off, and from the said streets, lanes, passages, and places to be amended, repaired, cleaned, scooped, and new ones be made in such manner as the commissioners shall think proper. And if the parties who shall be respectively ordered to remove such nuisances or encroachments shall not remove the same within two days after notice in writing given by the clerk of the said commissioners, they shall respectively forfeit a sum not exceeding the sum of 20s., to be recovered before one of the justices of the peace in like manner as the penalties herein directed to be recovered under this Act. And that if any person or persons shall at any time hereafter, without the consent or approbation of the said commissioners, signed by the clerk, make or cause to be made any alteration in the form of the pavement of any street, lane, public passage, or place by this Act directed to be paved or repaved, such person or persons shall, at his or their responsibility (within five days after notice being given for that purpose by the said clerk), put the pavement which shall have been so altered into the same form and condition as it was on or before making such further alteration, or in such other manner as the said clerk shall direct in writing, and in case of neglect or refusal so to do, then the said commissioners shall and may cause the same to be done, and the expense and charges thereof shall be borne and defrayed by the person or persons so neglecting or refusing the same to be recovered (in case of non-payment thereof upon demand) in like manner as any penalty is hereinafter authorised or directed to be recovered.

7. Sect. 59 is as follows :

And for raising money towards answering and defraying the charges and expenses of carrying this Act into execution, be it further enacted that the said commissioners shall, and are hereby authorised and required once in every year, to rate and assess any sum not exceeding one shilling in the pound upon or in respect of all houses, warehouses, shops, cellars, vaults, stables, coach houses, brewhouses, granaries, malthouses, and buildings which are already built or made, or which shall hereafter be built or made, and upon the several gardens, yards, or lands thereto respectively belonging and adjoining, and upon all gardens, orchards, paddocks, closes, tenements, and hereditaments adjoining to or occupied with, or usually considered as appurtenant to such buildings not exceeding a distance of 100 yards from the present turnpike gates, if the paving shall be continued up to the same, and being within the limits of the said town of Monmouth, according to the rate or charge made upon the same hereditaments for the repair of the highways for the parish of Monmouth for the year proceeding, and the first year for which such rates or assessments shall be made, shall commence at, and be computed from, the day or time to be fixed for that purpose by the said commissioners, at a meeting of which one calendar month's notice shall be given, to be fixed on the town hall, and at which one half of the commissioners shall be present; and the moneys so to be rated or assessed shall from time to time be half-yearly paid to the collector or collectors to be appointed as aforesaid, and in order the better to ascertain and make such rates or assessments the surveyors of the highways of the said parish shall, and are hereby required, at all reasonable times, to permit the said commissioners or any of them and their clerk, and also the said collectors, to peruse and inspect the rates, and assessments made for the repair of the said highways for the year then next proceeding, and to take a copy or copies thereof, and every such surveyor refusing to comply therewith shall forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 5*l.* every time he shall so refuse.

8. Sect. 67 is as follows :

And be it further enacted that all and every person or persons paying the rates and assessments hereby authorised to be levied within the said town, shall be and every one of them is and are hereby exempted and discharged from all charges and expenses of paving, lighting, watching, cleansing, or fencing off any part or parts of the footways and cross paths of the said town and borough.

9. Sect. 78 is as follows :

And whereas a parcel of meadow ground called Chippenham, containing forty-five acres or thereabouts, lies within the said town and borough of Monmouth, the aftermath and grass of which from the time of hay harvest to Candlemas day has been immemorially taken and enjoyed by the inhabitants and occupiers within the said town and borough. And the same has been opened to them on Monday next, after the 4th Sept. yearly by the order and on payment of 1*s.* a head for horses, and 9*d.* a head for horned cattle, and 6*d.* a score for sheep, to the mayor and corporation of the said town, which mode of enjoyment occasions the said field to be overflocked with unreasonable numbers of horses and cattle, by which many accidents happen, and the grass is also trod down and destroyed, so as to make the same of little or no value. Whereas such grass would be of considerable advantage to the inhabitants of the town if a proper and reasonable stock was turned in to eat off the same in a usual course of agriculture. And a sum of money may also be raised, which may be applied to the purposes of this Act if the said grass was disposed of in a proper and judicious manner. Be it further enacted that from and after the passing of this Act, the aftermath and grass to arise and grow yearly in and upon the said field called Chippenham from the time of hay harvest until Candlemas day following, shall be vested in the mayor of the said town and borough, with full power and authority from time to time to sell and dispose of the said grass to such person and persons as he the said mayor shall in his discretion think fit, and to pay the money arising therefrom, as the same shall be received yearly, to the treasurer to be appointed under this Act, for the lighting of the said town only. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall prevent or in any manner impede the races in Chippenham at such times as may be thought convenient for that purpose, nor to prevent any person or persons from walking in or upon the said field as they have been accustomed to do.

10. From the year 1818 to the commencement of 1877, the said Act has been put in force by the commissioners therein named, and a rate of 1*s.* in the pound assessed on all houses, land, and hereditaments liable thereto.

11. Up to forty years ago or thereabouts, the turnpike gates of the town were respectively the Drybridge Gate, the Cinderhill Gate, the Monk Gate, the Wyebridge Gate, and the Dixon Gate, all which said gates were situate close to the town, and all houses, lands, and hereditaments situate within these gates, and within a distance of 100 yards of the said gates were assessed to the said rate. The position of the said turnpike gates is indicated on the said plan.

12. About forty years ago the said Dixon Gate was removed about a mile from the town of Monmouth, but the area of the houses, lands, and hereditaments rated was not extended.

13. The paving of the footways in the borough of Monmouth has never been extended beyond 100 yards distance from the site of any of the old turnpike gates of the town, and outside these limits there are only a few public lamps.

14. By sections 3 and 4 of the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 89 (The Sanitary Law Amendment Act 1874) all the powers and duties of the commissioners under the said local paving Act relating to any objects or purposes of the Sanitary Acts as defined by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 79 (The Public Health Act 1872) and all property held by the commissioners for such objects or purposes were transferred to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough acting by the town council as the urban sanitary authority for the urban sanitary district of the borough, constituted by the said Public Health Act 1872 through the said commissioners as already stated, continued to act in the execution of the said local Act up to the beginning of the present year.

15. By virtue of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) the borough of Monmouth was continued an urban sanitary district, and the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses acting by the council are the urban sanitary authority.

16. The sect. 144 of the Public Health Act 1875 is as follows :

Every urban authority shall, within their district, exclusively of any other person, execute the office of and be surveyor of highways, and have exercise and be subject to all the powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities of surveyors of highways under the law for the time being in force, save so far as such powers, authorities, or duties are or may be inconsistent with the provisions of this Act. Every urban authority shall also have, exercise, and be subject to all the powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities which by the Highway Act 1835, or any Act amending the same, are vested in and given to the inhabitants in vestry assembled of any parish within their district. All ministerial acts required by an Act of Parliament to be done by or to the surveyors of highways may be done by or to the surveyor of the urban authority, or by or to such other person as they may appoint.

17. Sect. 207 of the said Public Health Act is as follows :

All expenses incurred or payable by any urban authority in the execution of this Act, and not otherwise provided for, shall be charged on and defrayed out of the district fund and general district rate, leviable by them under this Act, subject to the following exceptions, viz.:

That if in any district the expenses incurred by an urban authority being the council of a borough in the execution of the sanitary Acts were, at the time of the passing of this Act, payable out of the borough fund or borough rate, then the expenses incurred by that authority in the execution of the Act shall be charged on and defrayed out of the borough fund or borough rate, and

That if in any district the expenses incurred by an urban authority (being improvement commissioners) in the execution of the sanitary Acts were, at the time of the passing of this Act, payable out of any rate in the nature of a general district rate, leviable by them as such commissioners throughout the whole of their district, then the expenses incurred by that authority in the execution of this Act shall be charged on and defrayed out of such rate for the purposes of this section. The council of the borough of Folkestone shall be deemed to be improvement commissioners, and that where, at the time of the passing of this Act, the expenses incurred by an urban authority in the execution of certain purposes of the sanitary Acts were payable out of the borough fund and borough rate, and the expenses incurred by such authority in the execution of the other purposes of the said Acts were payable out of a rate or rates leviable by that authority throughout the whole of their district for paving, sewerage, or other sanitary purposes, then the expenses incurred by that authority in the execution of the same or similar purposes respectively under this Act shall respectively be charged on and defrayed out of the borough fund and borough rate, and out of the rate or rates leviable as aforesaid.

18. Sect. 16 of the Public Health Act 1872 is as follows:

All expenses incurred or payable by an urban sanitary authority under the sanitary Acts shall, if the Local Government Acts or the provisions of those Acts with respect to rating were at or immediately before the passing of those Acts in force throughout the district of such authority or within a local government district wholly within such district be defrayed in manner provided by those Acts; and if the Local Government Acts were not so in force at or immediately before the passing of this Act, be defrayed as follows, that is to say:

In the case of the council of a borough out of the borough fund or borough rates; in the case of improvement commissioners out of any rate in the nature of a general district rate leviable by them as such commissioners throughout the whole of their district.

Provided that where an urban sanitary authority had before the passing of this Act power to levy within its district a rate or rates for paving, sewerage, or other sanitary purposes, all expenses incurred by such authority in the performance of its duties under the Sanitary Acts shall be defrayed out of such rate or rates, except where at the time of the passing of this Act any such expenses were chargeable upon the borough fund or borough rate, in which case such expenses shall continue so chargeable. And by sect. 8 of the Sanitary Law Amendment Act 1874 it is enacted:

Whereas doubts have arisen as to the meaning of the proviso to the 16th section of the principal Act with reference to the rate therein mentioned as a rate levied within the district, be it therefore declared that such rate shall signify one which is levied throughout the whole of the district. Provided that where any charges to which that section refers have been defrayed out of any rate before the passing of this Act the same if not heretofore questioned in any court of law shall be deemed to have been legally defrayed so far as any objection could arise out of the proviso in this section referred to.

Provided, further, that when any charges directed by the said 16th section of the principal Act to be paid in the case of a council of a borough out of the borough fund or borough rate have been hitherto divided between the landlord and tenant in moieties or otherwise, under the provisions of any local Act in that behalf, the Local Government Board may, upon application by their order, make provisions for the continuance of such division of the charges between parties during the continuance of any contract existing at the passing of the Act.

At the passing of the Public Health Act 1872 the Local Government Acts were not, nor were the provisions thereof with respect to rating, enforced throughout any local government district coincident with or wholly within the borough of Monmouth.

19. Sects. 5, 6, 10, 149, 211, 216, 227, 270, and 340, of the Public Health Act 1875, are also referred to.

20. The estimated expenses of the town council, including paving, lighting, and cleansing the town, for the current year amount to 2529l. 3s., and a rate has been made of 3s. in the pound for the parish of Monmouth. A copy of the said rate is annexed to and forms part of the case. Though the said rate on the face of it appears to be a poor-rate, it is admitted that 2s. of the 3s. rate is for the purposes and expenses hereinafter set forth.

21. The rate, so far as the portion applicable to pay borough rate is concerned, was made in aid of the expenditure of the current year, viz., from the 1st Sept. 1876, to the 31st Aug. 1877.

22. The 3s. rate is made by the overseers as a poor rate, partly for the general purposes to which the poor rate is applicable, and partly to meet the call made upon them by the town council in aid of the general expenditure of the borough. Such general expenditure is shown by the estimate on which the rate was founded, and of which a copy is annexed and forms part of the special case. It comprises the salaries of the corporation officers, the cost of the police force for the entire borough, except turnpike roads and county bridges, expense of paving, cleaning, and lighting the town, the instalment in reduction of debts upon the cattle market and interest, the school board calls for the borough, repairs of corporation property, and some other incidental expenses.

23. The area of the district is 5707 acres, the rateable value of which is 19,165l. 7s. 4d. The whole expenditure, except one item mentioned hereafter in this paragraph, will be made in respect of the area of the whole borough. The expenditure for paving, cleansing, and lighting estimated at 500l., has been or will be confined to the limits of the town of Monmouth as defined by the Monmouth Paving Act, and to a small portion outside that area where a few gas lamps have been erected, the annual cost of lighting and maintaining which is estimated at 3l. 10s. per lamp. The rateable value of the town as defined by the Monmouth Paving Act is 8301l., and the estimated rateable value of the property so lighted outside that limit is about 640l. The annual cost of lighting and maintaining the gas lamps erected outside the limits of the town of Monmouth has been previously to the making of the rate appealed against defrayed by contributions from the occupiers of property adjacent thereto, and has not been included in the paving and lighting rate or in any other rate.

24. The appellant is a ratepayer occupying a farm house and lands more than one hundred yards distant from any of the old turnpike gates of the town, and outside the limits fixed by the Monmouth Paving Act. The said farm house and lands are marked on the annexed plans.

25. The appellant has been charged or rated to the said rate at the sum of 21l. 13s. 9d. in respect of the said farm house and lands, and has appealed to the Court of Quarter Sessions against the said rate and the said charge. Notice of appeal, dated Feb. 16, 1877, was given to the urban sanitary authority of the borough of Monmouth, and to the overseers and assistant overseer of the parish of Monmouth. A copy of the notice of appeal is annexed and forms part of the case. It has been agreed that for the purposes of the case no objection shall be taken as to the want of or sufficiency in the notice.

26. The appellant contends that under the above circumstances the said rate is invalid, and that he is not liable to be assessed or rated in respect of the said rate, on the ground that the said rate is made, as the appellant alleges, in part or wholly for raising money towards answering and defraying the charges and expenses of carrying the said Monmouth Paving Act into execution or for similar purposes.

27. The respondents contend that the said rate is valid, inasmuch as it is made, as the respondents allege, in respect of expenses incurred by them as the urban sanitary authority for the district of the borough under the Public Health Act 1875, which expenses are by that Act made chargeable on the borough fund and borough rate; and that the said Local Paving Act does not exempt them from any duties imposed or curtail any powers conferred on them as such urban sanitary authority as aforesaid.

28. Copies of the rate and assessment appealed against are annexed to and form part of this case.

29. The question for the opinion of the court for which this case is stated is, whether the said rate is valid or invalid, and whether the appellant is liable to be rated to the said rate in the manner hereinbefore set forth.

The costs of the appeal and of this case are to follow the judgment of the court.

The court is to have power, in case it should see fit to send back this case, to have any fresh facts found which they may think material, or to have the statement of the present facts amended by a barrister-at-law whom the court shall name.

Bowen and Bradford for the appellant.—The Public Health Act must be read as subject to the local Act. To tax the country for the benefit of the town is unreasonable. By this rate the agricultural part of Monmouth is called upon to pay for paving and lighting, from which it gets no advantage. There is authority in support of the proposition that the Public Health Act does not override local Acts. We say, first, that these expenses are "otherwise provided for," viz., by the local Act; and, secondly, if that is not so, that they are not properly "incurred in the execution of this Act." They cited:

The Commissioners for Improving the Town and Parish of Walton-on-the-Naze v. Walford, 10 L. Rep. Q.B. 180;

G. A. E. Fitzgerald for the respondents.—The question turns entirely upon the construction to be placed on the Public Health Act of 1875 and the Monmouth Local Act of 1818. In 1818 there were no general provisions on this subject for the whole country, and this local Act carved out a district from the borough of Monmouth for the purposes of paving, lighting, &c. By the Public Health Act of 1872 the whole of England was mapped out into urban and rural sanitary districts. The urban sanitary district of Monmouth is co-extensive with the borough of Monmouth. The consolidating Act of 1875 re-affirms these boundaries. The appellant in this case does not claim any exemption from a rate in respect of any particular property. What he complains of is that the urban sanitary authority has not rated the inhabitants of a small district within the limits of their authority, in respect of the paving and lighting of that district, apart from the rest of the inhabitants within the limits of their authority. In the case of The Walton Commissioners v. Walford (ubi sup.), cited by the other side, the area of the local Act was co-extensive with the sanitary district under the Public Health Act, and the commissioners for carrying out the local Act were the authority under the Public Health Act. The rate, therefore, was one imposed by the Public Health Act itself. By sect. 43 of the Public Health Act 1872 it was enacted that "Any limit imposed on or in respect of any rate by any local Act of Parliament shall not apply to any rate required to be levied for the purpose of defraying any expenses incurred by a sanitary authority for sanitary purposes." The area under the local Act is clearly absorbed in the area of the sanitary district under the Public Health Act. [GROVE, J.—In the Walton case (ubi sup.) it was held that "limit" in that section meant pecuniary, not territorial limit.] [LINDLEY, J., referred to sect. 67 of the local Act (set out in special case).] That section does not exempt the appellant because he resides outside the old district. [GROVE, J.—The townspeople are liable to pay town rates; the borough inhabitants outside the town are liable to pay borough rates. Then the Public Health Act makes one district. If the borough becomes liable to pay town rates, surely the town becomes liable to pay borough rates? Yes. [Then, you say sect. 67 is repealed? No; because the exemption is only to those persons who pay rates under the local Act, and they will now pay rates under the Public Health Act and not under the local Act. The whole policy and scope of the Public Health Act is to consolidate the conflicting districts for rating purposes. Sect. 10 of the Public Health Act 1875 shows the relation of the local Acts to the general Act. The latter part of that section says; "Where any local Act, other than an Act for the conservancy of any river, is in force within the district of an urban authority, conferring on any commissioners, trustees, or other persons powers for purposes the same as or similar to those of this Act (but not for their own pecuniary benefit), all the powers, rights, duties, capacities, liabilities, and obligations of such commissioners, trustees, or other persons, in relation to such purposes, shall be transferred and attach to the said urban authority." The local Acts and the general Act are therefore to be construed together; and it is submitted that they are to be so construed as to carry out the intention of the general Act. Where there are provisions under the Public Health Act and under the local Act for carrying out the same object it is submitted that it is optional with the sanitary authorities to proceed under the Public Health Act or under the local Act. Sect. 340 of the Public Health Act 1875 supports this contention. That section says that, "Where, within the district of a local authority, any local Act is in force providing for purposes the same as or similar to the purposes of this Act, proceedings may be instituted, at the discretion of the authority or person instituting the same, either under the local Act or this Act or under both, subject to these qualifications: (1) That no person shall be punished for the same offence both under a local Act and this Act; and (2) That the local authority shall not, by reason of any local Act in force within their district, be exempted from the performance of any duty or obligation to which they may be subject under this Act." [LINDLEY, J. referred to sect. 341, which is as follows: "All powers given by this Act shall be deemed to be in addition to, and not in derogation of, any other powers conferred by Act of Parliament, law, or custom, and such other powers may be exercised in the same manner as if this Act had not passed; and nothing in this Act shall exempt any person from any penalty to which he would have been subject if this Act had not passed. Provided that no person who has been adjudged to pay any penalty in pursuance of this Act shall for the same offence be liable to a penalty under any other Act."] A discretion is therefore given, subject to no injustice being done to the public by a double proceeding. As to the words "not otherwise provided for" in sect. 207 of the Public Health Act 1875 (set out in the special case), how can the purposes of this Act of 1872 be provided for by an Act of 1818? The proviso in sect. 16 of the Public Health Act 1872, is interpreted by sect. 8 of the Sanitary Law Amendment Act 1874. Both these sections are set out in par. 18, p. 7, of the special case. It cannot be contended that paving and lighting are not principal purposes of the Public Health Act. [GROVE, J.—The question is whether the urban sanitary authority can exercise the powers which the commissioners had under the local Act otherwise than the commissioners exercised them. No doubt they can exercise them; but are they not limited as to the manner of doing so?] The commissioners under the local Act, who were the town council, had simply a power of paving footways. [LINDLEY, J.—The rate in question could not then have been raised at all under the local Act?] Not at all. The expenses under the Public Health Act of whatever kind are payable out of the borough fund. [GROVE, J.—The appellant's contention must be that the exemption in the local Act exempts by implication persons outside the turnpike gates from contributing to the district within those gates, as it does expressly persons inside the turnpike gates from contributing to the district outside.] We have no power to limit our rate to a smaller district than that of the Public Health Act. We must rate the whole district. And even if we have the power, putting it at the lowest we have an option, and it would not be right to exercise that power, the intention of the Act being that we should rate the larger district. The result of the appellant's contention would be that while a special rate was passed for paving the footways, another rate would have to be passed for the other paving and lighting purposes, from which persons paying the special rate would be exempt. In the case of Bramston v. The Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Colchester (25 L. J. N. S. 73, M. C.) Lord Campbell, C.J., in giving judgment, says, "Mr. Bovill has very forcibly argued that the general words of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98, cannot be taken as repealing the special enactments of the local Act; that must depend upon whether it appears to have been the intention of the legislature to repeal the local Act, and it appears to me that such was the intention of the legislature. We must look to the Acts themselves, and doing so it must, I think, be considered that the legislature intended to sweep away the private and local practice that had existed, though sanctioned by Acts of Parliament, and to have one uniform mode," &c. Uniformity was one great object of the Public Health Act. [GROVE, J.—Those observations would apply as much to the case cited against you, Garnett v. Bradley (ubi sup.), as to the present case.] He also cited

Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, pp. 145-147.

Bradford in reply.—By the Public Health Act 1872 the whole of the borough of Monmouth was constituted an urban sanitary district, and the town council were made the urban sanitary authority therein. Taking sect. 7 of that Act and sect. 3 of the Sanitary Law Amendment Act 1874 together, it will be seen that all the powers, rights, duties, capacities, liabilities, and obligations of the commissioners under the Local Act, so far as those powers, &c., related to purposes of the Sanitary Acts, were transferred to the town council as the urban sanitary authority; and the Public Health Act 1875 (which now represents the Sanitary Acts) contains an enactment to the same effect.

GROVE, J.—The question to be determined upon the special case before us is, whether an inhabitant of the urban sanitary district of the borough of Monmouth is liable to contribute to a rate made by the sanitary authority of the district under the Public Health Act 1875, which rate is alleged in part to be made for the purpose of raising money towards defraying the expenses of carrying a Local Paving Act into execution. The answer to this question really depends upon whether the Public Health Act 1875 does in effect repeal the Local Act 58 Geo. 3, c. 81. The Local Act was passed for the purposes of paving the footways and cleansing, lighting, and watching the streets in the town of Monmouth, purposes clearly within the scope of the Public Health Act. I am far from saying that the case is free from difficulty; and I was much impressed by the very able argument of Mr. Fitzgerald. But on the whole I think we must come to the conclusion that the rate as to which our opinion is asked was invalid. The Local Act comprised an area inclosed by the turnpike gates of the town of Monmouth, not exceeding a distance of one hundred yards from such gates, and being within the limits of the town of Monmouth. This district is practically the town of Monmouth. The town of Monmouth forms part of the borough of Monmouth, and the urban sanitary district under the Public Health Act is co-extensive with the borough. We have been furnished with a plan showing the precise limits of these areas. Now by the Local Act certain persons therein mentioned were appointed commissioners for the purpose of executing the Act. The Public Health Act of 1875 certainly does not in terms repeal this Local Act; and I am of opinion that it does not repeal it by implication. The question whether a general Act repeals previous special

Acts has been lately considered in the case of Garnett v. Bradley (ubi sup.), which was a question as to the meaning of the provision that "costs shall follow the event" in a trial by jury under the Judicature Act. In that case it was argued, and two courts adopted the argument, that, there being special exceptions in the Act, "follow the event" must mean "follow the event at the trial" in all cases not specially excepted; but a majority of the Court of Appeal thought the words must be taken to mean follow the legal event, so as not to repeal all the previous legislation on the subject of costs; so that there must be something imperative in a subsequent statute in order to repeal a previous particular one. But, in the present case, not only is there nothing imperative, and nothing that cannot be consistently construed with the words of the previous Act; but sect. 340 of the Public Health Act is as follows: [Reads it, vide sup.] This section, to my mind, shows clearly that the Act was not intended to repeal previous local Acts, because there is an express power to proceed under the local Act where there is one, which would not have been given if it was intended that they should all be repealed. I am, therefore, of opinion that this is a strong argument in favour of the appellant. But then it is further argued that the new Act goes beyond the previous one by imposing new burthens with corresponding privileges. That argument would have had great weight with me but for sect. 67 of the local Act. How can we hold that the Public Health Act enlarges the burthens of the ratepayers in the town of Monmouth, reasonably reading sect. 67 of the local Act, which is as follows: [Reads it, vide sup.] Now, here is a distinct exemption for all persons paying rates within the district under the local Act from all expenses of paving, lighting, &c., the footways of the borough. It is admitted that that is so, but then it is said that that exemption may remain in force notwithstanding the Public Health Act 1875. It is said that a person living beyond the town, but within the borough, is not exempted from paying a rate for town purposes; but there is this difficulty: If a rate is made under the local Act he is, in fact, exempted, the only persons rateable under that Act being persons living within the town; he, not living within the town, is not rated. Mr. Fitzgerald could not argue that the exemption in the local Act in respect of persons paying rates under that Act from contributing to the borough expenses for the same purposes, did not still exist, in the face of the two cases that have been referred to—The Walton Commissioners v. Walford (L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 180) and Reg. on pros. of Overseers of Walsall v. London and North-Western Railway Company (46 L. J. 102, Mag. Cas.). In those cases it was contended that exemptions conferred by local Acts were repealed by the Public Health Act; but it was held that, looking to the wording of the Public Health Act, that could not be so; so that it could not be contended that the section in this local Act giving the exemption had been repealed. That leads me to suppose that when I find the position of the appellant in this case to be the exact correlative of the position of those persons upon whom an express exemption is conferred by the Act, there must be an implied exemption still in force in this case. It cannot be that the inhabitants of the borough who live within the town are not liable to pay this rate, and that the inhabitants who live without the town are liable. Both must be liable or both exempt. The persons who live within the town are clearly exempt; therefore, so is the appellant and those who live outside it. The sanitary authority has the powers the commissioners under the Local Act had. They may still enforce that Act so far as it does not conflict with the Public Health Act. It has been suggested that great inconveniences will arise from the operation of a double system of rating in one borough. On the other hand, Mr. Bowen suggests that it is very hard that the country should be rated for the benefit of the town. No doubt there will be hardships and inconveniences in whichever way we decided this question. The remedy must be by Act of Parliament. We cannot take into consideration any balance of hardship, and construe the Act of Parliament according to that interpretation which we think will occasion the least inconvenience. I suppose it is an impossibility completely to reconcile a series of Acts in a perfectly satisfactory manner. But this local Act remains in existence, it is unrepealed, and it is not so inconsistent with the Public Health Act as to prevent the authority under that Act from imposing the same rate as before instead of imposing new burthens upon persons who are exempted from them by their local Act. The two cases cited, and particularly the case of the overseers of Walsall, seem to me to be a strong authority for our deciding as we do, if not absolutely binding. I have already said that I think that which the appellant claims here is in the nature of an exemption under the local Act, having regard to sect. 67 of that Act.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I arrive at that opinion with considerable reluctance, as I cannot help thinking that a uniform system would be better, as Mr. Fitzgerald has said. However, what we have to do is to see whether the Public Health Act does repeal the local Act. Now the Public Health Act not only does not purport to repeal the local Act, but it contains clauses which show clearly that it was not intended to repeal that Act. Now sub-ss. 340, 341 are as follows: [Reads them.] Then sect. 303 says: "The Local Government Board may, on the application of the local authority of any district, by provisional order, wholly or partially repeal, alter, or amend any local Act, other than an Act for the conservancy of rivers, which is in force in any area comprising the whole or part of any such district, and not conferring powers or privileges on any persons or person for their or his own pecuniary benefit, which relates to the same subject-matters as this Act. Any such provisional order may provide for the extension of the provisions of the local Act referred to therein beyond the district or districts within the limits of such Act, or for the exclusion of the whole or a portion of any such district from the application of such Act; and may provide what local authority shall have jurisdiction for the purposes of this Act in any area which is by such order included in or excluded from such district." Nothing can be clearer than that the Legislature did not intend by the Public Health Act to interfere with the local Acts. It did give power to the Local Government Board to deal with them by provisional order; but that was only where they did not confer powers or privileges on any persons or person for their or his own pecuniary benefit. Therefore, so far as intention goes, the intention was clearly not to repeal these Acts. I attach great importance to that, because it meets the forcible argument as to the benefits of a uniform system by the fact that a uniform system was not intended to be established. It appears to me that this local Act is one that the commissioners are bound to set in force. It is not optional at all. "For raising money towards defraying the expenses of this Act, the said commissioners shall rate," &c.; "All persons paying such rates shall be exempted," &c. The word "shall" is used throughout. Therefore I cannot accede to the argument that it is optional with the commissioners to make a rate under this local Act or under the Public Health Act. The local Act was a compulsory Act. What, then, is the effect of the general Act upon the local Act? The appellant did not live within the town of Monmouth, and therefore was not liable to be rated under the local Act at all. Those who do live within the town of Monmouth and within the limits described on the plan are liable to be so rated. Then comes the Public Health Act 1872, which says, "All expenses incurred or payable by an urban sanitary authority under the Sanitary Acts shall. . . . if the Local Government Acts were not in force at or immediately before the passing of this Act, be defrayed as follows, that is to say:—In the case of the council of a borough, out of the borough fund or rate; in the case of improvement commissioners, out of any rate in the nature of a general district rate leviable by them as such commissioners throughout the whole of their districts" (s. 16). Now if the case stopped there, I should say that the rate in question was perfectly consistent with both the Public Health Acts and the local Act. But then the case does not stop there, because there is s. 67 of the local Act. Mr. Fitzgerald has argued that no rate being imposed under the local Act there is no exemption under s. 67. But that is rather begging the question, whether there ought not to be a rate made under the local Act. The appellant, however, not residing within the town, would not be rated under the local Act, and could not, therefore, claim to be directly exempted from this rate by sec. 67. But would it be right for us to hold that the commissioners are entitled to say, "We will not make a rate for town purposes under the local Act, as we might do, which you living outside the town would not be called upon to pay; but we will make a general rate for the borough under the Public Health Acts, so as to deprive you of the practical exemption from contributing to town purposes which the local Act conferred on you." It appears to me that that is just what they cannot do. The rate that they have made appears to me to be inconsistent with s. 67 of the local Act. I do not know that a great deal of assistance in answering the question submitted to us can be derived from cases; the difficulty here is not in the principle but in the application of it to the particular case. The Overseers of Walsall v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) is, however, strongly in favour of the view we have arrived at. This is an indirect attempt, no doubt, to repeal s. 67 of the local Act.

Judgment for the appellant.

Fitzgerald asked for leave to appeal.

GROVE, J. doubted whether they had power to give leave. It was stated that the question was pending in the Court of Appeal in the case of The Overseers of Walsall v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.)

The question as to leave to appeal was reserved till the decision of the Court of Appeal had been given in the Walsall case.

[Judgment was given in the Court of Appeal in the case of The Overseers of Walsall v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, on May 18, when Cockburn, C.J. and Brett, L.J. were of opinion that the court had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal; Bramwell and Cotton, L.J.J. were of a contrary opinion. The court being equally divided the appeal was dismissed.]

SMITH v. WEST DERBY LOCAL BOARD. (a)

Local board of health—Sewer authority—Liability for nonfeasance or misfeasance—Notice of action.

In 1874 a local board of health, who were both the highway authority and the sewer authority of the district, engaged a contractor to lay down a sewer in a road, the contractor to be responsible for any damage that might arise "from the execution of the works," and to maintain the road in repair for three months after the completion of the contract. The works were completed, and after the stipulated three months the local board assumed the control and repair of the road. Eight or nine months afterwards the plaintiff's horse sank into a hole twelve inches deep in the road above the sewer and was injured. The County Court judge found that the subsidence was due to the faulty filling up of the trench.

Held, that the local board were liable in their joint capacity as highway and sewer authority.

Seemingly, they were liable as the sewer authority. The notice of action required by statute claimed for damage caused "by the undermentioned matters and things done or omitted by you, your labourers, servants, or others. . . . For that you . . . negligently, carelessly, and improperly did leave a certain road or highway in an insufficient and improper state of repair."

Held, that this was a sufficient notice of action, though the wrong complained of was a misfeasance and not a nonfeasance merely.

APPEAL from the County Court of Lancashire. The following case was stated:—

This is an action for damages sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the defendants having (as the plaintiffs allege) negligently, carelessly, and improperly left a portion of a certain road or highway, which they were bound to maintain and repair, in an insufficient and improper state, whereby the plaintiff's horse sustained severe injuries.

The notice of action and the particulars of demand (annexed to the summons) are respectively as follows:

SMITH v. WEST DERBY LOCAL BOARD.

[C.P. Div.]

NOTICE OF ACTION.

To the local board of health in the parish or district of West Derby, in the county of Lancaster. Take notice that we, James Smith and John James, trading as James Smith and Company, of No. 9, Lord-street, Liverpool, wine merchants, and Thomas Goffey, attorney for the said James Smith and Company, and on their behalf, will on the expiration of one month from this date enter a plaint against you the said local board of health of West Derby, in the County Court of Lancashire holden at Liverpool, for the injury and damage caused to us by the undermentioned matters and things done or omitted by you and your labourers, servants, and others, acting under your orders and directions, at and upon a certain road or highway called Moss-road, in the parish of West Derby, to wit, for that you the said local board of health did, by yourselves, your labourers, servants and others, on or about the 13th May last, negligently, carelessly, and improperly leave a certain portion of the said road or highway in an insufficient and improper state of repair, whereby a horse belonging to us, the said James Smith and Company, while being lawfully driven upon and along the said road or highway, sank into the said road or highway and was thrown therein, and by reason of the said negligent, careless, or improper conduct was thrown down and severely injured, and permanently diminished in value, to the great injury and damage of us the said James Smith and Company. Further take notice, that Thomas Goffey, of 15, Lord-street, Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, is the name of our attorney in the cause of action aforesaid. Dated this 11th Oct. 1875.—JAMES SMITH and Co.

PARTICULARS OF DEMAND.

The plaintiffs claim 15l. for damages, which they have sustained by reason of the defendants, by themselves, their labourers, servants, and others, on or about the 13th May last, having negligently, carelessly, and improperly left a portion of the road or highway, which they were bound to maintain and repair, in an insufficient and improper state, whereby the plaintiffs' horse, being then lawfully driven upon and along the said road or highway, sustained severe injuries, and the plaintiffs lost the use of the said horse for a considerable time, and the profit which otherwise would have accrued from the same, and were put to considerable expense in veterinary surgeon's fees and otherwise.

The facts as proved may be shortly stated thus: By contract, dated the 9th March 1874, the defendants engaged a contractor to lay down in the road in question (which it is admitted was and is a road vested in the defendants) a sewer. The sewer was to be a pipe sewer, and the depth of the trench at the place where the accident occurred was to be about 10 feet. The contractor was to excavate, to lay the sewer, and to fill up the trench. All this under the directions and to the satisfaction of the defendants' engineer. The work was to be completed in three months, that is to say, before the 9th June 1874. The contractor was to be responsible for any damage to persons or property that might arise "from the execution of the works," and was to maintain the works and also such parts of the roadway as had been disturbed, in good order and repair for three months after completion.

The work during its progress—the excavation, the laying of the sewer, the filling up, and the restoration of the road—was carefully and daily inspected by the defendants' engineer, or by their surveyor of roads and sewers, and everything was done to their satisfaction.

The work was completed in May 1874, and the traffic was then turned on. Some little subsidence took place here and there from time to time, but this was attended to either by the contractor or (at his expense) by the defendants.

After the lapse of about three months, that is to say, just before the work was to be taken off the contractor's hands, the metalling of the trench was completed by levelling the rock and putting on the macadam. This was done either by the contractor or by the defendants at his expense; and it was done under the inspection of the defendants' surveyor of roads and sewers, and to his satisfaction. The traffic was then turned on again.

On the expiration of the three months or soon after, that is to say, in August or September 1874, the work (which still continued in a satisfactory state) was transferred to the defendants.

The defendants' surveyor continued to inspect or to pass over the road up to the time of the accident, and it was given in evidence that there was nothing a few hours previously to the accident to indicate that there was any defect whatever at the spot in question, that no intimation was received of anything of the kind, and that, so far as the surveyor was aware, no accident had taken place there or near there, either previously to the accident in question or since. There was on that road a considerable amount of traffic.

Since the transfer just mentioned the road was up to the time of the accident repaired in patches here and there from time to time, such repairs being effected by the laying on of a little macadam, but this was all.

In other respects the roadway was not disturbed in any way.

This then was the state of affairs when the accident took place, that is to say, on the 13th May 1875. It happened thus: The plaintiffs' horse (drawing a spring cart) was going along the road in question (Moss-lane) when its fore feet suddenly sank through a coating or crust of macadam into a cavity, and the horse stumbled forward and was injured.

On examining the cavity it was found to be about 12in. or 15in. deep.

How the subsidence was caused is not known. Neither the engineer nor the surveyor could at all account for it. The engineer stated that possibly it might have been caused by the floods which had occurred about the time of the accident; that such floods would affect more or less any foundation of rock and earth that had once been disturbed, and this even after the lapse of a considerable time. Both the engineer and surveyor were asked whether it could have been caused by any leakage in the sewer, and both (they having made careful examination with a view of ascertaining whether that was the cause) gave decided evidence that it could not; that the sewer was in perfect condition at the time of the accident, and had been so ever since.

At the hearing the plaintiffs' counsel contended that the defendants were liable, either as the highway authority or as the sewer authority, the act complained of amounting to more than a mere nonfeasance. On the other hand, the defendants' counsel contended that the defendants could not be liable under the circumstances as the sewer authority, that they had been guilty of no negligence, that the act complained of was at most a mere nonfeasance only; that if the defendants were liable at all it was as the highway authority, and that the act being, if anything, merely a nonfeasance and not a misfeasance, the defendants were not liable as the highway authority to an action; and their counsel relied upon the case of Gibson v. The Mayor &c. of Preston (and the cases there cited) and White v. The Hindley Local Board. See the argument infra.

Judgment was delivered by the County Court judge on the 27th Jan. 1876 in favour of the plaintiffs, the judge expressing his opinion that the subsidence of the road which caused the action was caused by the faulty filling up of the trench, and that the defendants, if not liable as the sewer authority, which he was inclined to think they were, were at any rate liable in their joint capacity of highway and sewer authority. The damage was assessed at 10l.

The defendants gave notice of appeal, alleging the following grounds:

1. That they had not as the sewer authority been guilty of any negligence in the excavation of the trench, the laying of the sewer, the filling up and restoration of the road, and the maintaining of that part of the road until the work was, according to the contract, taken off the contractor's hands—a period of eight or nine months before the accident took place.

2. That whatever liability accrued by reason of the excavation of the sewer work attached, according to the contract, to the contractor and not to the defendant.

3. That, assuming that any liability attached to the defendants as the sewer authority, such liability ceased at latest when the liability of the contractor ceased, that is to say, when the works were so transferred to the defendants, such transfer being made to them as the highway authority.

4. That on such transfer (if not before) the trench (then filled up) became a part of the road undistinguishable in its character from any other part, and could no longer be regarded as in any way connected with the sewer, or as vested in the defendants as the sewer authority, or as something for the maintenance of which they were liable as such authority.

5. That even assuming that the defendants were liable as the sewer authority, judgment ought not to be given against them in this action, inasmuch as the plaintiffs are confined, by their notice of action and their particulars of demand, to damages arising through non-repair of the highway.

6. That the defendants are not liable as the highway authority, there having been no negligence on their part as such, and no action being maintainable against them as such for simple non-repair.

7. That they are not guilty of negligence in any other capacity, and are not liable on any other ground.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:

1. Are the defendants liable in this action as the sewer authority?

2. Are they liable in this action as the highway authority?

3. Are they liable on any other ground?

The court may draw inferences of fact.

Baylis, Q.C. for the local board, the appellants. — The defendants are not liable as the sewer authority, the damage having resulted from the work done by the contractor. Where a contractor is employed to do an act not likely in itself to lead to injurious consequences, his employers are not liable for the result. Nor are they liable as the highway authority. Highway authorities, though they may be indicted, are not liable to an action for non-repair, being a nonfeasance only:

White v. Local Board of Hindley, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 400; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 219.

In Pendlebury v. Greenhalgh (33 L. T. Rep. 372; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 36), putting a heap of stones on the road and leaving it there was held a misfeasance, but leaving it by itself would be a nonfeasance. Secondly, the notice of action is insufficient. The notice is given in accordance with the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), sect. 139, and is only a notice of a claim for nonfeasance. It must be construed strictly, and cannot now be amended. Lastly, the finding of the County Court judge was not warranted by the evidence. He also cited

Parsons v. St. Mattheu, Bethnal Green, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211; L. Rep. 3 O. P. 56;

Gibson v. Mayor of Preston, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 298; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 218;

Gray v. Pullen, 5 B. & S. 970.

Cave, Q.C. for the respondent, was desired to confine himself to the point as to the notice of action. He cited, as to this,

Jones v. Bird, 5 B. & Ald. 887, and

Jones v. Nichols, 13 M. & W. 361.

GROVE, J.—I think the County Court judge was right, and the question submitted to us must be answered in that way. The first question is, whether the defendants are liable as the highway authority, or as the sewer authority. I am of opinion that they are at all events liable as the highway and sewer authority jointly, and if it is necessary to answer the question more specifically, I should say that they are liable as the sewer authority. The sewer itself was not the cause of the mischief, but it was essential to make a trench for the purpose of the sewer, and the defendants were bound to do it in a proper and sufficient manner. It is not necessary, however, to say that they were liable as the sewer authority alone. Here the two authorities are vested in them, giving them complete dominion both over the sewers and the highways. They are, therefore, the persons on whom the obligation of repairing both the sewer and the highway was imposed by statute, and may be regarded in these two capacities together. In my opinion, therefore, they are liable as the sewer authority; but, at all events, they must be liable in their joint capacity. The second question, whether they are liable in any other capacity, it is not necessary to answer. The third question argued was as to the notice. I have some doubt whether the question of the notice was really before the court on this special case, but on that point I am of opinion, at all events, that the notice was sufficient. The test which I suggested to Mr. Baylis is the test applied by Abbott, C.J. Such a notice is not to be construed in the same way as a plea. The rule of construction, indeed, may sometimes be more strict, but the object is different. The object of pleading is to convey to the other side a specific legal claim, which he may answer in a proper legal form; and therefore certain requirements have been made necessary by a long course of decisions, in order that issue may be properly joined. The object of notice of action, on the other hand, is to enable the party on whom it is served to examine the claim, and see if there are any grounds for the matter complained of, which to his mind the notice fairly comprehends; and if so,

C.P. Div.]

REG. v. WELLINGS.

to give him the opportunity of tendering amends if he thinks he is wrong. It must be sufficiently clear and explicit to bring to his mind what is the cause of complaint; and if so, that is a sufficient notice of action. In Jones v. Nichols (ubi sup.) Pollock, C.B. says: "I am disposed to think that this notice would be sufficient, even if construed with the strictness of a plea," showing that in his opinion it was not to be so construed. In Jones v. Bird (ubi sup.) it is said by Abbott, C.J. that a notice ought not to be construed with great strictness, its object being merely to inform the defendants substantially of the ground of the complaint, but not of the mode or manner in which the injury has been sustained. Both these cases show that a notice is not to be construed by the same rules as a pleading. Now, is this notice sufficient? It is said that a person might read this notice as a mere notice of action for non-repair. That I understand to mean the allowing a road to become in a bad state by the ordinary effect of time and weather, and similar causes; and therefore it is said that non-repair would not include any act, and would not draw the attention to any misfeasance at all. I think the notice, if reasonably read by a mind willing to understand it, is this, that the local board of health did by themselves, their labourers, or servants, negligently, carelessly, and improperly leave a certain portion of the highway in an insufficient and improper state of repair. That imports that labourers or servants had been employed in reference to the matter. Leaving in an insufficient state of repair means plainly that they did attempt to repair, but left it insufficiently repaired. Then it goes on, "whereby a horse belonging to the plaintiff, while upon the said road or highway, sank into the said road or highway, and was thrown." That tends to show some local cause or matter, not general wear and tear, but something like a hole or soft place in the road. I think that sufficiently brings the matter to the minds of the parties sued, if they desire to understand it. The cases support this view, showing that a notice is sufficient if it substantially indicates the cause of complaint. No case has been cited by the counsel for the appellants where the words are as clear and explicit as these, and have yet been held insufficient. The only remaining point relied on was that there was no reasonable evidence of negligence—negligence upon which a judge, acting as a jury, might proceed. We cannot go into a question of evidence, which is for the judge alone; but I think there were facts in evidence from which negligence might reasonably be inferred. There is enough to show that the work was done in an insufficient way, so that the water might wash away the subsoil and leave a hole—reasonable evidence from which to infer that that took place. I think I should have come to the same conclusion myself.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will not say anything as to the point of there being evidence of negligence, because I entirely agree with what has been expressed by my brother Grove; and the contention that the defendants were not liable at all was substantially given up in the argument. What was really attempted was to uphold a very special demurrer to this notice of action. Our attention has been called to the stringent words of the statute requiring notice of action, and it has been said that this notice of action discloses only a complaint for a mere act of omission. Looking at the words "done and left undone by you," and the expansion of these words which follows, I think that the notice, though capable of being applied to an act of omission, is also capable of being extended to an act of commission. It shows the defendants sufficiently what they have to meet. They had an opportunity of inquiring into the matter; and it therefore appears to me that it would be a mistake to allow a special demurrer like this to such a notice of action. The judgment of the County Court judge must be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

REG. v. WELLINGS. (a)

Evidence—Admissibility of deposition—Inability of witness to travel—Pregnancy.

It was proved that a witness who resided fifteen miles from the place of trial was in expectation of her confinement, and on the morning of the trial was unable to move about without considerable difficulty, and was then lying down and had been so for the greater part of the week, but able to get up for a few minutes at intervals, and that she thought her confinement might not take place until the middle of the following week, but might also occur at any hour. No medical evidence was given upon the subject.

The presiding judge having admitted her deposition before the committing magistrate on the ground that she was so ill as to be unable to travel within the meaning of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 17, this court upheld his decision.

CASE stated for the opinion of this Court by the Chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions.

At the Worcestershire adjourned Quarter Sessions, held on the 7th March 1878, the above-named prisoner Thomas Wellings (with one William Mallars, who pleaded guilty) was indicted and tried before me for unlawfully assaulting one Ann Pugh, with intent her feloniously to ravish and carnally know.

On the opening of the case the counsel for the prosecution applied to put in evidence the deposition of Ann Pugh, the principal witness, on the ground that she was so ill as to be unable to travel, being in daily and hourly expectation of her confinement.

In support of his application he called the husband of Ann Pugh, who proved that he resided with his wife fifteen miles distant from the place of trial, and that when he left his wife on that morning she was unable to move about without a considerable difficulty; that she was then lying down and had been so during the greater part of the past week, though able to get up for a few minutes at intervals. In answer to a question from me the husband stated that his wife thought her confinement might not take place until the middle of the following week, but might, she also thought, occur at any hour. No medical evidence was tendered.

The counsel for the prisoner objected that this was not such an illness as was contemplated by the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 17.

Acting upon what I considered my discretionary power I decided that the illness of Ann Pugh was such as came within the meaning of the statute, and that the foregoing evidence was sufficient to prove such illness, and her deposition was thereupon admitted.

The prisoner Thomas Wellings was found guilty, and was sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for eighteen calendar months, and he is now in the Worcester prison in execution of such sentence.

The question upon which I respectfully desire the opinion of the Court is, whether under the circumstances above stated the deposition of Ann Pugh was properly received in evidence.

G. W. HASTINGS, Chairman of the above Court of Quarter Sessions.

Selfe for the prisoner.—The deposition ought not to have been admitted in evidence. The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 17, enacts (inter alia) that if upon the trial of the accused it shall be proved "that any person whose deposition shall have been so taken is dead or so ill as not to be able to travel, and if it be also proved that such deposition was taken in the presence of the accused, and that he or his counsel or attorney had a full opportunity of cross-examining the witness, &c., it shall be lawful to read such deposition as evidence in such prosecution." This statutory power ought not to be extended further than it has already been. In this case the deponent was only fifteen miles away, and thought her confinement might not take place for a week. In Reg. v. Wilton (1 Fos. & Fin. 309), where Willes, J. admitted the deposition of a woman on the ground that she was ill and unable to attend, she having been, it was stated, delivered of a dead child, the learned judge said: "It must not be supposed that the fact of a woman having been delivered nine days ago constitutes an illness within the meaning of the statute; but we have it in evidence that she was delivered of a dead child, which would tend to produce a morbid state of body, and therefore I am of opinion her deposition may be read." And in Reg. v. Walker (1 Fos. & Fin. 534) the same learned judge said: "Illness from confinement is an ordinary state, and not such an illness as is contemplated by the statute. I have considered the question with my brother Crowder. If you find it necessary for your case to put in the deposition, I have made up my mind to reserve the question for the opinion of the judges. . . . I think it should be such an illness as will prevent a person from travelling." In Reg. v. Huddersfield (26 L. J. 169, M. C.) it was held that pregnancy was not such "sickness" as would prevent the removability of a pauper. In Reg. v. Parker and Ashworth (York Summer Assizes 1862), where it was proposed to put in the deposition of a married woman on the ground that she was pregnant, Mellor, J. said that the matter had been much considered by the Judges, and the general opinion of the bench was that inability to travel arising from pregnancy alone was not such an illness as was contemplated by the statute. No doubt, in Reg. v. Stephenson (9 Cox C. C. 156; 31 L. J. 147, M. C.) it was held that there might be incidents to the state of pregnancy which render a woman too ill to travel, and, as observed by Erle, C.J. in delivering the judgment, it was proved that the woman was daily expecting her confinement, and was poorly otherwise, and therefore too ill to travel. The distance in that case was twenty-five miles. In the present case no medical evidence was given, and the evidence was the simple facts stated in the case.

Godson for the prosecution.—The present case is precisely that of Reg. v. Stephenson, where it was decided that it is for the presiding judge at the trial to decide in his discretion, whether the evidence that the witness is too ill to travel is sufficient. [He was then stopped by the Court.]

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The question in this case is not whether the witness was ill or not, but whether "she was so ill as not to be able to travel" within the meaning of the statute, and I am of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed, and that the learned chairman at the trial properly admitted her deposition in evidence. We are all of opinion as matter of law that pregnancy may be, not that it must necessarily be, in any particular case, the source of such an illness as to bring a witness within the contemplation of the statute. Whether in the particular case the facts proved bring the witness within the statute it is for the presiding judge to decide. The presiding judge has here decided that this was a case within the Act, and we see no reason for saying that he has exercised his discretion wrongly.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. MORRIS ROBERTS. (a)

Perjury—Deputy County Court Judge—Evidence of appointment—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 111.

An indictment for perjury alleged the offence to have been committed before J. U., then being and sitting as the duly qualified and appointed deputy judge of the County Court of W. Proof was given that the perjury took place in the presence of J. U. at the County Court, and a certified minute, under the seal of the court, of the proceedings, was put in evidence, intitled "Minute of judgments, orders, and other proceedings, at a court holden at, &c., before J. U., deputy judge of the said court."

Held, that there was sufficient proof of J. U. acting as deputy judge, and therefore prima facie evidence of his appointment as such.

Held, also, per Lord Coleridge, O.J., that by the County Court Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 111, the minute of the proceedings being made evidence of the proceedings and their regularity, was evidence of the regularity of J. U.'s appointment.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of London.

The prisoner was tried before me on the 10th May inst. upon an indictment for perjury.

REG. v. MORRIS ROBERTS.

[CR. CAS. RES.]

The indictment alleged the offence to have been committed before "Joseph Underhill, Esq., then being and sitting as the duly qualified and appointed deputy judge of the County Court of Warwickshire."

A minute of the proceedings of the County Court was put in as evidence on the part of the prosecution, which was intitled as follows :

Minute of judgments, orders, and other proceedings at a court holden at Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, on the 13th Nov. 1877, before Joseph Underhill, Esq., sputy judge of the said court.

A certificate was written on the minute in these words :

We hereby certify that the above is a true copy of an entry in the minute book of judgments, orders, and other proceedings of the County Court of Warwickshire, holden at Birmingham.

Dated this 4th Dec. 1877.

JOHN COLB. } Registrars.
EDWIN PARRY }

The certificate bore the seal of the County Court.

Proof was also given that the alleged perjury took place in the presence of Mr. Underhill, at the County Court.

An objection was taken by the counsel for the prisoner that proof should have been given of the appointment of Mr. Underhill as deputy judge.

I overruled the objection and left the case to the jury, who convicted the prisoner; but upon the application of the prisoner's counsel I have reserved this case for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

Whether it was necessary that further or any proof of the authority of the presiding judge at the County Court beyond his acting in that capacity, and the production of the minute above mentioned should have been given.

The prisoner remains in gaol awaiting the decision of the court. (Signed) THOMAS CHAMBERS.

Jelf (Archibald with him) for the prisoner.—The conviction was wrong. There was no proof of the material fact that the person before whom the perjury was alleged to have been committed had authority to administer an oath. In other words, there was no sufficient proof of the appointment of the deputy judge. In 1 Hawk. P.C. bk. 1, c. 69, s. 4, it is said, "It seemeth clear that no oath whatsoever taken before persons acting merely in a private capacity, or before those who take upon them to administer oaths of a public nature without legal authority for their so doing; or before those who are legally authorised to administer some kind of oaths, but not those which happen to be taken before them; or even before those who take upon them to administer justice by virtue of an authority seemingly colourable, but in truth unwarranted and merely void, can ever amount to perjuries in the eye of the law, because they are of manner of force, but are altogether idle." The onus of proving the due appointment of the deputy judge was upon the prosecutor, and the minute produced was not sufficient evidence thereof. The County Court judge has the power of appointing a deputy by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 25, which enacts "that in case of illness or unavoidable absence, the cause whereof shall be entered on the minutes of the court, it shall be lawful for the judge, &c., to appoint some other person, &c." [LUSH, J.—If an appointment had been legally proved in other respects, would you contend that it was necessary to prove the "cause" thereof?] It would be necessary to prove some fact from which the cause might be presumed. In the present case the prosecution should have shown such an acting as deputy judge as to lead to the reasonable inference that the deputy was properly appointed. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In Berryman v. Wiss (4 T. Rep. 366), Buller, J. said that in the case of all peace officers, justices of the peace, constables, &c., it was sufficient to prove that they acted in those characters without producing their appointments.] All the cases go to show that there must be evidence, not that the person acted pro hac vice, but that he had acted in the same capacity on former occasions. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Would you contend that if perjury were committed before a County Court judge the first time he acted that his appointment should be formally proved? The 11th section of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, provides that the minutes, or a copy thereof, bearing the seal of the court, and purporting to be signed and certified as a true copy, shall be admitted in all courts and places as evidence of the proceedings and of the regularity of such proceedings.] The mere fact that a person has once acted in a public capacity is not sufficient proof that he has been regularly appointed. In Rees v. Verelet (3 Camp. 433) it appeared that Dr. Parson had acted as surrogate for twenty years, and that was held to be prima facie evidence only of his due appointment. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The once acting in a public capacity is sufficient to make a prima facie case that the person so acting is duly appointed: Wolton v. Gavin 16 Q. B. 48; 20 L. J. 73 Q. B.; Reg. v. Essex, Dears. & B. 369, 7 Cox C.O. 384.] The evidence in the present case is consistent with the fact that the barrister acting as deputy judge had been merely asked to act eo instante in the particular case without any written or proper appointment.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed. One of the best recognised principles of law, Omnia presumuntur esse rite et solemniter acta donec probetur in contrarium, is applicable to public officers acting in discharge of public duties. The mere acting in a public capacity is sufficient prima facie proof of the proper appointment; but it is only a prima facie presumption, and it is capable of being rebutted, and in the case of Rees v. Verelet that presumption was rebutted in fact, and the person who there had acted as surrogate for twenty years was proved to have been improperly appointed. The case of Rees v. Verelet is exceedingly like this; there the fact of Dr. Parson having acted as surrogate was held by Lord Ellenborough, C.J., to be sufficient prima facie evidence that he was duly appointed, and had competent authority to administer an oath, and for that proposition Rees v. Verelet was referred to as good law by Lord Campbell, C.J., in Wolton v. Gavin. But it was further shown in Rees v. Verelet that Dr. Parson had never been regularly appointed as surrogate, and Lord Ellenborough then held that the evidence that Dr. Parson was not duly appointed a surrogate could not be shut out, however long he might have acted in that capacity, and that the presumption arising from his acting only stood until the contrary was proved. That is an instructive case, as showing the true rule as to the prima facie presumption in such cases. It is laid down in all the text books as a recognised principle that a person acting in the capacity of a public officer is prima facie to be taken to be so, and that principle was adopted by Patteson, J. in Doe dem. Bowley v. Barnes, in 8 Q. B. 1043. In that case there was a demise by the churchwardens and overseers of some parish property, and the fact that they acted as churchwardens and overseers at the time of the demise was held to be sufficient prima facie proof for the purpose of an action of ejectment without proving their appointment. His Lordship then referred to the decision of Tindal, C.J. to the same effect in Reg. v. Newton (Car. & Kir. 469), and to Reg. v. Jones (2 Camp. 131). This objection, if it were good, would extend very widely, for, suppose perjury committed on the first time of acting in his office before a judge or a recorder, or a County Court judge, or any person who fills a responsible public position, would it lie on the prosecution to show the appointment of such an officer in the strictest possible way? Mr. Jelf has not satisfied me that it would, and no member of the court has any doubt that there is no ground for such a contention. But further the County Court Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 111, provides that a copy of the minutes of the court bearing the seal of the court shall be evidence of the proceedings of the court and of the regularity of such proceedings, and a copy of the minutes bearing the seal of the court was proved which showed that Mr. Underhill was acting as deputy judge of the court. The statute therefore makes this evidence of the regularity of the proceedings before him. The conviction will therefore be affirmed.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. GREATHEAD. (a)

False pretences—Indictment—Evidence—Cheque.

By means of a false wage-sheet the prisoner obtained from his master a cheque for the amount stated in the sheet to pay the men's wages. The cheque was informally drawn, and refused payment by the bank. The prisoner returned it to his master, telling him of the cause of its non-payment, and the master tore it up and gave another, which the prisoner cashed, and appropriated the difference between what was really due for wages and what was falsely stated to be due.

On an indictment charging prisoner with obtaining 8s. 6d., the actual sum appropriated by the prisoner, it was objected that the above evidence did not prove the charge, for that he had only obtained a valueless piece of paper.

Held, that the false pretence was a continuing one, and that the second valuable cheque was obtained thereby equally with the first, and that the charge was proved.

CASE stated for the opinion of this Court by the Chairman of the West Riding of Yorkshire Quarter Sessions.

The defendant William Greathead was tried at the adjourned general quarter sessions of the peace for the West Riding of Yorkshire, held at Wakefield, on the 12th April 1878, on an indictment charging him with obtaining certain moneys by false pretences from John Charles Collins, the prosecutor in the indictment mentioned.

The first count in the indictment alleged that the defendant unlawfully obtained on the 12th Jan. from the said John Charles Collins 8s. 6d. in money his property, with intent to defraud.

The second count alleged that the defendant unlawfully obtained on the 2nd Feb. from the said John Charles Collins 1l. in money his property, with intent to defraud.

On the trial it was proved that the prosecutor engaged the defendant as his foreman over workmen employed by the prosecutor, and it was his duty to keep an account of the work done by the several workmen (who were paid by time) and of the wages due to them, and on the Saturday of each week to lay before the prosecutor a wage-sheet, showing the names of the different workmen employed and the number of days each man had worked during the week, and the amounts due to them respectively, upon the production of which wage-sheet, and acting upon such wage-sheet as correct, the prosecutor paid the amount either by cash or by cheque upon his bankers.

On the Saturday of the week ending the 12th Jan. the defendant made out the usual wage-sheet and presented it to the prosecutor, in which sheet a workman of the name of Cookson was represented to have worked five and a half days and to be entitled to the sum of 1l. 3s. 9d., and another workman of the name of Wells was represented to have worked a like number of days and to be entitled to a like amount.

It was proved by the prosecutor that Cookson had worked only four and a half days in that week, and not five and a half days, and was entitled for work done in that week to the sum of 19s. 6d., and not 1l. 3s. 9d., as appeared by the wage sheet, and that Wells had also only worked four and a half days, and was also only entitled to 19s. 6d., and not 1l. 3s. 9d. as appeared by the wage-sheet, and that the total sum appearing by the wage-sheet for the week as 6l. 16s. 6d., included the two sums of 4s. 3d. respectively, being the difference between the before-mentioned two sums of 19s. 6d. and 1l. 3s. 9d., and that therefore the sum of 8s. 6d. was not due as appeared by the said wage-sheet.

The prosecutor, relying on the accuracy of the wage-sheet by the false pretence set out in the first count of the indictment, paid the total amount appearing due on the wage-sheet by a cheque, on his bankers, but on presentation for payment at the bank it was found that there was a material omission in the body of the cheque and the same was sent back to the prosecutor by the defendant and the defendant informed the prosecutor of the fact, whereupon the prosecutor tore up the cheque and gave another cheque to the defendant for the same amount in lieu of the first, which second cheque was presented by the defendant to the bank and duly honoured and cashed and the proceeds paid to the prisoner, who applied the 8s. 6d. to his own use, but properly disposed of the remainder.

There was no evidence of any further pretence at the time the defendant received the last-mentioned cheque. Unless the objection raised on behalf of the prisoner hereinafter set forth was valid there was ample evidence to go to the jury on the charge mentioned in the first count of the indictment.

Further evidence was given and facts proved in support of the second count of the indictment charging the defendant with obtaining a further sum by false pretences on the 2nd Feb., and it was not contended on behalf of the defendant that there was no evidence to go to the jury on that count.

At the close of the case for the prosecution it was objected by defendant's counsel that the evidence failed to support the first count of the indictment, on the ground that the whole matter was determined on the handing over the first cheque, and that instead of obtaining the sum of 8s. 6d. by false pretences the defendant had only obtained a piece of paper purporting to be a cheque of the value of 6l. 16s. 6d., which was of no value. And it was further contended that there was no evidence at the time of the defendant receiving the second cheque to show what was passing in the prosecutor's mind, as it might have been given to remedy the first cheque, and sustain the prosecutor's credit.

It was contended on behalf of the prosecution that there was a continuing pretence.

I overruled the objection of the defendant's counsel, but reserved the point and left the case to the jury.

The jury found a general verdict of guilty, and after it was objected that the verdict ought to have been entered upon the counts respectively, I sentenced the prisoner to four months imprisonment with hard labour. I agreed to admit him to bail, but bail was not forthcoming.

The question for the consideration of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved is whether on the above facts the conviction should be quashed.

HENRY LEATHAM, Chairman.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—The circumstances of this case are shortly these: The prisoner presented a false wage-sheet to his master, the prosecutor, and thereby got from him a cheque for the purpose of paying the men's wages as stated in the wage-sheet. He presented the cheque to the bank, and could not get it cashed, as there was a material omission in the body of it. The prisoner returned that cheque to the prosecutor and told him of the omission, and the prosecutor thereupon tore it up and drew another, which he gave to the prisoner. The prisoner cashed the second cheque and appropriated to his own use the difference between the actual amount of the wages and the amount falsely stated in the wage-sheet. Nothing was said by the prosecutor, but he merely substituted the good cheque for the informal one. Now, the good sense of the thing is, that the false pretence upon which the first cheque was given continued in force, and was the acting motive which influenced the prosecutor's mind in giving the second cheque. The conviction will therefore be affirmed.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. This was merely a substitution of a second cheque for the first, and it was given and obtained on the same false pretence as the first.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Feb. 5 and May 18, 1878.

REG. ON the prosecution of the LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY (resps.) v. THE OVERSEERS AND MAYOR OF THE BOROUGH OF WALSALL (apps.) (a)

Practice—Appeal against poor-rate—Case stated by sessions—Appeal to the Court of Appeal—Judicature Act 1873, s. 19.

Where a court of quarter sessions made an order on an appeal against a poor rate, subject to a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division,

Held, by Cockburn, C.J. and Brett, L.J., that no appeal lay from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division of the Court of Appeal;

Held, by Bramwell and Cotton, L.JJ., that an appeal lay.

APPEAL by the defendants, the overseers and mayor of the borough of Walsall, against the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, affirming an order of sessions and discharging a rule nisi, which had been obtained by the appellants, calling upon the London and North-Western Railway Company to show cause why the said order of sessions should not be quashed.

A poor-rate having been made on the London and North-Western Railway Company, they appealed against the rate to the court of quarter sessions for the borough of Walsall. The court of quarter sessions made an order in favour of the appellants from the rate (the London and North-Western Railway Company) subject to a special case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division. The case having been removed into the High Court of Justice by certiorari, the Queen's Bench Division gave judgment affirming the order of sessions, and the overseers and mayor of Walsall appealed.

Feb. 5.—Herschell, Q.C., and Anstie, for the appellants.—An appeal lies to this court by the express words of sect. 19 of the Judicature Act 1873, by which the court has jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order of the High Court of Justice, except in certain cases mentioned in the Act. Sect. 45 does not affect the right of appeal here, for special leave to appeal has been obtained. The way in which the case came before the Queen's Bench Division is practically an appeal; the certiorari is mere machinery to bring the case before the court. R. v. Overseers of Sutton Coldfield (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 840; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 153; 43 L. J. 57, Q. B.) illustrates the course of procedure. The jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench is an ancient jurisdiction, not governed by statute. Formerly the quarter sessions used to consult the judge of assize, but when this practice was found to be inconvenient the proceeding by certiorari to bring the case before the Court of Queen's Bench was adopted. The decision of the Queen's Bench

CT. OF APP.] LONDON & N.W. RAILWAY CO. (resps.) v. OVERSEERS, &C. OF WALSALL (apps.) [CT. OF APP.]

Division is a "judgment or order" within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Judicature Act 1873, for the divisional court does in form affirm or quash the order of quarter sessions. The order is that the order of the quarter sessions be affirmed. The quarter sessions decide subject to the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, and the order is brought up that the divisional court may deal with it, and affirm or quash it. Therefore the case is within sect. 19, and possibly also within sect. 45, of the Judicature Act 1873, and there is an appeal; if not there is no way of reviewing orders of quarter sessions. Even if the jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench was originally only consultative, it is no longer so, for they practically deal with the order of quarter sessions. This is not a "criminal cause or matter" within sect. 41 of the Judicature Act 1873. The Crown has no interest, and there is nothing criminal in the proceedings in substance, or even in form. This court has entertained an appeal in a case of quo warranto:

Reg. v. Collins, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 30.

The cases in which the section has been held to apply,

Reg. v. Steel, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 534; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 37; 46 L. J. 1, M. C.;

Reg. v. Fletcher, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 538; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 43; 46 L. J. 4, M. C., were proceedings on criminal charges.

Neville (Bosanquet with him) for the respondents.—This is not a "judgment or order" of the Queen's Bench Division within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Judicature Act 1873, but only an opinion: Reg. v. Ohantrill (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 305; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 587; 44 L. J. 167, M. C.), where the practice is fully explained in the judgment of the court delivered by Field, J. 5 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3 clearly contemplates that there should be no appeal, and sect. 20 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 59) shows that it was not the intention of the Legislature that an appeal should be given by the Judicature Act.

Herschell, Q.C. in reply.

Our. adv. vult.

May 18.—The following judgments were delivered:—

CORROX, L.J.—This is an appeal of the overseers of the poor of Walsall and of the corporation of Walsall against a rule of the Queen's Bench Division, made the 24th Nov. 1877, by which that court discharged a rule nisi, obtained by the appellants, calling upon the London and North-Western Railway Company to show cause why an order of sessions therein referred to should not be quashed, and whereby it was ordered that the order of sessions be affirmed. The first question and the only one now to be considered is whether this court has any jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, and, with all respect for the judgment of those who hold the opposite opinion, I am of opinion that it has. This depends on the 19th section of the Judicature Act 1873, taken in connection with the other provisions of that Act, and the amending Acts of 1875 and 1876. In construing the 19th section it must be remembered that under these Acts this court, while it has transferred to it by sect. 18 all the powers of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, has a very much more extensive jurisdiction than was ever possessed by that court. It is authorised to hear appeals from every division of the High Court, and it can and does hear appeals from orders refusing new trials, when the application for them is based on the ground of the verdict being against the weight of evidence, or of there being no evidence to support the verdict, and it can hear appeals from interlocutory orders made on matters of mere practice. Apparently it was intended by the Legislature to give this court the largest powers of hearing appeals, or rather to give to the suitor the amplest right of appeal. What then is the 19th section? This 19th section in terms gives an appeal from every judgment or order, save as thereafter mentioned, of the High Court, and by the interpretation clause "order" includes "rule." The first point is, what are the exceptions referred to? They appear to be criminal cases, in which there is no appeal save for some error of law apparent upon the record (sect. 47), orders by consent or as to costs (sect. 49), and cases where by Act of Parliament the decision of any court or judge, whose jurisdiction is transferred to the High Court of Justice, is to be final (Act of 1873, sect. 20). This case does not come within any of these exceptions, for it is not suggested that there is anything of a criminal nature in the case, and, although before the Judicature Acts there was no appeal in such cases as the present from the Court of Queen's Bench, it is not suggested that there is any Act of Parliament which makes the decision of the Queen's Bench in such cases final; and the necessity for the 20th section of the Act of 1876 shows what a large power of hearing appeals had, in the opinion of the Legislature, been granted to this court. That which is brought before us for review by the appellant is in form a rule or order of the Queen's Bench Division, discharging a rule nisi, and directing that the order of the sessions be affirmed. This, having regard to the interpretation clause, is an order of the Queen's Bench Division within the meaning of the 19th section, and it lies on those who contend that, though the case is not within any of the exceptions mentioned in sect. 19, there is no appeal, to make out their case. How is it shown that it is not within our jurisdiction to entertain the appeal? As I understand, the argument was that, as the case is one as to the amount of rate to be charged on the railway company the decision of the matter is under Act of Parliament given to the quarter sessions, and that they are finally to decide the matter, without appeal from their decision, and that the order of the Queen's Bench is a mere statement of opinion on which the sessions will act, and it is therefore not subject to appeal. I acquiesce in the view that the litigants as to the validity and amount of the rate cannot, as of right, appeal from the decision of the sessions, and cannot insist on the decision of the sessions being in any way reviewed. But in the present case the sessions have stated a case, and the question for us is, not whether there is an appeal from the judgment of the sessions, but whether the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division expressed by the rule appealed from is not open to review. The case of Reg. v. Ohantrill (L. Rep. 10 Q. B., p. 587) is an authority that the power of the Queen's Bench to entertain the case, even on the submission of the sessions, depends on the court having power to issue a writ of certiorari to bring the case before it. In that case Field, J., delivering the judgment of the court, consisting of himself and Blackburn, J., says,

[CT. OF APP.] LONDON & N.W. RAILWAY Co. (resps.) v. OVERSEERS, & CO. OF WALSHALL (apps.) [CT. OF APP.]

"The question whether a case was one of difficulty or not, fit to be reserved for the court, was to be determined by the sessions, and not by the parties. But if they found it one of difficulty, and stated a case for the opinion of the court, then it became necessary that a certiorari should issue to bring that case before the court, that being the only mode by which the order could be brought into the court having jurisdiction to quash or confirm it." In that case the justices had convicted, subject to a case for the opinion of the court, but as the Act under which the conviction was made expressly enacted that convictions under it should not be quashed for errors in form, or be removed by certiorari, the court held that, even though a case had been stated by the justices, they could not entertain the question. In a case where the Queen's Bench Division has without any submission of the sessions, power to issue, and has issued, a writ of certiorari, any order made by the court in a matter not within the exceptions above referred to would be subject to an appeal to this court. In my opinion there is no sufficient reason why an order, which can only be made by this court in cases where it has power to issue a certiorari, should not be subject to appeal because the submission of the sessions has enabled the court to issue the writ. But it is argued that if the court should differ from the Court of Queen's Bench this court has no power to compel the sessions to obey any order made on the appeal. It does not appear that the Queen's Bench could enforce obedience to its opinion, if opinion only. All it could do would be to quash or affirm the order of sessions, and if in fact for the purpose of expressing its opinion it makes an order to quash the order of sessions, I see no reason why this court should not do so on appeal, as it has power to make such order as the court appealed from ought to have made. Neither, in my opinion, is it a sufficient argument against the right of appeal that the operative order as regards the rate must be that of the sessions. In many cases on appeal to the House of Lords from the Court of Chancery, it was the practice of the House of Lords to remit the case to the court below with a direction as to the rights of parties, and in cases where it was necessary to enforce an order of the House of Lords, made on appeal from the Court of Chancery, it was the practice for the purpose of enforcing the order of the House of Lords to make it an order of the Court of Chancery. The case then stands thus: In some way not explained a practice now well established has grown up, under which the sessions give their judgment in these cases subject to a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench. The writ of certiorari is then issued for the purpose of bringing the matter before that court, which gives its opinion, not, as was the practice on cases sent by the Court of Chancery for the opinion of common law courts, by the certificate signed by the judges who heard the case argued, but by a rule or order. This rule is within the express terms of the 19th section of the Act of 1873, and in my opinion there is no sufficient reason for saying that it is not under the section subject to appeal. I have not adverted to sect. 45 of the Act of 1873. It has not been shown that in any case there is what can strictly be called an appeal from petty or quarter sessions to the High Court, though it has been suggested that there are or may be such cases. If there are not, then on the fair construction of that section, it must in my opinion be taken to apply to cases like the present, where, though in form there is no appeal from the sessions, there is in substance a review of their decision. In my opinion the court is, under sect. 19 of the Act of 1873, bound to hear this appeal.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of opinion that an appeal lies in this case. The Lord Chief Justice has favoured me with his judgment, and I agree with nearly, if not all, that he has written. There is no original jurisdiction in the Queen's Bench as to poor law matters. Appeal is the creature of statute. The sessions need not state a case for the opinion of the court. It is a case for its opinion. To my mind these considerations do not solve the question. At the outside they present considerations tending one way only. It is necessary to look at those that tend the other way. I will proceed to state them. The Judicature Act intended as a rule of all but universal application that there should be an appeal from the High Court to the Court of Appeal in every case where the High Court had given a judgment, order, or decision. The one exception is of criminal matters, which were not the subject of error. This exception shows that everything else was intended to be appealable. I think an appeal would lie even without the enactment in sect. 45, though it would to my mind be more doubtful than it is with that section. For it might be said that the opinion or advice asked by the sessions and given was not a judgment or order within sect. 19. I think it would be. I propose, however, to examine the question in connection with that section. We start with this, that proceedings on the Crown side of the division are as a rule the subject of appeal. Then sect. 45 of the original Judicature Act says: "All appeals from petty or quarter sessions," which might have been brought to any court or judge, may be heard before a new court, and the determination thereof shall be final, unless special leave to appeal" is given by such court, &c. This section, therefore, contemplates that there was an "appeal" from quarter sessions to one of the courts whose jurisdiction is transferred, and that from the decision on that appeal there may be a further appeal to the Court of Appeal. Now what appeals were there from quarter sessions? I speak with reserve, because I have no familiarity with the matter. I believe that there is no appeal, strictly so called, nor indeed anything in the nature of an appeal from quarter sessions given by statute to the Queen's Bench; that the jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench was always, and still is, exercised by certiorari under powers of the common law—a jurisdiction not limited to quarter sessions, but extending to other cases where orders are made by courts or bodies having judicial powers. On the Queen's Bench being informed that there is invalidity in the proceedings of the inferior court on the face of them, not an error of decision, but a want of authority, or excess, a certiorari issues, and on the order being brought up, it is quashed if the objection is sustained; if not sustained, it remains in force, and a procedendo issues. This no doubt is not what a lawyer speaking strictly would call an "appeal." But practically it is an appeal; it is so called even by lawyers when speaking gravely of the subject, and undoubtedly it would be a difficulty to make anyone not a lawyer understand why "appeal" was not the right word. But assuming it not to be, it is a rule of law and good sense that where you have words used which have no application in their primary or strict sense, you must, if you can, apply them in a secondary or popular sense. And, therefore, if there is nothing that can be strictly called an appeal from quarter sessions, nor anything that can in any way be so called, except proceeding by certiorari, which in substance are appeals, the Legislature must be taken to have meant them. Still, I admit that if the enactment is of impossible application it must be disregarded. But is it? Let us examine the matter. I repeat, I speak with reserve. But, as I understand, where an order of quarter sessions is brought up on certiorari, and it is proposed to quash it, a rule for that purpose is obtained, and made absolute or discharged. I refer to where there is no case stated, but where a defect on the face of the order is alleged to exist. It must be admitted that there is no difficulty in applying the statute to such a case. Is there where there is no defect on the face of the proceedings unless the special case is referred to? I see none. No doubt the origin of the matter was as the Lord Chief Justice mentions in his judgment. No doubt it was a contrivance to get the opinion of the Queen's Bench. No doubt it was an opinion asked for which the sessions might have disregarded, but has not this mos pro lege become lex? The procedure is the same as when a defect on the face of the proceedings is relied on, except that a rule nisi is taken as granted. Has not the Legislature said if the sessions want the opinion of Queen's Bench they must seek it, subject to that opinion being revised by the Court of Appeal? If they can disregard the opinion of the Queen's Bench, so they can that of the Court of Appeal; if they do not choose to ask it subject to revision, they can still refuse to do so. Is it to be supposed that where a case is granted and stated, and there is also an alleged defect on the face of the proceedings independently of the case stated, the Court of Appeal may examine the latter and not the former matter? Or is it said that appeal lies where there is a defect on the face of the proceedings, but not where a case is stated? On the substance of the matter I cannot see why there should not be an appeal in these cases. They continually involve questions of the utmost importance. As to the expense, with all submission be it said, the Legislature, which has passed a law that has given a power to make the trumpery appeals that are made, was not likely to be deterred by that consideration in these sessions cases, in which thousands are often at stake, especially as there must be leave to appeal. I ought to mention one matter which tells against the appeal possibly, viz., that in some cases the order of sessions is neither quashed nor affirmed, but sent back with a direction or opinion. But if we look at the substance of the matter it is equally a decision, as much as a direction for a new trial, which is no judgment on the case. I am of opinion that even if we cannot consider the question arising on the case stated, we have jurisdiction to hear the appeal, and that our judgment should be that it be dismissed, because the judgment below is right as far as we have power to examine it.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, affirming the order of the court of quarter sessions for the borough of Walsall, on an appeal against a poor-rate made on the respondents (that is, the appellants from the rate, the London and North-Western Railway Company). The question with which in the present stage of this appeal we are alone concerned is whether this court has any appellate jurisdiction to review a decision of the Queen's Bench Division in the matter of a poor rate. I am of opinion that it has not. It is true that by the 19th section of the original Judicature Act it is enacted that the Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any "judgment or order" of the High Court of Justice, or of any judges or judge thereof. The fallacy in the reasoning which seeks to apply this enactment to the decision of the Queen's Bench Division in the matter of a poor rate consists in treating such decision as a "judgment or order" within the meaning of this section. To see this it is, as it seems to me, only necessary to examine in what the jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench Division in the matter of an appeal against a poor rate—if it can be properly called jurisdiction—consists, and how it arises. It is familiar knowledge that in matters relating to the maintenance of the poor, the Court of Queen's Bench has never, from the first establishment of the poor law, had jurisdiction, either as a court of first instance, or as a Court of Appeal, except, as regards the latter, as far as the court of quarter sessions has, of its own free will and mere motion, submitted its judgment to the opinion of the court. And the reason is plain. By the statutes by which provision is made for the maintenance of the poor the jurisdiction over matters connected with it is vested exclusively in justices of peace in petty sessions in the first instance, and in justices in quarter sessions on appeal. Of this the language of the statutes admits of no doubt whatsoever. By the 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 6, it is enacted: "That if any person or persons shall find themselves grieved with any cess, or tax, or other act done by the said churchwardens and other persons, or by the said justices of peace, that then it shall be lawful for the justices of the peace at their general quarter sessions, or the greater number of them, to take such order therein as to them shall be thought convenient, and the same to conclude and bind all the said parties." By a later Act, the 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4, it is enacted: "That in case any person or persons shall find him, her, or themselves aggrieved by any rate or assessment made for the relief of the poor, or shall have any material objection to any person or persons being put on or left out of such rate or assessment, or to the sum charged on any person or persons therein, or shall have any material objection to such account as aforesaid, or any part thereof, or shall find him, her, or themselves aggrieved by any neglect, act, or thing done or omitted by the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, or by any of His Majesty's justices of the peace, it shall and may be lawful for such person or persons, in any of the cases aforesaid, giving reasonable notice to the churchwardens or overseers of the poor of the parish, township, or place, to appeal to the next general or quarter sessions of the peace for the county, riding, division, corporation, or franchise where such parish, township, or place lies; and the justices of the peace there assembled are hereby authorised and required to receive such appeal, and to hear and finally determine the same." In like manner by the Act of 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12, by which the law of settlement was established, the appeal given to any persons who think themselves aggrieved by orders of removal is to "the justices at quarter sessions, who are required to do them justice according to the merits of the case." No ulterior appeal is given to any other court. Exclusive jurisdiction being thus given to the justices in petty sessions in the first instance, and to the quarter sessions on appeal, it has been long settled that when once this jurisdiction of the Court of Quarter Sessions on appeal has been exercised, the Court of Queen's Bench has never had, and the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, which has taken its place, therefore cannot have any authority whatsoever, except when put in motion by the sessions. If, indeed, the court of quarter sessions refuses to exercise jurisdiction when it has it, the Court of Queen's Bench will by mandamus compel that court to hear and determine, in the same manner as it will prevent all other inferior courts from declining jurisdiction where it exists, and so refusing to do justice. But if the jurisdiction has once been exercised, however erroneous the decision, if the order of the quarter sessions be regular on the face of it, so that it appears therefrom that the order of the quarter sessions is within its jurisdiction and competency, the absence of which alone gives occasion to the interference of the Superior Court, the Court of Queen's Bench has from the earliest time declared itself incompetent to interfere, the simple reason being, as has been again and again held, that it has no appellate jurisdiction over the court of quarter sessions in matters which are within the proper jurisdiction of the latter, which an appeal against a poor rate undoubtedly is. Conclusive authority for this position is to be found in the following cases: In Rea v. Justices of Monmouthshire (4 B. & C. 844) the sessions on an appeal against an order of removal being equally divided as to the merits of the appeal, but being of opinion that the respondents ought to have proved the forty days' residence, but had not done so, quashed the order. A mandamus to compel them to re-hear the case having been applied for, the rule was discharged. Abbott, C.J. says: "I think the rule for a mandamus ought to be discharged. It appears that in this case the sessions have given their judgment. This court is not a court of error from that court. It may compel the sessions to proceed to hear and decide the appeal; but when they have so determined it this court cannot compel them to correct their judgment, if it appear to be erroneous. It is unnecessary to say whether the judgment pronounced by the sessions is erroneous, because we are of opinion that if it were so we have no authority to compel them to correct it." In a subsequent case of Rea v. Justices of Monmouthshire (8 B. & C. 137) the court of quarter sessions had been equally divided, but the equality had arisen from an interested justice having taken part in the decision. The court being thus divided, an order was entered for adjourning the appeal. A certiorari having been applied for to bring up the order for adjournment with a view to quash it as a nullity, inasmuch as the vote of the interested justice ought not to have had any effect, the rule was discharged. Lord Tenterden says: "It is contended that, though the justices were divided in point of fact, in point of law the vote given by the party interested was a nullity, and that the sessions ought to have quashed the order. The late decisions establish that we cannot assume to ourselves the jurisdiction of a court of error, and review the judgment of the sessions. It is said that the sessions had not jurisdiction to make the adjournment. It is clear they had jurisdiction to make any order concerning the appeal, and, among others, the order that the hearing should be adjourned. Here a judgment has been pronounced by the sessions relating to a matter over which the court had jurisdiction; and, assuming their judgment to be erroneous, I think we have not jurisdiction as a court of error to review it." Even where a judgment had been entered by mistake, owing to miscalculation of the votes, the Court of Queen's Bench refused to interfere. Lord Ellenborough, after pointing out that, on discovery of the mistake, application to correct it should have been made to the court of quarter sessions itself while still sitting, says: "No step of the sort was taken, but judgment was entered; and this court cannot, in order to supply a remedy, exercise a jurisdiction which does not belong to it:" (Rea v. Justices of Leicestershire, 1 M. & S. 442.) It has been settled since the cases of R. v. Oulton (1 Burrow S. C. 64) and Reg. v. Preston-on-the-Hill (1b. 77) that a bill of exceptions does not lie from the judgment of a court of quarter sessions. In the latter case Lord Hardwicke, C.J. says: "This is a case of great consequence, and there may be very great inconveniences on either side. It hath been much wished that a bill of exceptions would lie to the justices at their sessions, because otherwise it may sometimes happen that they may determine in an arbitrary manner, contrary to the resolutions of the courts of law. For if the justices will not state the facts specially, though requested to do so, when the matter is doubtful, this is very blameable conduct in them, and it is to be wished that it might be avoided. On the other hand, there may be very great inconveniences arising from the abuse of bills of exceptions; and this matter for the settlement of the poor, which ought to be rendered cheap and speedy, may by such means be rendered dilatory, expensive, and burdensome." The reporter adds that "after the full hearing of the arguments on both sides the court were unanimous of opinion that a bill of exceptions doth not lie to the quarter sessions." Nevertheless, though it is thus clear, on reference to the statutes and the authorities, that the Court of Queen's Bench has no appellate jurisdiction, properly so called, in these matters, a practice became established, according to which the courts of quarter sessions in cases of difficulty submitted their judgment to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, and either affirmed or quashed the orders appealed against according to its decision. Let us see what is the legal effect of the course thus adopted. The origin of this practice is matter of history. A full account of it is to be found in the learned judgment of Field, J. in the case of Reg. v. Chantrell (L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 587.) In remote times the jurisdiction of justices, as given by the commission of the peace, the terms of which are set forth in

CT. OF APP.] LONDON & N.W. RAILWAY Co. (apps.) v. OVERSEERS, &c. OF WALSALL (apps.) [CT. OF APP.]

Dalton's Justice of the Peace, was subject to this proviso: "If a case of difficulty upon any of the premises before you, or any two of you, shall happen to arise, then let judgment in no wise be given thereupon before you, or any two of you, unless in the presence of one of our justices of either bench, or of one of our justices appointed to hold the assizes in the county." "This," observes Field, J., "not only empowers but requires the justices, in any case of difficulty, to obtain the opinion of a judge; and, by implication, requires the judge to give his opinion." There is, however, nothing in this provision which makes it obligatory on the justices to adopt the opinion of the judge; still less which enables the judge to pronounce an effective judgment independently of the justices. Accordingly, when called upon to decide an appeal as to the validity of orders made in parish matters, and in so doing to decide difficult questions of law on the construction of ill-drawn statutes, the courts of quarter sessions in cases of difficulty took the course of adjourning their decision till they had sought the advice of the judges of assize on the points or points of law which had arisen. Having obtained it they entered their judgment accordingly. This practice being, however, attended with some inconvenience, as the judges of assize would not, generally speaking, have time to attend to such matters, so as to afford them sufficient consideration, a practice by degrees arose, suggested in all probability in the first instance by the judges of assize themselves, of resorting to the Court of King's Bench for its advice on the law as applicable to the facts—these being stated, as found by the sessions, in the form of a special case. This practice is, however, comparatively of modern origin. As late as the 11th Will. 3, Lord Holt and the Court of King's Bench refused to hear a case which had been reserved for their opinion by a court of quarter sessions, and remitted it to the judge of assize (Anon. 2 Salk. 486). In the time of Lord Hardwicke the modern practice prevailed, but had not entirely superseded the old: (E. v. Tedford (Burrow S. C. 57)). The order of sessions as there stated recites that a case had been stated for the judges of assize, but that the judges of assize had not had time to hear and determine it. At a later period all traces of the old practice had disappeared, no doubt owing to the greater convenience of the modern. In the practice which thus became established, two singular anomalies arose. In the first place the justices, though bound in all cases of difficulty to consult judicial authority, constituted themselves the sole judges of the cases in which such difficulty occurred; while, as there was under the statutes no appeal from their decision to the Court of King's Bench, there was no power in the latter court to compel them to state a case for its opinion. It is true that there is inherent in the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench authority to bring before it by writ of certiorari, save where the writ is taken away by statutory enactment or charter, the proceedings of any court of inferior jurisdiction, with a view to quash such proceedings. But this applies only where there is some defect of jurisdiction or informality, or defect apparent on the face of the proceedings. The court cannot—and this must be carefully borne in mind—give itself appellate jurisdiction through the writ of certiorari where it otherwise possesses none. "The writ of certiorari," say the Court of Queen's Bench in E. v. Mosley (2 Burrow, 1040), "does not go to try the merits of the question, but to see whether the limited jurisdiction have exceeded their bounds." It would be a mistake to suppose that, because the order of sessions is brought before the court by certiorari, the court thereby acquires appellate jurisdiction. That this is so plainly appears from the undoubted fact that a party complaining of a wrongful decision of the sessions in respect of law or fact—so long as the proceedings have been regular and formal—could not on application to the Court of Queen's Bench obtain a writ of certiorari to bring up the order of quarter sessions for the purpose of its being considered on the merits. The case is in truth altogether an anomaly. In every other case the writ of certiorari is issued at the instance of the party aggrieved, and on a prima facie case being shown of some ground why the proceeding in the inferior court should be set aside. Here, without any ground being shown or alleged, and not at the instance of the parties, save as matter of form, but in reality at the instance of the sessions with a view to obtain the opinion of the court, the writ issues solely for the purpose of bringing the proceedings before the court, such being the only means of doing so, there being no power of appeal. The law is correctly stated in Corner's Crown Practice, p. 66, and is fully borne out by the authorities there referred to: "Upon an order of quarter sessions made subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on a case stated, and removed by certiorari, the court will consider and determine any matter of law arising upon the facts found by the sessions, and stated in the case upon which their opinion may be asked; but if no case be stated for their opinion, the court will not upon certiorari inquire further than whether the justices have acted within their jurisdiction, and whether their proceedings are regular on the face of them, although their judgment on the facts of the case may appear to have been erroneous." In the second place, though the justices were directed to have recourse to judicial assistance before pronouncing judgment, they here took, and were allowed to take, the opposite course, namely, of first pronouncing their judgment, and then applying to the court for its opinion. But here, inasmuch as there being no appeal from the judgment of the quarter sessions, or controlling power in the Court of King's Bench, the judgment of the quarter sessions, if once unconditionally pronounced, would have been final and conclusive, in order to avoid this consequence, and at the same time to prevent the necessity of the case being sent back to the sessions when the Court of King's Bench had pronounced its opinion, the practice became established for the court of quarter sessions to pronounce its judgment conditionally, making it subject to the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, according to which the judgment of the sessions was to be affirmed or quashed, as the case might be. In furtherance of this course of proceeding, the order of sessions not being before it, and there being, as I have said, no other way by which the case stated by the sessions could be brought before it, the Court of King's Bench lent the assistance of its process by way of certiorari to bring up the order and case, that the court might deal with it. Nothing can be better settled than that it is entirely at the discretion of the sessions whether to grant a case, and so to submit their judgment to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, or not. Even though the appeal should be one in which in the proper exercise of their discretion they ought undoubtedly to grant a case, but refuse to do so, there are no means of compelling them to state a case in order that their judgment may be reviewed; still less of compelling them to review it themselves. The decision of Lord Hardwicke and the Court of King's Bench in the cases of B. v. Oulton and B. v. Preston-on-the-Hill, has never been questioned, and is undoubted law. And the reason is obvious. A poor-rate, like an order of removal, is made under statutory power. As has been shown, the right of appeal given by the statutes to a party aggrieved is to the quarter sessions; and jurisdiction is given to that court to entertain and give judgment on such appeals, either by affirming or quashing the order appealed against; but no ulterior right of appeal is given. The appeal lies to the court of quarter sessions alone. The jurisdiction of the latter is absolute and final, and independent of that of any other court. No other court, not even the highest in the realm, has, under the statutes just referred to, any power to reverse or to interfere with the judgments of a court of quarter sessions when once pronounced. One more observation remains to be made with reference to the jurisdiction of the quarter sessions, but it is a most important one. A court upon which is imposed by Act of Parliament the duty of adjudicating in a particular matter between litigant parties cannot, unless authorised so to do as part of its statutory power, transfer or delegate to another the whole or any portion of its jurisdiction, or give to the decisions of such other court any binding force in law. In this exceptional and anomalous instance a practice—a sort of mos pro lege—has grown up of the court of quarter sessions making its judgment depend upon the opinion to be pronounced by the Court of Queen's Bench. But the ultimate judgment must still be considered as that of the sessions, whatever may be the form it assumes. For the right of appeal, which is the creature of the statute, is to the sessions alone; the jurisdiction is given to the quarter sessions alone, without any ulterior appellate power being conferred on the Queen's Bench Division, or being capable of being transferred to it by the court of quarter sessions. If therefore the decision in such a case as the present were to be taken to be in point of law the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, it would manifestly involve a usurpation of authority in the latter directly in the teeth of the statutes, which have in express terms enacted that the decision of the court of quarter sessions shall be final. What takes place on the hearing in the divisional court is quite consistent with this view. All that is done on the decision of the divisional court being pronounced is, that an entry is made in the master's book that the rule has been made absolute to affirm or quash the order of quarter sessions as the case may be, and a rule is drawn up accordingly, and a copy of it sent to the clerk of the peace for the information of the quarter sessions, and is copied by him into the minute-book of their proceedings. No instance has occurred in which the parties to the original order have failed to act on the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, nor does it appear clear what means could be resorted to to compel obedience if necessary, the court not having by the statute either original or appellate jurisdiction over the subject-matter. It thus appearing that in the matter of a poor-rate, or of an order of removal, the ancient Court of Queen's Bench had not, and consequently the present Queen's Bench Division of the High Court has not, any original or any appellate jurisdiction, what then is the jurisdiction which it now exercises in these matters? I answer, consultative only. It directs the court of quarter sessions as to the law applicable to the facts stated in the special case. It supplies the conditions according to which the judgment of the quarter sessions is to stand or fall—that judgment being that the order appealed against shall be affirmed or quashed as the case may be, according to what shall be the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division. The intermediate decision is that of the Queen's Bench Division. The ultimate judgment is that of the court in whom the jurisdiction is alone vested by the statute which creates the appeal, and by which court alone in legal theory it can be exercised. The divisional court has no authority whatever to pronounce any judgment whatsoever, the authority so to do being vested by the statutes in the court of quarter sessions alone; and the judgment is therefore of necessity that of the court to which alone the appellate jurisdiction belongs. Hence arises the form in which the matter is submitted to the court—not in that of a judgment of the quarter sessions, to be affirmed or reversed by a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, but in that of a judgment which shall be capable of being moulded into an affirmative or negative one according to the "opinion" which the court shall pronounce to be the right one. And the form is not unimportant; it is that the judgment shall be affirmed or reversed according to—not the judgment or decision, but—the "opinion" of the Queen's Bench Division. Nor could it be otherwise. For, the ultimate appeal being by the express provision of the statute in the court of quarter sessions, and the latter having no statutory authority to delegate any part of its jurisdiction, the Court of Queen's Bench could not possibly have or exercise an appellate jurisdiction which should have proprio vigore the force of law. It would be, as has been pointed out, a manifest usurpation on its part to assume it. In cases stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 the law is altogether different. There the magistrate is under certain circumstances bound to state a case; and by the 6th section of the Act authority is expressly given to the court, on a case submitted to it by a magistrate, to "reverse, affirm, or amend" the conviction appealed against. Nothing of the kind exists where a case is stated by the quarter sessions for the opinion of the court on an appeal against a poor rate or an order of removal. But although no appellate jurisdiction is given directly or indirectly by the statute to the Court of Queen's Bench, and no authority is given to the court of quarter sessions to delegate its appellate authority to the former, beyond that of submitting to its opinion as to what the judgment of the court of quarter sessions should be, let us for the sake of argument suppose that the sessions can and do delegate their appellate jurisdiction to the Superior Court by submitting the facts for its judgment as to the law. How can this operate so as to have the effect of involving a further submission to the decision of a third court, which is not the divisional court, because such court may have in general appellate jurisdiction over orders and judgments of the Queen's Bench Division, and thus have the effect of extending the submission without the assent of the court of quarter sessions? To grant or refuse a case is, as we have seen, in the uncontrolled discretion of the quarter sessions. They have given their judgment subject to the opinion of the divisional court on the case which they thought proper to grant. By that opinion their judgment is to stand or fall. But how will it do so if the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division shall be reversed by the decision of this court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, a jurisdiction in respect of this class of cases hitherto unknown and unheard of? How in that event could it be said that the order, which was to be affirmed or quashed (as the case might be), according as the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division might be one way or the other, was rendered valid or invalid in conformity to the opinion of that court, if its decision is reversed? A decision reversed becomes a nullity. The judgment of a Court of Appeal, reversing that of a court appealed from, is not the judgment of the latter court, but of the former. How, then, will the judgment of this court, should it differ from that of the divisional court, satisfy the condition on which the judgment of the quarter sessions—who have plenary and exclusive jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and can make their submission to the Queen's Bench Division subject to such conditions as they think proper, and who have here submitted their judgment to the Queen's Bench Division, and not to any other court, is—by the express terms of the submission, to depend? Can the terms of the submission be thus, without any assent on the part of the court of quarter sessions, enlarged, so as to give authority to this court, which assuredly is not that of the Queen's Bench Division? And this brings me to the consideration of the question on still broader grounds. The primary purpose and intention of the Legislature in creating the present Court of Appeal was, I apprehend, to transfer to it the appellate jurisdiction heretofore vested in the Court of Exchequer Chamber. In doing so, however, it has, it is true, used terms so large as to embrace, according to the decision of this court, judgments and orders in matters of mere procedure, as to which no appeal from the divisional court previously existed. But I cannot think it can have been the intention that the terms used should apply to cases in which there was no inherent jurisdiction in a divisional court, and which were not involved in the advance to some final judgment from which an appeal lay. It cannot have been intended, however general may be the terms of the section, to make, as it were by a side-wind, parochial rates and orders of removal matters which before were not the subjects of appeal, and could not be taken beyond the divisional court, liable to be brought before this court, and consequently to be taken on a further appeal to the House of Lords, with all the expense attending on such an ultimate appeal, thus involving the inconvenience which, as was pointed out by Lord Hardwicke in Res v. Preston-on-the-

Hill, would result from rendering "dilatatory, expensive, and burdensome" matters relating to the maintenance of the poor, which, as he observed, "should be cheap and speedy." The spirit of the present legislation is, I think, apparent from the provision introduced into the Act of 1876, by the 20th section of which, lest the general words of the 19th section of the Act of 1873 should have too extensive an operation, it is expressly provided that "where, by Act of Parliament, it is provided that the decision of any court or judge, the jurisdiction of which court or judge is transferred to the High Court of Justice, is to be final, an appeal shall not lie in any such case from the decision of the High Court of Justice, or of any judge thereof, to the Court of Appeal." It is true that this case is not within the precise terms of this enactment, inasmuch as this decision, from which the right of appeal is here claimed, is not one which is made final by Act of Parliament. But I apprehend that the only reason for not making the terms of the enactment sufficiently comprehensive to include such a case as the present was simply that, as it had never occurred to any one to suppose that there could be an appeal from the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in such a case, it was not deemed necessary to make the language apply to it in terms. That the case is within the spirit of the enactment cannot, I think, be doubted. Whether, therefore, I look to the nature of the jurisdiction heretofore exercised by the Court of Queen's Bench, or to the object and intention of the recent legislation, I can arrive at no other conclusion than that a decision of the divisional court on an appeal against a rate is not a judgment or order within the 19th section of the Judicature Act of 1873. I am therefore of opinion that this court has not jurisdiction to entertain this appeal.

BRETT, L.J. concurred with Cockburn, C.J., on the ground that the decision of the Queen's Bench Division was not an order or judgment, nor was it a binding decision.

The Court being equally divided, the appeal was dismissed.

STANDARD BANK OF AFRICA v. STOKES. (a)

Party wall—Tenants in common—Evidence—Presumption of law—Repair of party wall—Common law rights—Metropolitan Buildings Act 1855, ss. 82, 83, 85.

In the absence of evidence of the ownership of a party wall a jury is entitled to find that it belongs to the adjoining owners as tenants in common.

At common law a tenant in common of a party wall was entitled, with or without notice to the other tenant in common and whether the wall required repairs or not, to remove or alter or take bricks from or otherwise interfere with the party wall,

(a) Reported by J. E. THOMSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STANDARD BANK OF AFRICA v. STOKES.

provided that his object in so doing was to substitute a new or better wall or to put the old wall in a better state of repair.

But now the respective rights are regulated entirely by the Metropolitan Buildings Act 1855 and the rights given by that act are in substitution of and not in addition to those formerly existing at common law.

By the 85th section of that Act a tenant in common of a wall is to give notice to the adjoining owner of any works he may intend to carry out. By sub-sect. 3, within fourteen days such adjoining owner is to express his assent to the proposed work, or dissent is to be inferred, and thereupon a difference shall be deemed to have arisen between the building and adjoining owners ;

In case of such difference, by sub-sect. 7 each party is to appoint a surveyor, and the two surveyors are to appoint a third, and such one or three surveyors, or any two of them, are to decide all matters of dispute.

In this case the notice was given but no assent expressed ; each party appointed a surveyor but no third surveyor was appointed, although the plaintiff was cognisant of the defendant's works and intentions.

Held, that a difference had arisen, and that the defendant was not entitled in these circumstances to go on with his work.

MOTION.

The plaintiffs and defendant occupied adjoining premises at Nos. 10 and 11, Clement's-lane, in the city of London. Their respective premises were separated from each other by a party wall. There was no evidence as to the ownership of this party wall, and it became one of the questions in this case whether in the absence of such evidence there would arise a presumption that the plaintiffs and defendant were tenants in common.

On the 26th Sept. 1877 the defendant served on the plaintiffs a written notice of his intention to exercise the rights given to him by the Metropolitan Buildings Act 1855, sect. 85. He proposed to undermine the party wall and to make a sub-basement of concrete and brick. In this letter he appointed a surveyor and referred to the 85th section of this Act, sub-sect. 6 which says :

If either owner does not within fourteen days after the delivery to him of any notice or requisition express his consent thereto, he shall be considered as having dissented therefrom, and thereupon a difference shall be deemed to have arisen between the building owner and the adjoining owner.

No consent was ever expressed by the plaintiffs, although the work went on with their knowledge, and considerable correspondence was carried on between the authorised officers of the bank and the defendant.

The 7th and 8th sub-sects. of the 85th section of the Act prescribe the course to be adopted in case a difference arises between a building and adjoining owner. Those and other sections of the Act applicable to the case are sufficiently set forth in the judgment.

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant had no right to undermine or underpin the wall, and that considerable risk to the bank was involved in their operations. The defendant alleged that he proceeded with all caution, and that no danger was incurred.

The plaintiffs, however, moved to restrain the defendant from proceeding with his work. But in the course of this argument, it having been arranged that in conformity with the provisions of the Act a third surveyor should be appointed, there remained only the question whether the defendant was legally justified in the first instance in what he had done.

Davey, Q.C. and Buckley, for the plaintiffs.

Marten, Q.C. and Hull, for the defendant.

JENSEN, M.R.—This matter is now reduced to a question of costs, but it involves, as sometimes a question of costs does, very important points of law, and as according to my practice the costs follow upon the legal right, I think it is absolutely necessary for me to decide upon the legal right, in order to arrive at a decision as to the liability of either party to pay the costs. Now the plaintiff alleges that he is the owner of a house with a party wall. The defendant is the owner of the adjoining house, and there is no dispute about the wall in question being a party wall. The defendant is constructing, or attempting to construct, a sub-basement—that is a floor under the basement—and for that purpose he is excavating the earth from beneath his own basement and also from beneath the wall—and omit for the moment the fact of his going thirty inches on one side of the party wall ; that may have been by accident or not—and he purposes in doing that to do, or has actually done, this : he has cut away the concrete foundation of the wall and intends to fill up the space occupied by the concrete foundation and by the London clay beneath the wall by a solid foundation of brick, making a new wall below the old wall, which itself in its turn will be supported by a new concrete foundation. The plaintiff says that the work may be done safely if executed with great care, but that it is a "risky" work, and one likely to lead to danger. The defendant says that he will be very careful, that he is careful, and that being very careful the work will not be dangerous to any one. Another question arises, whether or not what is proposed to be done is within the provisions of the 33rd section of the Building Act. Now first of all, as to the position of the parties independently of the Building Act, I have no evidence before me at the present moment as to the boundaries of the properties. All I have is, that there has been a common user of the wall, which seems to have been erected by the plaintiff some time back at the common expense of the plaintiff and the defendant, and I have nothing to show how that wall came to be so used and enjoyed. The question is, what does the law presume from that ? I have been referred to an authority which says that in the absence of any evidence beyond what I have mentioned there was sufficient for a jury to find that the wall was held by the two parties as tenants in common, and beyond that the case does not go. The result therefore is that, according to that authority, there is sufficient for me to find, if I think fit, that the wall is held by the plaintiff and defendant as tenants in common. If I do not think fit to decide the question, which probably would be the more correct course to take, then I should remit it for further inquiry to see what the boundaries of the two properties were, which I have no doubt, or very little doubt, could be soon ascertained. But supposing I were driven to the conclusion that the plaintiff and defendant were tenants in common, what would their rights be? Now, as to that, the very case to which I have been referred enables me to give an answer, and that case is Oubitt v. Porter. All the three judges there—and very eminent judges they were—were agreed that you cannot have an action by a tenant in common against another tenant in common merely because he pulls down the wall which belongs to them as tenants in common; if it is a temporary thing, “a temporary removal with a view to improve part of the property on one side at least, and perhaps on both,” there is no authority to show that one tenant in common can maintain an action against the other for a temporary removal of the subject-matter of the tenancy in common, the party removing having at the same time the intention of making a prompt restitution. It was not a destruction. “The object of the party was not that there should be no wall there, but that there should be a wall there as expeditiously as a wall could be made.” I read that from the evidence of Bayley, J. at page 265. Holroyd, J. says this at page 267: “Taking it to be the law that where there is a complete destruction by one tenant in common of that which he has in common with others, so that that other is wholly deprived of the use of it, an action of trespass will lie. I think the act done by the defendant in this case cannot be considered as a destruction of the wall, the removal of the old wall having been effected merely for the purpose of rebuilding another on its site as speedily as possible.” Then Littledale, J. says: “If two persons be tenants in common of land on which there is a wall, and one refuses to repair, and the other pulls down the wall and sells the materials and builds a better wall, it may be said that there has been a total destruction of the original wall, more especially if he sold the materials; still, if he did that for the purpose of getting other materials to make the new wall better than the old one was, and he builds the new one, though there was a destruction of that which was originally the subject-matter of the tenancy in common, an action of trespass will not be maintainable;” and then he says, if it is partial damage, you must have an action on the case. The result, therefore, is this, that what the defendant is doing, namely, the removing of the foundation of the old wall, be it for the purpose of putting in as good a foundation or a better one—for he is doing it, as it is stated, by concrete—it is not a destruction as tenant in common. All that has been done has been done in this case with the bona fide intention of supporting the wall, and will not entitle the other tenant in common to maintain an action—of course, still less an injunction. I am not now speaking of a case of danger, which is not, as I understand, this case. That being so, it appears to me that at common law there would have been no right of action as far as the wall is concerned. The next point is taking away the narrow slip of clay which underlies the wall. Whatever might be the case with agricultural land, I do not think it can be pretended that where a stratum of clay is used merely for the purpose of supporting a wall, that the substitution of brick or burnt clay for the unburnt or native clay as a support of the wall can be deemed destruction or destructive waste. It is an improvement, and not a destruction, and I should think, therefore, the removal of a portion of the clay, intending to substitute brick, will not be destructive waste, nor would it entitle the plaintiff to an injunction. The remaining point is a totally different one. The plaintiff alleges, and the defendant denies, that according to the true construction of the Metropolitan Buildings Act, whatever the rights at common law might have been, such right no longer exists, and that is the view I take myself of the Act. The Act, part 3, begins, “Party structures,” and there is this preliminary in the 82nd section: “In the construction of the following provisions relating to party structures such one of the owners of the premises separated by or adjoining to any party structure as is desirous of executing any work in respect to such party structure shall be called the building owner, and the owner of the other premises shall be called the adjoining owner.” Therefore you start by a definition as regards “any work.” The next has this prefix, “Rights of building and adjoining owners. The building owner shall have the following rights in relation to party structures; that is to say”—does not that mean he is to have no others? Is not that the definition of the rights he is to have, meaning those are all the rights he is to have? In my opinion, that is the meaning of the section. The law of the metropolis now defines the rights of building owners. He is a building owner within the definition of the 82nd section, because he wants to do some work in respect of part of the structure, and being such a building owner he has these rights, which in my opinion are exclusive, and he has no other rights. When we come to look at the sub-sections, I think that is manifest, “a right to make good or repair any party structure that is defective or out of repair.” Now, as he had a right at law as a tenant in common, wherever he was tenant in common, to repair or to improve, this sub-section would have no particular meaning, because, if he has only to give notices under the Building Act when it is defective or out of repair, but that he may do it when it is not defective or out of repair without giving any notice, it would have this extraordinary result—that when the wall wanted nothing doing to it he might amuse himself by pulling out the bricks and putting in new ones or handsomer ones, without giving notice to anybody, at his own will and pleasure; whilst when it was actually out of repair and defective, and wanted something to be done to it very speedily, he could not touch it without giving notice. It is obvious that, to read the Act of Parliament in this way instead of carrying out the specified intentions of the Legislature, is simply to cast ridicule upon them, and I cannot consent to do that. Now then the next is, “a right to pull down and rebuild any party structure that is so far defective and out of repair as to make it necessary or desirable to pull down the same.” Here, again, is a limited right to pull down. But, as I have read the law and statements of these eminent judges, he has a right to pull down when the wall is neither defective nor out of repair, if he only wishes to improve or put up a better or handsomer one, and that without notice. But, according to the statute, he must give notice of such intention when the wall is defective or out of repair. So there would be this curious result: he must give notice when the wall is defective or out of repair, but he may pull down without any notice when it wanted nothing doing to it, but the tenant in common wished to improve it or beautify it, and therefore wanted to pull it down. Then, without going into others, we have this, No. 6, "A right to raise any structure permitted by this Act to be raised, or any external wall built against such party structure, upon condition of making good all damage occasioned thereby to the adjoining premises, or to the internal finishings and decorations thereof, and of carrying up to the requisite height all flues and chimney stacks belonging to the adjoining owner on or against such party structure or external wall." Now, there are two questions upon that. "The right to raise any party structure" being permitted by this Act to be raised, is it absolutely necessary to limit that to raising it above ground? If the party structure is all above ground, and you put anything upon it, of course the raising must be above ground; but if the party structure were under ground, dividing two basements, and did not reach the surface, clearly then the raising would be underground. Is it necessary to limit the word "raise" to putting something on the wall on the top, and may not you raise or make it longer, or build it up by something on the bottom? I do not think it necessary so to hold, and if it were absolutely impossible to underpin a wall except under this sub-section, my impression is that the sub-section would be wide enough to include it. But I think there is another sub-section that will do, and consequently it is not necessary to insist upon it. Then there is "a right to pull down any party structure that is of insufficient strength for any building intended to be built, and to rebuild the same of sufficient strength for the above purpose, upon condition of making good all damage." Here, I think, we have a section which will do, and which, upon the principle of omne majus, &c., will include the case I have before me. You are going to make a sub-basement; you want, therefore, a wall of sufficient strength for the new building which you intend to be built. For this purpose you may pull down the party structure, which, of course, would be of insufficient strength. It would fall down altogether if you took away its support by making the sub-basement, and you must build it of sufficient strength. If you may pull it down and rebuild it, why may you not do something short of that, and underpin it under that sub-section? It would be a very extraordinary reading of the sub-section to say that, although you have the right of pulling it down altogether and putting it up again, that in rebuilding it you may not do something less; that is to say, support it and put a new wall underneath it. I think that would be a very narrow view of the sub-section. Then there is the right to cut into any party structure, a right to cut away a footing; and then, by the 11th section there is a right "to perform any other necessary works incident to the connection of party structures and premises adjoining thereto." Now, those are very large words. Why should I not read them to include again the case in question? It is a right to perform any necessary works "incident." Incident to what? Why incident to the connection of the party structure. But this is not incident to the connection of the party structure. If you make the sub-basement, and you do not support the wall, it will fall down, and its connection would be terminated in a very summary manner; and I think therefore there are words here which are quite large enough to include this right, and my interpretation and decision is that they are large enough to include them, and therefore that this right is a right within the Building Act when it becomes necessary, or reasonably necessary, to perform it; that the right is not limited to putting bricks upon the top of the wall; and that you may increase the wall by putting bricks below the wall, so as to enlarge it in that way as much as you may by putting bricks above the wall to enlarge it in the other way. I think it the duty of the court to read these Acts in a reasonable manner, with a view of carrying out the manifest intention of the Legislature—that these party structures should not be interfered with by building owners without due notice to the person or persons other than the building owner interested in the party structure, and without its being referred to the surveyors to decide how the work should be performed. Now that being, in my opinion, within the 83rd section, the rules of the 85th section I think are clear; not that the wording might not have been improved, but it has been said as regards these Acts of Parliament, and truly said, that the wonder is not that you should find imperfections in the wording, but that they should be as well drawn as they are, considering the mode in which they are passed, and the want of final revision. Now, it is quite true that in sub-sect. 7 of the 85th section there is a slight difference in the wording which has given rise to argument; but I think the fair meaning of the section is this: that where there is a dispute or difference, for the words are identical in meaning, you shall not do the work except with the sanction of the other owner who is interested in the wall—or, of two surveyors out of three, one to be nominated by each party, and the two to choose an umpire, or of the umpire; in other words, that the work shall be done according to the direction of the majority of the surveyors or the umpire, and shall not be done in any other manner. Now, the 7th sub-section is this, "in all cases not hereby specially provided for"—this is not specially provided for—"where a difference arises between a building owner and adjoining owner in respect of any matter arising under this Act, unless both parties concur in the appointment of one surveyor"—which they have not done here—"they shall each appoint a surveyor, and the two surveyors so appointed shall select a third surveyor, and such one surveyor or three surveyors, or any two of them, shall settle any matter in dispute between such building and adjoining owner, with power by his or their award to determine the right to do, and the time and manner of doing any work, and generally any other matter arising out of or incidental to such difference?" Now, as they have to determine the right to do and the time and manner of doing the work, it would really be reducing the act to an absurdity to suppose that the building owners had stipulated to proceed with the work until they had so determined. It must mean that they are to determine the time; that is, he is not to do it until the time is determined, and that if he does it before that time he is committing a breach of the Act of Parliament. In the same way, if he is doing something which they do not decide he can do, and if they have made no award, he is not entitled to get the award. Then there is a power of appealing, and the appeal may no doubt be delayed for a very considerable time; but, if his right is, as I read it to be, a right merely to do that which the surveyor or the umpire may direct shall be done, he has no right to do anything at all until he obtains such directions. The result, therefore, is that this defendant had no right to proceed with his work until the direction of the surveyor had been obtained, and that the plaintiff is entitled to come here to restrain his so proceeding. The other is this: It appears that the defendant, besides interfering with the earth under the wall, has removed earth to the extent of thirty inches on the plaintiff's side of the wall. Now, as to that, of course there can be costs, and that alone would be quite sufficient ground for the plaintiff coming to this court, which was not the main or the substantial ground, nor was it the ground which occasioned the greater part of the costs; and if I had been against him on the other ground, I certainly should have made him pay the bulk of the costs which were occasioned by the contention in which he failed. Therefore I mention this to show it has not escaped my notice, and that the utmost I could have done for the plaintiff in regard to this small portion of his case, if I had held he had only succeeded in respect of that small portion, would have been to give him some small portion of the costs. The result therefore is that, in my opinion, the plaintiff is right, and the defendant is wrong in law, and that the defendant ought to pay the costs.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF MIDDLESEX; Ex parte BRADLAUGH. (a)

Certiorari—Objection to jurisdiction of metropolitan police magistrate—Obscene books—Order to destroy—2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 49—20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, s. 1.

By 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 49, no conviction or other proceeding by any metropolitan police magistrate shall be quashed for want of form, or be removed by certiorari into the Queen's Bench.

By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, s. 1, a metropolitan police magistrate, if satisfied of the good foundation of a complainant's belief that obscene books are kept in a house for the purpose of sale, and if satisfied that such books are of such a character and description that the publication of them would be a misdemeanour and proper to be prosecuted as such, may grant a special warrant to bring these books before him, and summon the occupier of the house to show cause why they should not be destroyed. And if, on appearance, such magistrate is satisfied that such books are of the character stated in the warrant, and have been kept for the purpose aforesaid, he may order them to be destroyed.

A metropolitan police magistrate, in an order to destroy some books under the last-mentioned Act, recited the special warrant and the satisfaction of the magistrate necessary for its issue, but only stated that he himself was satisfied that the said books were obscene.

(a) Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, upon a rule for certiorari, that the omission on the part of the magistrate making the order to state that he was satisfied that the said books were of such a character and description that the publication of them would be a misdemeanour and proper to be prosecuted as such, was a substantial objection to the order; and that, such objection being to the magistrate's jurisdiction, the order might and must be brought up on certiorari, notwithstanding sect. 49 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71.

On the 23rd May a rule nisi was obtained by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh in person, calling upon the keepers of the peace and justices in and for the county of Middlesex to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue directed to them to remove into this court all and singular orders made by them or some of them upon the appeal of the said Charles Bradlaugh against a certain order under the hand and seal of James Vaughan, Esq., one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, sitting at the Bow-street Police Court, and bearing date on or about the 19th Feb. last, for the destruction of 650 copies of a certain book entitled "The Fruits of Philosophy," and also the said order of the said James Vaughan.

The following is the said order of James Vaughan, Esq.:—

"Whereas on the 18th May 1877, upon complaint duly made on oath before Frederick Flowers, Esq., one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, sitting at the Police Court, Bow-street, in the county of Middlesex, and within the Metropolitan Police District, by John Green, that he the said John Green had reason to believe and did believe that divers obscene books were kept by Edward Truelove in a certain open and public shop, situate and being No. 256, High Holborn, in the county of Middlesex, and within the said district, for the purposes of sale, and of being otherwise published for the purpose of gain; and he the said John Green did further upon his oath say that on the 14th May in the year aforesaid he did purchase of the said Edward Truelove, at the said open and public shop as aforesaid, one obscene book, entitled 'The Fruits of Philosophy,' which book the said John Green produced to the said magistrate at the time of swearing his information.

"And whereas the said magistrate, being satisfied that the belief of the said John Green was well founded, and that the publication thereof was a misdemeanour, and liable to be prosecuted as such, thereupon issued his special warrant pursuant to the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, and directed Henry Wood, one of the inspectors of the metropolitan police force, commanding and authorising him to enter in the daytime into the house and shop of the said Edward Truelove, situate and being No. 256, High Holborn, in the county and district aforesaid, and, if necessary, to use force by breaking open doors or otherwise, and to search for and seize all such obscene books as aforesaid found in such house and shop, and to bring all the articles so seized before him or such other of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis as should then be sitting at the police court as aforesaid.

"And whereas the said Henry Wood, on the 23rd May 1877, by virtue of the said warrant, duly entered the said house and shop of the said Edward Truelove, and there found and seized certain obscene books, to wit, 657 printed books, being copies of the said obscene book entitled 'The Fruits of Philosophy,' kept there for the purpose of sale, and being otherwise published for purposes of gain, and which 657 books were carried before Sir James Taylor Ingham, knight, one of the said magistrates sitting at the said court, and thereupon he, the said magistrate, Sir James Taylor Ingham, knight, on the 24th May in the year aforesaid, duly issued a summons requiring the said Edward Truelove, as such occupier of such house and shop, to appear on Tuesday, the 29th May, in the year aforesaid, at the police court aforesaid, to show cause why the said books so seized as aforesaid should not be destroyed.

"And whereas the said summons hath from time to time, by divers adjournments, with the consent of the said Edward Truelove, been adjourned until this day.

"And whereas upon the hearing of the said summons upon this day Charles Bradlaugh appears before me, the undersigned, one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis sitting at the police court, Bow-street, in the county and district aforesaid, and claims to be the owner of the said books.

"Now I, the said magistrate, having examined the said books, and duly considered the premises, and being satisfied that the said 657 books, being copies of the said obscene book entitled 'Fruits of Philosophy,' so seized as aforesaid, are obscene, do hereby, pursuant to the said statute, order and determine that the said books so seized as aforesaid, and being such copies of the said obscene book entitled 'Fruits of Philosophy' as aforesaid, be destroyed.

"And I do further order and empower the said Henry Wood to destroy the said books at the expiration of seven days after the day of the date hereof, unless the said Charles Bradlaugh shall within such period of seven days give to me notice of appeal in writing to the next general sessions of the peace to be holden in and for the said county of Middlesex against this my order, and shall also within the said period of seven days enter into his recognizance in the sum of 100*l.* and find two sufficient sureties in the sum of 50*l.* each before a justice of the peace for the said county personally to appear and prosecute such appeal, and to abide the order of and pay such costs as shall be awarded by the said court of general sessions of the peace or any adjournment thereof.

"Given under my hand and seal this 19th day of Feb. 1878, at the Bow-street Police Court, in the county and district aforesaid.

(Signed) JAMES VAUGHAN."

It appeared from the affirmation of the said Charles Bradlaugh that he had duly appealed to the court of quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Middlesex sitting at Westminster against the said order; and that on the 13th May the said court of quarter sessions heard the said appeal and confirmed the said order.

The rule was obtained on the ground that the order was deficient in two material findings, viz. (1) that the said books were kept for the purpose of sale, and being otherwise published for purposes of gain; and (2) that the said books were of such a character and description that the publication of them would be a misdemeanour and proper to be prosecuted as such.

It was mentioned that this objection had been taken before the justices in sessions, and the court offered the counsel supporting the order an opportunity of amending if he chose, but he elected to stand or fall by the order as it was drawn.

By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, s. 1:

It shall be lawful for any metropolitan police magistrate or other stipendiary magistrate, or for any two justices of the peace, upon complaint made before him or them upon oath that the complainant has reason to believe, and does believe, that any obscene books, papers, writings, prints, pictures, drawings, or other representations are kept in any house, shop, room, or other place within the limits of the jurisdiction of any such magistrate or justices, for the purpose of sale or distribution, exhibition for purposes of gain, lending upon hire, or being otherwise published for purposes of gain, which complainant shall also state upon oath that one or more articles of the like character have been sold, distributed, exhibited, lent, or otherwise published as aforesaid, at or in connection with such place, so as to satisfy such magistrate or justices that the belief of the said complainant is well founded, and upon such magistrate or justices being also satisfied that any of such articles so kept for any of the purposes aforesaid are of such a character and description that the publication of them would be a misdemeanour and proper to be prosecuted as such, to give authority by special warrant to any constable or police officer into such house, shop, room, or other place, with such assistance as may be necessary, to enter in the day-time, and if necessary to use force, by breaking open doors or otherwise, and to search for and seize all such books, papers, writings, prints, pictures, drawings, or other representations as aforesaid found in such house, shop, room, or other place, and to carry all the articles so seized before the magistrate or justices issuing the said warrant, or some other magistrate or justices exercising the same jurisdiction; and such magistrate or justices shall thereupon issue a summons calling upon the occupier of the house or other place which may have been so entered by virtue of the said warrant to appear within seven days before such police stipendiary magistrate or any two justices in petty sessions for the district, to show cause why the articles so seized should not be destroyed; and if such occupier or some other person claiming to be the owner of the said articles shall not appear within the time aforesaid, or shall appear and such magistrate or justices shall be satisfied that such articles or any of them are of the character stated in the warrant, and that such or any of them have been kept for any of the purposes aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the said magistrate or justices, and he or they are hereby required, to order the articles so seized, except such of them as he or they may consider necessary to be preserved as evidence in some further proceeding, to be destroyed at the expiration of the time hereinafter allowed for lodging an appeal, unless notice of appeal as hereinafter mentioned be given, and such articles shall be in the meantime impounded; and if such magistrate or justices shall be satisfied that the articles seized are not of the character stated in the warrant, or have not been kept for any of the purposes aforesaid, he or they shall forthwith direct them to be restored to the occupier of the house or other place in which they were seized.

Bealey, on behalf of the complainant, showed cause against the rule.—In the first place, this court has no jurisdiction to bring up by certiorari an order of a metropolitan stipendiary magistrate. By sect. 49 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71 (which is an Act for regulating the police courts in the metropolis) it is enacted, "That no information, conviction, or other proceeding before or by any of the said magistrates shall be quashed or set aside, or adjudged void or insufficient for want of form, or be removed by certiorari into Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench." This is a special privilege granted to metropolitan stipendiary magistrates, and more extensive powers of appeal to quarter sessions than from other justices are created by the same Act. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Does that section relate to any other proceedings than those treated by that Act? In any case, the section deals only with matters of form.] This is a mere matter of form which, if objectionable, might have been amended by the quarter sessions under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 7; and by the same section it might be amended upon return to a certiorari, if the order had been made by justices in the country. [COCKBURN, C.J.—And why not in this case upon the return?] By sect. 49 the order cannot be removed at all into this court. Secondly, this order contains, in its recitals and operative part taken together, all the ingredients required by sect. 1 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83. It was held in Rees v. Olafson (3 East, 58), that every reasonable intendment will be made in favour of an order of justices, and it must be implied from the making of the order that the magistrate was satisfied concerning the facts recited therein.

The applicant for the rule, appeared in person to support it, but was not heard.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The Act has made the exercise of jurisdiction conditional on the magistrate being satisfied that the book is obscene, and that it is one the publication of which is a misdemeanour and fit to be prosecuted. It is not enough for him to state that the book is obscene; it must also be stated that he was satisfied its publication was a misdemeanour and proper to be prosecuted. It is not enough that the warrant was issued on the magistrate being satisfied of these things, nor is it sufficient that the warrant states them; but where, as in this case, the magistrate who makes the order is not the one who issued the warrant, it must appear that the one who made the order was satisfied of both these things, whereas this order only states that he was satisfied of one of them—viz., that the book was obscene. It is also said that the writ of certiorari is taken away; but that does not apply in any case where there is an absence of jurisdiction. I have serious doubts whether sect. 49 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, be not limited in its application to proceedings under that Act, and cannot be extended to subsequent Acts. It is not necessary however to decide on that ground; for, even if it be taken to regulate orders made under this Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, yet, this objection being to the jurisdiction of the magistrate, the process of certiorari may clearly be invoked, notwithstanding that section, to limit the excess of an inferior tribunal. I think this omission is not a matter of form but of substance, and although it be possible that when the order is brought before us under the writ we may have power to amend it under the enactment which has been alluded to, that must be the subject of an application; and it is not necessary now to say more than that the order as it stands is invalid and must be brought before us by certiorari.

MELLOR, J.—I agree entirely, and I will merely add that I understand it to be a well-established principle to interpret words like these, prohibiting removal by certiorari, as inapplicable to excess of jurisdiction. It would be a dangerous doctrine to hold otherwise. I also think that sect. 49 relates only to offences dealt with by that Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. As to the other point, this is a peculiar jurisdiction somewhat similar to search warrants upon houses of suspected felons: the course to be followed is elaborately set out in the 1st section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, and must be followed exactly. There must be an independent judgment of the magistrate making the order, and that judgment upon the points required by the section must be set out in the order.

Rule absolute.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE;
Re parte BROWN. (a)

Intoxicating liquors—Selling without licence—Imprisonment—Distress in default of penalty—Habeas corpus—11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, ss. 19, 21—35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, ss. 3 and 51.

The applicant was convicted under sect. 3 of the Licensing Act 1872 of selling beer by retail without being duly licensed, and was fined 50l. An offender under that section is liable to a penalty not exceeding 50l., or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one month.

The order of the justices, after reciting the conviction and penalty, proceeded to adjudge that, if the money were not paid forthwith, inasmuch as it appeared that the defendant had no goods or chattels whereon to levy the same by distress, the defendant should be imprisoned for six calendar months unless the money should be sooner paid.

Held, upon a rule for habeas corpus, that the omission of the justices to make an order in the words of sect. 51, sub-sect. 2, that a distress should be made in default of payment, rendered this order of imprisonment invalid, notwithstanding the proviso to sect. 19 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848.

Held, also by Cockburn, C.J. (dissentiente Mellor, J.); that this sub-sect. 2 had no application to offences under the Licensing Act 1872, for which an alternative of imprisonment is expressly imposed.

A RULE nisi had been obtained on behalf of Thomas Brown, calling upon the justices of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and the governor of the prison there, to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue to bring up the said Thomas Brown, and the warrant upon which he was there kept in prison.

The following is the warrant by virtue of which the said Thomas Brown was detained in custody:—

“Borough and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne to wit.—To all sergeants-at-mace and constables of and for the borough and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and to the keeper of the House of Correction at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in and for the said borough. Whereas Thomas Brown, of the borough and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne (hereinafter called the defendant), was this day duly convicted by and before us the undersigned two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the county and borough of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, for that he, the said defendant, on the 19th day of April A.D. 1878, at the parish of St. Nicholas, in the borough and county aforesaid, unlawfully did sell by retail intoxicating liquor, to wit, seven pints of beer, without being duly licensed to sell the same, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided. And it was thereby adjudged that the said defendant, for his said offence, should forfeit and pay the sum of 50*l.*, to be paid and applied according to law, and should also pay to John Bournaker, the prosecutor, the sum of 7*s.* for his costs in that behalf; and it was thereby further adjudged that if the said several sums should not be paid forthwith, then, inasmuch as it was then made to appear to us, the said justices, that the said defendant had no goods or chattels whereon to levy the said sums by distress, the said defendant should be imprisoned in the House of Correction at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in and for the said borough and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, for the space of six calendar months, unless the said several sums should be sooner paid. And whereas the time in and by the said conviction appointed for the payment of the said several sums hath elapsed, but the said defendant hath not paid the same or any part thereof, but therein hath made default. These are, therefore, to command you, the said sergeants-at-mace and constables, some or one of you, forthwith to take the said defendant, and him safely convey to the said House of Correction at Newcastle-upon-Tyne aforesaid, and there to deliver him to the keeper thereof, together with this precept; and we do hereby command you, the said keeper of the House of Correction, to receive the said defendant into your custody in the said House of Correction, there to imprison him for the space of six calendar months, unless the said several sums shall be sooner paid in; and for your so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant.

"Given under our hands and seals, at the police court, in the borough and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, this 30th day of April, A.D. 1878.

(Signed) J. L. GREGGON. (L. s.)

B. C. BROWNE. (L. s.)"

Lawrance, Q.C. and Edge, for the justices, showed cause against the rule.—It appears that the applicant Brown was convicted of a first offence under sect. 3 of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), by which "Any person selling or exposing for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor which he is not licensed to sell by retail, or selling or exposing for sale any intoxicating liquors at any place where he is not authorised by his licence to sell the same, shall be subject to the following penalties; that is to say (1) for the first offence, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds, or to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding one month." The two punishments on conviction are alternative, the imprisonment for one month not being in default of the penalty. If the justices, therefore, thought fit to impose the penalty, it is necessary to look elsewhere for the means of enforcing it; and by sect. 51: "Except as in this Act otherwise expressly provided, every offence under this Act may be prosecuted, and every penalty and forfeiture may be recovered and enforced, in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, subject to the following provisions . . . (2) Where the court of summary jurisdiction orders that a distress shall be made in default of payment of any penal sum exceeding five pounds, including under that expression costs actually adjudged in respect of an offence, the court may order that, in default of the said sum being paid as directed, the person liable to pay the same shall be imprisoned for any term not exceeding the period specified in the following scale:

For any sum exceeding five pounds but not exceeding ten pounds, three months; for any sum exceeding ten pounds but not exceeding thirty pounds, four months; for any sum exceeding thirty pounds but not exceeding fifty pounds, six months; for any sum exceeding fifty pounds, one year." The manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43) for recovering and enforcing a penalty is by sect. 19: "That where a conviction adjudges a pecuniary penalty or compensation to be paid, or where an order requires the payment of a sum of money, and by the statute authorising such conviction or order such penalty, compensation, or sum of money is to be levied upon the goods and chattels of the defendant, by distress and sale thereof; and also in cases where by the statute in that behalf no mode of raising or levying such penalty, compensation, or sum of money, or of enforcing the payment of the same, is stated or provided, it shall be lawful for the justice or justices making such conviction or order, or for any justice of the peace for the same county, riding, division, liberty, city, borough, or place, to issue his or their warrant of distress for the purpose of levying the same, which said warrant of distress shall be in writing under the hand and seal of the justice making the same: . . . Provided always, that whenever it shall appear to any justice of the peace to whom application shall be made for any such warrant of distress as aforesaid that the issuing thereof would be ruinous to the defendant and his family, or wherever it shall appear to such justice by the confession of the defendant or otherwise that he hath no goods or chattels whereon to levy such distress, then and in every such case it shall be lawful for such justice, if he shall deem it fit, instead of issuing such warrant of distress, to commit such defendant to the house of correction, or if there be no house of correction within his jurisdiction, then to the common gaol, there to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for such time and in such manner as by law such defendant might be so committed in case such warrant of distress had issued, and no goods or chattels could be found whereon to levy such penalty or sum and costs aforesaid." And it is enacted by sect. 21, "That if at the time and place appointed for the return of any such warrant of distress, the constable who shall have had the execution of the same shall return that he could find no goods or chattels, or no sufficient goods or chattels, whereon he could levy the sum or sums therein mentioned, together with the costs of or occasioned by the levying of the same, it shall be lawful for the justice of the peace before whom the same shall be returned to issue his warrant of commitment under his hand and seal, directed to the same or any other constable, reciting the conviction or order shortly, the issuing of the warrant of distress and the return thereto, and requiring such constable to convey such defendant to the house of correction, or if there be no house of correction, then to the common gaol of the county, riding, division, liberty, city, borough, or place for which such justice shall then be acting, and there to deliver him to the keeper thereof, and requiring such keeper to receive the defendant into such house of correction or gaol, and there to imprison him, or to imprison him and keep him to hard labour in such manner and for such time as shall have been directed and appointed by the statute on which the conviction or order mentioned in such warrant of distress was founded, unless the sum or sums adjudged to be paid, and all costs and charges of the distress, and also the costs and charges of the commitment and conveying of the defendant to prison, if such justice shall think fit so to order (the amount thereof being ascertained and stated in such commitment), shall be sooner paid."

No counsel appeared to support the rule.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this rule should be made absolute on two grounds. The first depends on what is no doubt a somewhat narrow view of the conditions required by sub-sect. 2 of the 51st section of the Licensing Act 1872. One of these conditions, however, seems to be wanting in this warrant. That sub-section enables a court of summary jurisdiction to order a person to be imprisoned in default of a sum being paid as directed "where the court of summary jurisdiction orders that a distress shall be made in default of payment of any penal sum exceeding 5l." Now it does not appear from this warrant that any distress was ordered before the order of imprisonment was made. No doubt the proviso of sect. 19 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 enables a justice, if it appears to him that there are no goods or chattels whereon to levy such distress, and if he shall deem it fit, to commit a defendant to prison instead of issuing such distress warrant but the early part of sect. 51, which incorporates the Summary Jurisdiction Act, does so expressly subject to provisions, one of which is that the imprisonment shall be where the court orders a distress. That is a primary condition of the power to imprison in default or instead of a distress. It may be idle under such circumstances to issue a distress warrant, but the provision of the statute exists, and there is nothing in the statute itself, nor in the Summary Jurisdiction Act, to override such an express condition in the clause creating the mode of enforcing a penalty. Supposing, therefore, that sect. 51 were applicable to this offence when visited with a penalty, one of its conditions has not been complied with, and therefore this warrant is invalid. But secondly, on broader grounds I think this 51st section is not applicable to this particular offence, the punishment for which is a term of imprisonment in the alternative of a fine. An offender is made liable to a penalty not exceeding 50l., or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one month. It cannot be that, because he has no means to meet the fine which the justices have thought fit to impose instead of one month's imprisonment, that he can therefore be imprisoned for six months; such a conclusion would be so glaring an inconsistency, and would savour so much of absurdity, that I am unwilling to adopt it. I am the more inclined to avoid it because this 51st section may well apply without any inconsistency to a long series of offences created by the Act for which no other alternative of imprisonment is given. Looking at the whole of the statute, sect. 51 does not, I think, apply to this case at all. The rule therefore will be absolute.

MELLOR, J.—I do not dissent from my Lord's decision, although I have but little faith in the grounds of my agreement. For this offence a man is liable to a 50l. penalty or a month's imprisonment. Punishment is frequently expressed to be imprisonment in default of a penalty, but here there are alternative punishments, and I do not agree that Jervis's Act is not applicable to a fine imposed for this offence. There is no specific mode of enforcing this penalty, except under sect. 51, and I do not see that we are called upon to remedy the incongruity which the statute creates. My serious difficulty, however, is that, notwithstanding the proviso to the 19th section of Jervis's Act, this mode of enforcing the penalty is adopted by sect. 51 only where the summary court orders a distress in default of payment. I consider that at least it is extremely doubtful whether such an order of imprisonment can be valid without a previous order of distress; and, further, I have to be satisfied, before discharging this rule, that this sentence of imprisonment is lawful. I do not see any ground for imposing a longer sentence than a month, even although I do not agree with my Lord as to the application of the 51st section.

Quo warranto—Clerk to local board—Office held at pleasure.

The local board of L. consisted of nine members. R. was elected clerk of such board in April 1857, and acted as such clerk until Sept. 1877, when a board of eight members dismissed him, and appointed J. in his place.

Held, that as R. had been dismissed by persons having authority to dismiss him, a quo warranto ought not to issue to displace J.

Seemly, that a bye-law of the board, to the effect that no resolution should be altered or rescinded unless one month's notice were given, nor unless as many members were present as at the meeting which adopted the resolution, did not apply to the case.

This was a rule calling upon Mr. Joseph Parry Jones to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be exhibited against him to show by what authority he claimed to exercise the office of clerk to the Local Board of Health for the district of Llangollen, in the county of Denbigh, on the grounds (1) that a month's notice of motion to dismiss Mr. Charles Richards (the relator) was not given; and (2) that at the meeting whereby Mr. Charles Richards was dismissed there was not a number of members present equal to that present at the meeting whereby he was appointed, as required by the bye-laws for the said district of Llangollen.

The Local Board of Llangollen was constituted in the year 1857, under the Public Health Act 1848, and consisted of nine members. In April 1857 the first meeting of the board was held, and all the nine members being present, Mr. Richards was unanimously elected clerk of the board, and continued to act as such until Sept. 1877, when a board consisting of eight members, with only one dissentient voice, passed a resolution that "Mr. Richards cease to be the clerk of the board on the 31st Jan. 1878," and appointed as their clerk Mr.

Joseph Parry Jones. Affidavits justifying and impugning the conduct of the board were filed, but from the judgment of the court it will be seen that it is unnecessary to state their effect.

The 37th section of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) is as follows:

The local board of health may, from time to time, appoint fit and proper persons to be surveyor, inspector of nuisances, clerk, and treasurer, for the purposes of this Act, and shall appoint or employ such collectors and other officers and servants as may be necessary and proper for the efficient execution of this Act;

And shall make bye-laws for regulating the duties and conduct of the several officers and servants so appointed or employed;

And the said local board may pay out of the general district rates to be levied under this Act, to such officers and servants, such reasonable salaries, wages, or allowances as the said local board may think proper;

And every such officer and servant shall be removable by the said local board at their pleasure, subject nevertheless in the case of the removal of the surveyor to the approval of the general board of health.

Provided always that the same person may be both surveyor and inspector of nuisances;

But neither the person holding the office of treasurer nor his partner, nor any person in the service or employ of them, or either of them, shall hold, be eligible to, or shall in any manner assist or officiate in the office of clerk; and neither the person holding the office of clerk nor his partner, nor any person in the service or employ of them, shall hold, be eligible to, or shall in any manner assist or officiate in the office of treasurer; and whosoever offends in any of the cases enumerated in this proviso shall forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred pounds, which may be recovered by any person with full costs of suit, by action of debt.

The local board had made, amongst others, the following bye-law:

No resolution of the local board shall be altered or rescinded unless one month's notice be given by the clerk to each member of the board, setting forth the proposed alteration, nor unless there be at least as many members present at such meeting as were present at the meeting when the resolution was adopted. Provided, &c.

M'Intyre, Q.C. and A. G. M'Intyre now showed cause, and argued that the board might dismiss Mr. Richards at their pleasure, and that therefore quo warranto did not lie. They referred to relying strongly on the last-named case.

Reg. v. Guardians of St. Martin's, 17 Q. B. 148;

F. Turner, in support of the rule, referred to the saving clauses of the Public Health Act 1875 (sects. 326 and 343), but chiefly relied on

R. v. Wrexham Road Trustees, 5 A. & E. 581.

[COCKBURN, O.J.—A case might perhaps occur where persons having the power of appointment might appoint a disqualified person, and then refuse to dismiss him; that, however, is not the case here. Nor do you show that Mr. Richards was taken in any way by surprise, so as to lose an opportunity of his case being heard.]

COCKBURN, C. J.—I entertain a very strong conviction that the bye-law has no application to this case, but only to some alteration of an order which the board in their executive character would be bound to carry out. The bye-law could never have been intended to apply to a dismissal. However that may be, I do not think a quo warranto lies. As for R. v. Wrexham Road Trustees (ubi sup.), I think that is a very questionable decision indeed, and I would not be bound by it, unless the very same circumstances were to occur again. Rightly or wrongly, these gentlemen have dismissed Mr. Richards. Supposing we were to grant a quo warranto and displace Mr. Jones, we should not thereby reinstate Mr. Richards. We have a discretion in this case, and it would be idle to exercise it in the manner prayed.

MELLOR, J.—This is a writ which does not go without the leave of the court, and which formerly issued at the instance of the Attorney-General only. It is very questionable whether the writ applies to a case where there is a power of dismissal, but whether it does so apply or not, I am clearly of opinion that we ought not to exercise our discretion adversely to Mr. Jones in the present case. The preliminary proceedings may or may not have been regular, but in the result Mr. Richards was dismissed by persons having a legal authority to dismiss him, and that is enough.

BISHOP OF ST. ALBANS AND ANOTHER v. BATTERSBY. (a)

Building lease—Covenant not to use house as beer-shop or public-house—Application of covenant to house used for sale of beer not to be drunk on the premises.

The plaintiffs, on the 7th May 1868, demised a plot of land to a company on building lease for 999 years from the 25th March of that year. The company covenanted for themselves and their successors and assigns (with the usual proviso for re-entry in case of breach), that they should not nor would permit any house which might have been erected on the demised premises to be used as a beer-shop or public-house, or any theatre, or public show, or exhibition. The defendant, being a grocer and baker, in whom was vested the estate of the company by assignment, in Sept. 1876 sold beer to be consumed off the premises in pursuance of a licence in that behalf.

Held, that the defendant had committed a forfeiture. THIS was a special case stated by consent as follows:—

1. By indenture made the 7th May 1868 the Reverend Brabazon Lowther and the Right Reverend Father in God Thomas Legh Lord Bishop of Rochester (therein called "the trustees") demised to the Haydock Collieries Industrial Co-operative Society (Limited), (therein called "the lessees"), their successors and assigns, a plot of land, in the township of Haydock, described in the said indenture, and delineated in the plan drawn in the margin thereof, for 999 years from the 25th March 1868, at the rent 10l. 10s. per year, payable quarterly. [Copy annexed.]

2. By the said lease the lessees, for themselves, their successors and assigns, covenanted with the trustees, their heirs and assigns (amongst other covenants), as follows:

That they, the lessees, their successors and assigns, shall not nor will at any time or times hereafter erect or make or use, follow, exercise, or carry on, or permit, or suffer, in or upon the said land or the buildings erected or to be erected thereupon, any steam engine, fire engine, chemical work, cotton mill, or the trade or business of a melter of fat, pipe maker, tallow chandler, soap boiler, or any manufactory, business, or employment which is or can be deemed a public nuisance, and shall not nor will, if the said premises be used for any manufacturing purpose whatever, permit any smoke to issue therefrom so that the same shall be a nuisance to the owner or occupier of any premises adjoining or near thereto, but shall cause the said smoke or steam to be consumed so that the same be not discharged from the premises hereby demised in such manner as to become a nuisance in any wise. And shall not nor will permit or suffer any house or building to be erected in pursuance of the covenant in that behalf hereinbefore contained, to be appropriated for or converted into a place of public worship without the special licence in writing of the trustee or trustees for the time being as aforesaid, or the heirs of the survivor of them, or their or his assigns, and shall not nor will permit any house or houses which may have been erected on the said premises to be used as a beer-shop or public-house or any theatre, or public show, or exhibition.

3. The lease contains a proviso for re-entry by the lessors in case the lessees, their successors or assigns, should not well and duly keep (amongst other) the above covenant.

4. All the estate and interest of the said trustees (the lessors) is now vested in the plaintiffs by divers mesne assignments.

5. All the estate and interest of the said lessees is now vested in the defendant by divers mesne assignments.

6. Pursuant to one of the covenants in the said indenture certain buildings consisting of a shop and bakehouse were, after the date thereof, erected by the lessees on the said plot of land.

7. The defendant, who is a grocer and baker, carries on business as such in the aforesaid shop and premises, in partnership with his brother, Aaron Battersby, and has continued to do so ever since the premises became vested in him as aforesaid.

8. In the month of Sept. 1876 the said Aaron Battersby duly applied for and obtained an excise retail beer licence for the sale of beer to be consumed off the premises. The licence was headed as follows:

Beer Retailer's Licence,

Off the premises, in pursuance of 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 64, and Acts amending the same, and tobacco licence in pursuance of 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 56, s. 13.

And it authorised and licensed the said Aaron Battersby to sell by retail at the said shop beer, ale, and porter to be consumed off the premises, from the date thereof until the 11th Feb. 1877.

9. In the month of Oct. 1877 Aaron Battersby applied for a renewal of the said licence, and on the 11th of that month a fresh excise beer retailer's licence headed under the same Acts, and in the same form, as the aforesaid licence so obtained by him in Sept. 1876, as stated in the last paragraph, and authorising and licensing him to continue till the 10th Oct. in the following year to sell by retail at the said shop and premises beer, ale, and porter to be consumed off the premises, was accordingly duly granted to him. [Copy of licence annexed.] The plaintiffs were no parties to the granting of the said licences, and had no notice of the same, and they submit that the statements contained in this and the preceding paragraph of this case are inadmissible in evidence and irrelevant.

10. The said Aaron Battersby and the defendant, from the date of the granting of the said licence in Sept. 1876 down to the 12th Nov. 1877, in addition to their carrying on their ordinary business as grocers and bakers at the said shop and premises, have been in the habit of selling there, under and in pursuance of the said several licences, beer by retail to be drunk and consumed off the premises, and not to be drunk or consumed on the premises, and no part of the beer sold by them at the said house, shop, or premises has ever been drunk or consumed thereon or thereon.

11. The plaintiffs have brought this action for recovery of the possession of the aforesaid shop and premises in consequence of the aforesaid sale of beer thereof by retail in the manner and under the circumstances and for the purposes described in the 9th and 10th paragraphs hereof on divers days between the 11th Oct. and 12th Nov. 1877, contending that the said acts of the defendant constitute breaches of the aforesaid covenant and causes of forfeiture under the above-mentioned proviso.

12. The defendant contends that none of the said acts of the defendant constitute a breach of the said covenant, or any cause of forfeiture, and that under the circumstances hereinbefore stated the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in this action.

The court are to be at liberty, should they think that any further or other facts require to be stated, to send back this case to an arbitrator, to be named by the court, to find the same.

(1.) If the court shall be of opinion that any of the said acts of the defendant in Oct. or Nov. 1877 constitute a breach of the said covenant, and also a cause of forfeiture under the said proviso, and that the plaintiffs are under the circumstances stated entitled to recover, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for recovery of possession of the premises, together with 10l. mesne profits, or such less sum as to the court shall seem fit, and costs of this action.

(2.) If the court shall be of opinion that the said acts or any of them constitute a breach of the said covenant, but not a cause of forfeiture, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the defendant in respect of such breach of covenant, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for 10l. damages, or such less sum as to the court shall seem fit, together with the costs of this action.

(3.) If the court shall be of opinion that the said acts do not constitute either a breach of the said covenants, or a cause of forfeiture, or that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover against the defendant under the circumstances stated, then judgment is to be entered for the defendant with costs of defence.

W. G. Harrison, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, argued that the covenant had been broken. The word "beershop" includes any place where beer is sold, whether for consumption on the premises or not, and it is not denied that beer has been sold in this house.

J. Digby, for the defendant, argued that the covenant had not been broken. The principle upon which these covenants ought to be construed is laid down by the Court of Appeal in Germain v. Chapman (47 L. J. 252, Ch.), and is this, that as far as possible they ought to be construed so as not to restrict the freedom of trade. And in this particular case the object of the lessors was clearly to avoid the collection of noisy crowds which would result from liquor being consumed on the premises, whereas it might be sold for consumption off the premises without any such noise and confusion arising at all. Beershop and beerhouse are synonymous, and as to a "beerhouse" it has been expressly decided that a covenant not to use a house as a beerhouse does not extend to the sale of beer not to be drunk on the premises:

COVERDALE v. CHARLTON.

[Q.B. Div.]

London and North-Western Railway Company v. Garnett, L. Rep. 9 Eq. 26; 39 L. J. 25, Ch.; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 352.

He also referred to

Jones v. Bones, L. Rep. 9 Eq. 674; 39 L. J. 405, Ch.; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 304;

Pease v. Coats, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 688;

11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 64;

4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85.

COCKBURN, C.J.—No doubt the word "beershop" must be interpreted with reference to the state of things which existed in 1868 when this covenant was entered into; but I do not see any reason why that state of things, compared with the present state of things, should limit the meaning of the term in the manner which Mr. Digby contends for. The word "shop" means a place where a sale is carried on, and therefore the word "beershop" includes the particular kind of sale which is carried on in this house. It may be that the lessors intended to include such a sale, while it is of course possible that they had not contemplated it. What we have to look to is what words did they actually use, and when we find them using a term which, beyond doubt, includes the kind of sale which they now complain of, we have no alternative but to give judgment in their favour.

MELLOR, J.—I entirely agree. If the word "beershop" had a technical meaning, I might have decided otherwise; but we can look to what the parties have said and give judgment accordingly. This being a case of forfeiture, I should be very sorry to strain the law in any way against the defendant, but I do not see how we can give any other judgment.

COVERDALE v. CHARLTON. (a)

Pasturage along road, right to—Trespass, when maintainable—Right of local board to let pasturage—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 3, 144, 149.

The Local Board of Cottingham, in Yorkshire, having on several occasions from 1863 to 1876 let to the plaintiff intermittently and amongst other persons the right of pasturage on the side of two roads, the one private and the other a highway, within their district, in 1876 let the said pasturage to the plaintiff by agreement in writing for a year. For more than thirty years different persons living in the neighbourhood had depastured cattle along the said roads without payment, and refusing to make payment on demand. The plaintiff, before 1876, had warned off such persons, and the local board had from time to time taken proceedings against them under the Highway Acts, without success. The defendant, in 1876, after and with knowledge of the agreement of the plaintiff with the local board, depastured certain cattle along the said road under the care of an attendant. The local board had no legal right to let or in any way interfere with the private road, and had assumed to let the pasturage along the same by a mistake.

Held (1), that, inasmuch as by the 149th section of the Public Health Act 1875 the public road was vested in the local board, the plaintiff might by title derived from his agreement with the board maintain trespass against the defendant in respect of the pasturage along the public road; but (2), that as the local board had no right over the private road, they could not give the plaintiff, nor had the plaintiff otherwise acquired, a sufficient possessory right to maintain trespass in respect of the pasturage along the private road.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. In the year 1766 an Act was passed entitled "An Act for dividing, inclosing, and draining certain lands, grounds, and common pastures in the parish of Cottingham, in the East Riding, in the county of York." The said Act is a public Act. A copy accompanies this case.

2. The commissioners appointed by or under the said Act made their award on the 24th Aug. 1771, and thereby set out and appointed certain public and private roads within the said parish (including Endyke and Cold Harbour-lanes hereinafter mentioned).

3. Endyke-lane was set out by the said award as a private-road in the following terms:

We do order, direct, determine, and award that there shall at all times for ever hereafter be another private way or road, as and where the same is staked, ditched, or bounded out, of the breadth of thirty feet, for the use of the said proprietors whose allotments adjoin upon the same, their tenants, lessees, heirs, and assigns, their servants, horses, cattle, carts, and carriages only, leading from the turnpike road of the town of Kingston-upon-Hull and Beverley aforesaid westward into and over the south side of lands in the said New Ings herein severally awarded the said Francis Riley and Samuel Knipe, to and for them awarded the said Francis Whiting, &c."

Since the year 1818 Endyke-lane had been a public road, and as such it has since that date been repaired by the parish.

4. Cold Harbour-lane, which in the said award was described as the North Carr-road, was set out thereby as a private road in the following terms:

And we do order, direct, determine, and award that there shall at all times for ever hereafter be a private way or road, as and where the same is now staked, ditched, or bounded out, of the breadth of forty feet, for the use of the several owners of lands and grounds in Cottingham aforesaid, their tenants, lessees, heirs, and assigns, and their servants, horses, carts, and carriages only, and to be called the North Carr-road, leading to and from the said Dunawell-road eastward into and over lands in the said Inn-common and North Carr, to and from the turnpike road leading from the said town of Kingston-upon-Hull to Beverley aforesaid.

Cold Harbour-lane has continued since the date of the said award, and still is, a private road.

5. The commissioners by their said award also awarded as follows:

And we do order, direct, and award that no person or persons shall at any time hereafter turn any horses or other cattle into such of the public or private roads as are herein directed to be fenced on each side thereof for the space of five years from the date hereof, and from and after the expiration of the said five years we do award the herbage of the said roads to the surveyors of highways for the township of Cottingham aforesaid, and the profits arising therefrom shall be applied towards the repairing of the said roads, and we do order and direct that upon all public and private roads the owners of lands adjoining and laying open to the same (when the fences are not awarded to be made to lane off the ways), shall respectively have the herbage and benefit thereof, so as they do not injure the quickwood adjoining.

6. Cottingham aforesaid, whether strictly the area of a parish or a township, is and always has been for the purpose of maintaining its highways a distinct and separate area, which is commonly and in this case hereinafter called the parish of Cottingham.

7. For the purposes of this case it is conceded both by the plaintiff and the defendant that the commissioners had no power under the said Act of awarding the herbage of any of the roads thereby set out to the said surveyors, and that the award, so far as it purported to do so, was invalid.

8. Always down to the year 1863, so far back as the memory of living witnesses extends, the surveyors of highways for the parish of Cottingham, and from the year 1863 down to the commencement of this suit the local board for the district of Cottingham, to whom the office of surveyors of highways was then transferred, have in every year agreed with various persons for the letting to them between the months of April or May and November of certain rights of herbage or pasturage in and about the sides of certain roads within the said parish (being the several roads and lanes specified in the schedule to the agreements of the 19th April 1876 hereinafter mentioned, and including Endyke and Cold Harbour-lanes), and continuously since the year 1831 down to the commencement of this action money payments have in each year been received by the said surveyors from time to time, and afterwards by the said local board, in respect of the said agreements, and applied to the repair of roads within the said parish, and save as hereinafter mentioned the persons with whom such agreements have been made have had the enjoyment of the herbage under the said agreements.

9. The entire length of the roads in respect of which such agreements have been made is about eighteen miles.

10. In every such agreement which the local board have made since the beginning of the year 1866 they have allotted specific roads or parts of roads to particular individuals in the manner which is shown by the schedule to the agreement of the 19th April 1876, and the form of such agreements has been the same as that of the last-mentioned agreement. Before 1866 the mode of letting had not been uniform, the method now usual having been sometimes adopted, while at other times the letting was by "gates," the takers of "gates" being allowed by their agreements to depasture cattle throughout all the roads comprised in such agreements at a specified charge for each animal according to its description.

11. For thirty years and upwards before the commencement of this action different persons living in the neighbourhood had from time to time during the period when the said alleged right of herbage was let, put horses or other cattle generally in small numbers into the said roads (including Endyke and Cold Harbour-lanes) to eat the herbage therein without taking any gates or making any agreement with the said surveyors or local board. Some of these persons, on payment being demanded from them, have refused it, and have persisted in taking the herbage without payment after such refusal. Since 1863, when the local board came into existence, the number of persons taking the herbage without payment has increased, and many of them have refused to pay when payment was demanded. From 1863 till about five years before the commencement of this action, the number of persons who took the herbage without payment averaged twenty or thereabouts in each year, but this number has somewhat diminished during the last five years.

12. It was from time to time brought to the knowledge of the said surveyors and local board that those persons who during the period that the said alleged right of herbage was let were depasturing the herbage with their cattle without payment, and the said surveyors from time to time, and the local board during the whole time it has existed, have employed a person called a pinder with instructions to impound any cattle that were found in or about the sides of the said roads insufficiently attended, but beyond this they have not interfered except by such proceedings before magistrates as are hereinafter mentioned.

13. Proceedings have from time to time been taken before the East Riding magistrates in petty sessions, by the said surveyors and local board respectively, and by the lessees of the said alleged right of herbage, under the provisions of the Highway Acts, from time to time in force, viz., 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 74, and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101, s. 25, but the magistrates have, in such cases, uniformly dismissed the proceedings whenever it appeared that the cattle were under the control of an attendant.

14. The plaintiff to whom, before 1876, the said alleged right of herbage in certain of the said roads had been several times let (but not from 1871 to 1875 inclusively), had from time to time warned off those whom he found taking the herbage without his permission, in the roads assigned to him, and they had desisted from openly taking the herbage there without his permission, but except as herein and in the last two paragraphs mentioned it did not appear that there had been any interference with those who were from time to time depasturing the herbage of the said roads without any payment.

15. On the 19th April 1876 the local board entered into an agreement in writing with the plaintiff (a copy of which accompanies and forms part of this case) under which the local board agreed to let to the plaintiff the right of herbage or pasturage for cattle, except sheep, in and about the sides of the roads hereinafter mentioned from the day of the date of the said agreement until the 23rd Nov. then next, at the rent of 8*l.* 10*s.* Such roads were described as follows in the schedule to the said agreement: "From Gibsons to Railway Gate, North Moor-lane, 5*l.*; Cold Harbour and Middle Dykes to Railway Gates, 2*l.* 5*s.*; Little North Carr-lane, and Endyke-lane, 1*l.* 5*s.*"

16. The day after the execution of the said agreement the plaintiff commenced depasturing the herbage with his cattle, in the roads that had been assigned to him under the said agreement, and thenceforth until the commencement of this action he regularly continued to do so.

COVERDALE v. CHARLTON.

17. On the 25th April 1876 three horses and eight head of other cattle belonging to the defendant were turned into Endyke-lane aforesaid, under the care of the defendant's servant, and grazed there upon the sides of the said road, and on the following day horses and other cattle of the defendant to about the same number were turned into Cold Harbour-lane aforesaid, under the care of the same servant, and grazed there upon the sides of the said roads.

18. The defendant knew that the said alleged right of the herbage in and about the sides of the said roads had been let by the said local board to the plaintiff, but refused to remove his cattle or to discontinue turning them out to graze upon the sides of the said roads. No actual obstruction of the plaintiff's cattle was caused on either day on which the alleged trespasses took place by the acts referred to in the 17th paragraph.

19. The defendant had himself, in the year 1875 been a lessee under the local board of the alleged right of herbage in certain of the said roads, but not in any of those let in 1876 to the plaintiff, and the defendant had refused to pay the local board for the right of herbage so let to him, upon the ground that other persons had depastured such herbage without his permission. Save under such letting it did not appear that the defendant had ever before the 25th April 1876 put any of his horses or other cattle to graze in any of the said roads.

It has been agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that if the judgment of the court be for the plaintiff the amount of the damages is to be 1s.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

Costs of the trial to abide the event of the action.

Wille, Q.C. (Wilberforce with him), for the plaintiff, as to the private road, argued that the plaintiff had under the circumstances stated in the case sufficient possession to entitle him to recover. They cited

Chatteris v. Cooper, 4 Taunt. 547;

Heath v. Milward, 2 B. N. C. 98;

Every v. Smith, 26 L. J. 344, Ex.

As to the public road he relied on sects. 3, 144, and 149 of the Public Health Act 1875 (a), which "vests" all highways in urban authorities.

(a) The 149th section is as follows: "All streets being or which at any time become highways repairable by the inhabitants at large within any urban district, and the pavements, stones, and other materials thereof, and all buildings, implements, and other things provided for the purposes thereof, shall vest in and be under the control of the urban authority."

The urban authority shall from time to time cause all such streets to be levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, altered, and repaired as occasion may require; they may from time to time cause the soil of any such street to be raised, lowered, or altered as they may think fit, and may place and keep in repair fences and posts for the safety of foot passengers.

Any person who without the consent of the urban authority wilfully displaces or takes up, or who injures the pavement, stones, materials, fences, or posts of, or the trees in, any such street, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and to a further penalty not exceeding five shillings for every square foot of pave-

Dodd, for the defendant, as to the private road, argued that the plaintiff had no more legal possession of the pasture than the defendant; and as to the public road, contended that the local board had no power over that road, except for the purposes of repairing or otherwise improving it, and that the word "vest" in the statute ought to be read in a restricted sense, so as not to give the board any power to make money out of the road.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that this case differs materially in regard to the two ways. First, there is a way which is an admitted highway; and secondly, there is a way which is admittedly a private way. Our judgment must be for the plaintiff as to the highway, and for the defendant as to the private way. The question as to the highway turns upon the construction of sect. 149 of the Public Health Act 1875, read by the light of sect. 4. By sect. 149 it is enacted that "all streets which at any time become highways, and the pavements, stones, and other materials thereof, and all buildings, implements, and other things provided for the purposes thereof, shall vest in and be under the control of the urban authority." By sect. 4, the interpretation clause of the statute, it is provided that "street includes any highway (not being a turnpike road) and any public bridge (not being a county bridge), and any road, lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage whether a thoroughfare or not." The public highway in the present case comes within this definition. Then by the effect of sect. 149 it is "vested in and under the control of the urban authority." To see what the urban authority may do we may also go to sect. 144, from which we learn that the urban authority "shall within their district, exclusively of any other person, exercise the office of and be surveyor of highways;" and we also learn from other parts of the Act the urban authority in an urban district is the local board. It may be somewhat startling to find that under the term street a grass lane is included; but if the Legislature chooses so to enact, of course it must be so. This highway, therefore, is vested in the local board. It is suggested that by the word "vested" ownership in the proper sense of the term is not intended to be conferred, but merely a power of dealing with the highway; but I ment, stones, or other materials so displaced, taken up, or injured; he shall also be liable in the case of any injury to trees to pay to the local authority such amount of compensation as the court may award."

Sect. 144. "Every urban authority shall within their district, exclusively of any other person, execute the office of and be surveyor of highways, and have, exercise, and be subject to all the powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities of surveyors of highways under the law for the time being in force, save so far as such powers, authorities, or duties are or may be inconsistent with the provisions of this Act; every urban authority shall also have, exercise, and be subject to all the powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities which by the Highway Act 1835, or any Act amending the same, are vested in and given to the inhabitants in vestry assembled of any parish within their district."

All ministerial acts required by any Act of Parliament to be done by or to the surveyor of highways may be done by or to the surveyor to the urban authority, or by or to such other person as they may appoint.

By sect. 3, "Street" includes any highway (not being a turnpike road), and any public bridge (not being a county bridge), and any road, lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage, whether a thoroughfare or not.

BRAMPTON UNION (apps.) v. CARLISLE UNION (resps.)

think that this limited interpretation of "vested" is not the correct one. The highway is put so entirely under the control of the local board that they may turn it into a metalled road, and the section contains no words of limitation whatever. It may be that this interpretation which we are giving to the statute presses hardly on the owners of the soil on each side of the road, reversing as it does the maxim usque ad medium filum. But the Legislature is omnipotent, and if it is so enacted so it must be. The road belongs to the local board, and they may let it to whom they please. Secondly, as to the private way. Mr. Wills argues that the plaintiff has sufficient possession, because the defendant does not set up any right. Now the state of things which at present exists no doubt arose in this manner. This way was set out of a common, and although the way was made and allotted, the old commoners went on turning out their cattle as before. The plaintiff says that he has as good a right as anybody else. But I think we may start with this proposition: The local board had no right in the soil of this way, had no right to deal with or to let the pasture. The plaintiff has no better right than the local board—that is, none. All the plaintiff has done is to turn out his cattle. But does such an act as that give him such possession of the whole pasture as to say that he has a right of grant over the whole? Surely not. He turned out his cattle, no doubt, under a claim of right, but it is a claim which proves to be fictitious. He cannot claim such a right of possession as to be able to turn out other people. As to the private way, therefore, judgment will be for the defendant, and as to the highway for the plaintiff.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that I think the facts are hardly so satisfactory as to point to a definite conclusion, but on the whole I am of the opinion that there is a distinction, not shadowy but real, between these two ways. I think that Mr. Dodd is wrong in his suggestion as to the meaning of "vesting." That word does not mean only "vested for limited purposes" such as flagging. No doubt certain purposes are mentioned in the latter part of the section, but the mention of them is not made with a limiting intention. There was, therefore, a right in the plaintiff to maintain trespass against a person not having a superior right to his own. We then come to the distinction between the right to maintain possession and the right to bring trespass. I throw no doubt whatever on any of the authorities which have been cited, but I cannot help observing that they all have reference to an ownership in the soil. Now the Inclosure Act at first vested the herbage, but it turned out that the Inclosure Commissioners had no power so to vest it. This private road therefore never belonged to the local board. But the rule usque ad medium filum was got rid of, because the road was set out under the Inclosure Act, and allotted to the lord of the manor. Now the history of the case shows that many people had turned out cattle, and that plaintiff had the right of pasturage only. The local board do not affect to let him the land itself. Beyond a mere licence therefore the plaintiff has nothing. Therefore, when the defendant says to the plaintiff, "I do not care for your agreement with the local board; I shall treat it a nullity," the plaintiff cannot maintain trespass, because he has no exclusive right of possession.

BRAMPTON UNION (apps.) v. CARLISLE UNION (resps.) (a)

Poor law—Settlement by three years' irremovability—Parochial relief before passing of Act—39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34.

A pauper resided between 1865 and 1869 in a parish, belonging neither to the appellants' nor the respondents' union, for the term of three years in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render him irremovable.

From 1869 to 1877 he continued to reside in the same parish, but was throughout that period in receipt of parochial relief.

In 1877 he went to a parish in the respondents' union, and was shortly afterwards ordered to be removed to the parish of his birth settlement, which was in the appellants' union.

Held, upon a case stated at quarter sessions, that there was nothing to deprive a pauper of the settlement acquired by his status of irremovability according to the terms required by sect. 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876, if existing at the time of the passing of that Act; and that the pauper had acquired a settlement by residence in the said parish.

1. THIS was a case stated by the justices of the peace for the county of Cumberland, in an appeal against an order for the removal of James Little, a pauper, wherein the guardians of the Brampton Union were the appellants, and the guardians of the Carlisle Union the respondents.

2. The said James Little, the pauper, for whose removal the order appealed against was made, was born in or about the year 1810, at Williams Gill, in the parish of Farlam, in the appellants' union.

3. In the year 1865 the said James Little went to reside at Gateshead, in the county of Durham, out of the appellants' union and continued to reside in Gateshead from that time till the 2nd April 1877.

4. The said James Little had in the year 1866 acquired by his residence in Gateshead a status of irremovability from the Gateshead Union entitling him not to be removed from the said union; and the status of irremovability continued throughout the said residence of the said James Little to the time of his going to Carlisle hereinafter mentioned.

5. At the latter part of the year 1869 the said James Little, while so residing at Gateshead as aforesaid, met with an accident, and a few weeks afterwards began to receive relief from the said Gateshead Union, and continued to receive weekly relief from the said union till he went to Carlisle as stated in next paragraph.

6. On the 2nd April 1877 the said James Little

REG. v. HANCOCK AND BAKER.

went to Carlisle to stay with his daughter, and shortly afterwards was received into the work-house of the Carlisle Union, where he has since then remained.

7. On the 6th Oct. 1877 an order for the removal of the said James Little was made by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Cumberland, adjudging that the place of the last legal settlement of the said James Little was the parish of Farlam in the appellants' union, and ordering the removal of the said James Little to the appellants' union.

8. The appellants' appealed to the quarter sessions of the county of Cumberland, holden in January of the present year, against the said order of removal, on the ground amongst others that the said James Little by virtue of the facts stated in paragraphs 3 and 4 obtained a legal settlement in the Gateshead Union; and the quarter sessions, being of opinion that the said James Little had not obtained a legal settlement in the Gateshead Union, and that the place of the last legal settlement of the said James Little was the parish of Farlam in the appellants' union, confirmed the said order of removal, subject to a special case.

9. The question for the court is whether, on the 6th Oct. 1877, the said James Little had a legal settlement in the Gateshead Union.

10. If the court shall be of opinion that the said James Little on the 6th of Oct. 1877 had not a legal settlement in the Gateshead Union, then the said order of removal is to be confirmed; but if the court shall be of opinion that the said James Little on the 6th Oct. had a legal settlement in the Gateshead Union, then the said order of removal is to be quashed.

Poland (with him Shes), for the respondents, supported the order of removal, and showed cause against the rule to bring up the affirming order of quarter sessions. By sect. 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61): "Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish, in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years, as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise." By the Irremovability Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 66) s. 1, the time to constitute the irremovability of any person is not to be counted "during which any such person shall receive relief from any parish." It was held in Reg. v. Ipswich Union (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 269) that a person who had resided in a parish for a term of three years, but whose residence therein had ended before the passing of the Act, did not acquire a settlement therein under sect. 34 of the Act of 1876. The only difference between that case and this is that the period of residence which created the settlement was there concluded by departure from the parish before the Act was passed; here the same period was similarly concluded by the receipt of relief before the Act was passed. [LUSH, J.—Here the pauper continued irremovable after the passing of the Act. COCKBURN, C.J.—Can he lose his settlement by mere receipt of relief?] The Act must receive a retrospective interpretation in order to make this residence a settlement.

Henry and Elliot appeared for the appellants, but were not heard.

By the COURT (COCKBURN, C.J., MELLOR, and LUSH, JJ.)—There is clearly nothing in the receipt of relief to deprive a pauper of the settlement acquired by his status of irremovability, if the residence has been for three years, which exists at the passing of the Act.

REG. v. HANCOCK AND BAKER. (a)

Feloniously receiving—Restoration of stolen goods to owner—Subsequent delivery to the thief for detection of the receiver.

A lad was detained on leaving his master's premises, and a policeman sent for, who searched him and took a stolen cigar from him in the master's presence. In consequence of the lad's statement, the cigar was returned to him with five others, which the lad took to the prisoner and gave to him.

Held, that the prisoner could not be convicted of feloniously receiving the cigars knowing them to be stolen, for that they were not stolen property at the time they were received, the master and the policeman having acted in concert in supplying the lad with the six cigars, and instructing him what to do with them.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by W. F. Harrison, Esq., Chairman of the Second Court at the General Quarter Sessions of the peace for the county of Surrey, held by adjournment at St. Mary, Newington, on the 3rd June 1878.

William Emmett Hancock and Henry Robert Baker were tried upon the following indictment:

Surrey.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen, on their oath present, that William Emmett Hancock, on the 23rd May 1878, then being servant to James Gabriel, one cigar of the property of the said James Gabriel, his master, feloniously did steal, take, and carry away, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

Second count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that Henry Robert Baker on the same day and in the year aforesaid, one cigar (being the same property as the said William Emmett Hancock in the first count of this indictment is charged with stealing) of the property of the said James Gabriel, before then feloniously stolen, taken, and carried away, feloniously did receive and have, the said Henry Robert Baker then well knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen, taken, and carried away, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

The prisoner Hancock having pleaded guilty, the following evidence was adduced in support of the charge against the other prisoner Baker.

(a) Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CR. CAS. RES.]

REG. v. HANCOCK AND BAKER.

James Gabriel proved that he was a cigar manufacturer, at 320, Walworth-road, in the parish of St. Mary, Newington, in this county, and that the prisoner Hancock entered his service as shop boy on the day named in the indictment.

That about seven in the evening, as the prisoner was about to leave work for the day, the witness saw him take a cigar (without permission) from the mantelshelf of the shop, and put it in his pocket.

That witness having already missed goods, sent for a detective, and obtained the services of Edmund Reid, an officer of the P Division.

That witness saw Reid take the cigar from Hancock and mark it, and then give it back to the prisoner with five others and certain instructions.

This witness stated in cross-examination that he occasionally had in his possession broken cigars, which he worked up again, and was never in the habit of giving them to persons in his employ.

Edmund Reid proved that he was a detective officer of the P Division, and that between seven and eight in the evening of the day in question he was called to the prosecutor's, and in his presence searched the prisoner Hancock, and found the cigar in his trousers pocket. That he questioned this prisoner, and, in consequence of what he learnt from him, marked the cigar and returned it to him, at the same time giving him five other cigars and instructions how to act. That this prisoner thereupon went, followed by Reid, to a coal store, in Smith-street, Portland-street, Walworth, where Reid saw the other prisoner Baker standing; that Hancock went up to Baker and handed something to him. That Reid then accosted Baker, telling him who he was, and inquired what Hancock had given him, to which inquiry Baker replied "Nothing," meaning that Hancock had given him nothing. To which Reid replied, "I saw him give you something." That Baker then said, "I know you are a constable, and here they are," at the same time handing Reid six cigars, one being the marked one. That Reid thereupon said to Baker, "You've incited this boy to rob his master, and received the cigars he has stolen." That another lad named Maunders was there at the time. That he then apprehended Baker, and took him to the police station.

The prisoner Hancock, a lad thirteen years of age, was then called for the prosecution and gave the following evidence:

"On the 23rd May last I entered the employment of the prosecutor, and about 7 p.m., on leaving work for the day, I took a cigar and put it in my pocket. Shortly after I gave it up to detective Reid, who returned it to me with some others. I took it because prisoner Baker, whom I knew, had told me to get him as many as I could. He had told me that day at dinner time that if I did he would give me something on the following Saturday. I took all the six cigars to the coal store in Smith-street, where he works, and gave them to him. Detective Reid and William Maunders then came up, and Reid spoke to Baker, and then we all went to the police station."

In cross-examination this witness stated that before coming to prosecutor's he had been in a printing office in the city, which was his first place, and lost it through being absent from work part of a day to get fitted with some new clothes.

That he never said anything to Baker about boys being allowed damaged cigars, nor told him that prosecutor had offered him (Hancock) damaged cigars. That Baker did not say to him, "Get me some damaged cigars," but "Get me as many as you can."

William Maunders, another lad in the employ of the prosecutor, proved accompanying Hancock and detective Reid to Smith-street, and seeing Hancock hand some cigars to Baker, who said, "Thank you, I'll see you by-and-by, that'll do, won't it?" And then put them in his pocket; when someone standing near said, "Look out," and Baker then took them out of his pocket and held them in his hand under his coat, and after something more was said, handed them to Reid.

This witness stated in cross-examination that he had been two years in the prosecutor's employment, and that the latter had never given him a broken cigar. That when cigars were damaged they were made up afresh.

The statement made by the prisoner Baker before the committing magistrate was then put in and read as follows:

"Yesterday at dinner time Hancock came round to the coal shed and said, 'I have started work, Harry.' I said, 'Where at?' He said, 'At Gabriel's in the Walworth-road.' He said, 'Other boys have damaged cigars given them what gets chucked into the damaged bag, and Mr. Gabriel offered me two at dinner time.' He said, 'I wouldn't have them then, but Mr. Gabriel said he would give me some more to-night when I leave off work.' I said, 'I'll buy them off you.'"

This closed the case for the prosecution.

The prisoner Baker's counsel then submitted that there was no case to go to the jury, on the ground that the stolen cigar, the subject of the indictment, had been taken out of the possession of the thief by the detective officer in the presence of the owner, and was therefore not stolen goods when the prisoner Baker received it; and the case of Reg. v. Dolan (Dearsley C. C. 436; and 24 L. J. 59, M. C., 6 Cox C.C. 449) was cited and relied on.

I refused; however, to stop the case, and told the jury, after the usual caution as to the prisoner's (Hancock's) evidence, that if they believed that the prisoner Baker received the marked cigar from Hancock with the knowledge and belief that the latter had stolen it, they ought to find him (Baker) guilty.

The prisoner having been convicted, his counsel applied that a case might be reserved for the opinion of this honourable court, which the court assented to, the judgment on the prisoner Baker being respited in the meantime, and the prisoner released on bail.

If the Court should be of opinion that the conviction was right, it is to stand; otherwise it is to be quashed.

Baggalloy, for the prisoner Hancock, submitted, on the authority of Reg. v. Dolan (24 L. J. 59, M. C.; Dears. C. C. 436; 6 Cox C. C. 449), that the conviction was wrong. At the time Hancock received the cigar from Baker it had ceased to be a stolen chattel, it having been previously restored to his master and given back to Baker for a specified object. The fact that five other cigars along with the one Baker had taken were given to him to take to Hancock showed that Baker was then acting under the master's instructions.

COCKBURN, C.J.—At the time the cigar was received by the prisoner it had been reduced into the possession of the master, or, if you please, of the police, and Baker was then employed as an instrument to detect Hancock.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The cigar was taken by the policeman, and the instructions to Baker what to do with it were given by the policeman, but then the master was present all the time. In Reg. v. Dolan, Cresswell, J. said: "If it were necessary to hold that the policeman by taking the stolen goods out of the pocket of Rogers restored the possession of them to the owner, I should dissent. The goods in the policeman's hands were in the custody of the law, and the master could not have brought trover for them; but when they were given back to Rogers, and the master desired him to go and sell them, the master, I think, may be said to have employed Rogers for that purpose." That learned judge treated the thief as the agent of the master, for the purpose of detecting the receiver.

COCKBURN, C.J.—In Reg. v. Dolan Lord Campbell evidently assumed that what was done in that case by the police was done in concert with the master. I should infer the same in the present case.

Lilley for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. When the cigar was taken from the prisoner Baker by the police, it was in the custody of the law, and the policeman was not bound to restore it to the master. Here the master gave no authority to the policeman to act as he did. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Who gave the other five cigars to the policeman to give to him?]

COCKBURN, C.J.—The present case is undistinguishable in principle from Reg. v. Dolan, and the conviction must be quashed.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction quashed.

REG. v. PETCH.(a)

Larceny—Wild rabbits—Taking and carrying away—Possession.

The prisoner was employed to trap wild rabbits, and it was his duty to take them when trapped to the head keeper. Contrary to his duty he trapped from time to time rabbits, and took them to another part of the land and placed them in a bag, which another keeper observing, went and took some of the rabbits out of the bag during the prisoner's absence and nicked them, and put them into the bag. His reason for nicking them was that he might know them again. The prisoner afterwards took away the bag and the rabbits with the intention of appropriating them to his own use.

Held, that the act of the keeper in nicking the rabbits was no reduction of them into the possession of the master, so as to make the prisoner guilty of stealing them.

THIS was a case reserved for the opinion of this Court by B. B. Hunter Rodwell, Esq., Q.C., M.P. the chairman of the second court of the West Suffolk Quarter Sessions.

The prisoner was indicted under the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, sect. 67, for larceny, as a servant to the Maharajah Dhuleep Sing, of sixty-one dead rabbits, the property of his master. There was also a count for receiving.

The prisoner was employed by the Maharajah to trap rabbits upon a part of his estate, and it was the duty of the prisoner forthwith to take daily the rabbits so trapped to the head keeper.

On the morning of the 9th Feb., about half-past eleven, an under-keeper named Howlett, also employed by the Maharajah, was out on his beat in the parish of North Stowe, where he observed the prisoner go three or four times from the places where his rabbit traps were set to a spot near a furze bush on his beat. On examining this later in the day, he found sixty-one dead rabbits in a bag hidden in a hole in the earth near the furze bush. Howlett took twenty of the rabbits out of the bag and marked them by cutting a small slit under throat. He then replaced them in the bag, and covered it up in the hole in the ground as before. In cross-examination Howlett said that his reason for marking the rabbits was that he might know them again.

Early on the following Sunday morning the prisoner was seen by Howlett and a police constable, who had been watching the spot, to take the rabbits from the hole in the ground and put them in his cart, and he was driving the cart away along the road in a contrary direction to the head keeper's house, where he should have deposited them, when he was stopped and taken into custody by the police.

Counsel for the prisoner contended that there was no evidence to go to the jury of the larceny charged in the indictment, and referred to Reg. v. Townley, L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 315; 12 Cox. C. C. 59.

The Court, however, held that there was evidence to go to the jury of larceny, and that the present case was distinguishable from that of Reg. v. Townley, in consequence of the continuity of the possession having been broken by Howlett, the servant of the Maharajah, having taken twenty of the rabbits out of the bag and marked them as described.

The Court agreed with the contention of counsel for the prisoner that there was no evidence of any intention on the part of the prisoner to abandon possession of the rabbits, and this point was not left to the jury.

The Court left the case generally to the jury, who found the prisoner guilty of the larceny charged, and the prisoner was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour; execution of the judgment was respited until the decision of this court.

The Court reserved for the opinion of this Court the question whether, upon these facts, the prisoner was properly convicted of the larceny charged.

Kingsford (Malden with him).—The conviction was wrong. There was no larceny here. "Theft may be committed by taking and carrying away without the consent of the owner (even if he expects and affords facilities for the commission of the offence) anything which is not in the possession of the thief at the time when the offence is committed, whether it is in the possession of any other persons or not . . . If the thing taken and carried away is for the first time rendered capable of being stolen by the act of taking and carrying away, and if the taking and carrying away are one continuous act, such taking and carrying away is not theft, except in the cases provided for in arts. 326, 327. It seems that the taking and carrying away are deemed to be continuous if the intention to carry away after a reasonable time exists at the time of taking." (Sir J. F. Stephen's Dig. Crim. Law, art. 296.) In this case the rabbits were always in the prisoner's possession, and never in that of the master, and that being so, Reg. v. Townley is an authority that the prisoner is not guilty of larceny. This continuity of possession of the rabbits was not broken by the act of Howlett going and nicking the rabbits. That was done for the purpose of identifying them, not for reducing them into the possession of the master. [FIELD, J.—And with the intention that the prisoner should have possession of them.] The distinction taken by the chairman is not consistent with the facts. The judgment of Blackburn, J. in Reg. v. Townley was referred to, and also the case of Reg. v. Read (14 Cox C.C. 17; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. Div. 131).

No counsel appeared for the prosecution.

COCKBURN, C. J. — This conviction must be quashed. The case is really governed by that of Reg. v. Townley, where the law on the subject is fully stated in the judgment of Blackburn, J. At common law, to constitute larceny it was necessary that there should be a taking and carrying away of the chattels. And among the instances put in the old books are those of growing trees, and lead fixed to a building, which constitute part of the freeholds where a severance was necessary to turn them into chattels, and unless there was an interval between the one act of turning them into chattels and the other act of taking them away during which there was a change in the possession from the person who severed them to that of the owner, the final act of carrying them away by the person who severed them did not form the subject-matter of larceny. So in the present case, although property in wild animals, as decided in Blades v. Higgs (11 H. of L. Cas. 621) becomes that of the owner by being killed on his land, it does not follow that when a man without right goes upon the land and kills wild animals they become so reduced into the possession of the owner of the land as to render the man liable to the charge of larceny for carrying them away. In Reg. v. Reid the principle was the same as that which governs this case. It is true that in this case the prisoner was employed to trap rabbits, and he had authority to kill rabbits, and that availing himself of that authority, he trapped and killed rabbits, but that was not in fulfilment of his duty, but with the intention of taking the rabbits for his own purposes and not for his master. He reduced them into his own possession and not that of his master. In no sense did he reduce them into the possession of his master, for he took them direct from the trap to where the bag was concealed and put them into his bag. The only circumstance that appears to distinguish this case is the fact that the keeper Howlett marked some of the rabbits, but that was done not with the intention of altering the possession of them, but for the purpose of identifying them. That fact does not make any difference in the case. I am of opinion that the conviction should be quashed.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of the same opinion. This case was reserved that it might be determined whether there was any distinction between it and Reg. v. Townley, and whether the nicking of the rabbits by the keeper could be considered as a reducing of them into the possession of the master. There is really no distinction. It is impossible to say that all that the prisoner did was not in his conduct as a thief.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no question raised as to any reduction of the rabbits into the possession of the master by the act of trapping them, but it is said that the continuity of possession by the prisoner was broken by the act of the keeper in going to the trap and nicking the rabbits. It appears to me that there is no foundation for any distinction between this case and Reg. v. Townley.

HUDDESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion. There was no intention on the part of the prisoner to abandon his possession of the rabbits. I agree that the act of the keeper in nicking the rabbits was not for the purpose of reducing them into the possession of the master, but for identifying them. I do not agree in the distinction of this case from Reg. v. Townley drawn by the chairman of the court of quarter sessions. There was no evidence from which it might have been inferred that the rabbits had been reduced into the possession of the master.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Conviction quashed.

Re A Scheme for the Administration of Hodgson's School at Wiggonby. (a)

Endowed Schools Act 1869, sects. 11, 19, 23—Religious opinions of governing body—Powers of commissioners—Educational interests of privileged persons.

On a petition of appeal against a scheme framed by the commissioners under the Endowed Schools Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 56):

- Held* (1) That a provision that the rector of the parish, for the time being, should be a member of the governing body (ex officio), was not a "provision respecting the religious opinions of the governing body," with sect. 19 of the Act.
- (2) That clauses establishing a visitatorial jurisdiction in the commissioners were within sect. 23 of the Act, which authorises the commissioners to insert in any scheme "all powers and provisions that may be thought expedient for carrying its objects into effect."
- (3) That a provision that children who, under the original deed of foundation had been the special object of the founder's bounty, should have occasional chances of competing, when educated elsewhere, for scholarships and exhibitions, did not pay "due regard" to their educational interests as required by sect. 11 of the Act, the scheme not providing for their admission as of right to the school as day scholars.

Seemle, that when the commissioners think it right to abolish any privileges or advantages given to any class by the original foundation, it is not necessary to give to such class any new privilege, preference, or advantage.

THIS was an appeal by the existing trustees of a foundation known as "Hodgeson's Endowed School at Wiggonby," in the parish of Aikton, in the county of Cumberland.

The school was founded by an indenture, dated the 19th Oct. 1792, and made between Margaret Hodgeson of the one part, and nine persons therein described, being trustees nominated by the said Margaret Hodgeson for the management of the charity of the other part; and the school was further endowed by the will of Margaret Hodgeson, dated the 3rd April 1797.

The school had no other endowment, except some small bequests made at various times, and invested by the trustees.

The respondents were the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, who had framed a scheme for the management of the foundation in exercise of their powers under the Endowed Schools Acts 1869, 1873, and 1874.

The scheme was approved by the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education on the 10th Aug. 1877, but the appellants presented a petition of appeal against it, for reasons which appear sufficiently from the judgment of their Lordships.

Wills, Q.C. and Latham appeared for the appellants, the trustees of the charity.

H. Davey, Q.C. and Romer, for the respondents, the Charity Commissioners.

June 6.—The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD SALBORNE.—Five objections were taken by the appellants, the governors of the Wiggonby School to the scheme settled by the Charity Commissioners for the future administration of that foundation, under the endowed Schools Acts; as to two of which their Lordships did not think it necessary to hear the respondents. There remain three other objections, which their Lordships will consider, not exactly in the same order in which they were presented to them. The first relates to the appointment of the rector of Aikton for the time being as an ex-officio governor, which was said to be a "provision respecting the religious opinions of the governing body," contrary to the concluding words of sect. 19 of the Act of 1869. It has been decided, by Her Majesty in Council, that, in cases falling within the 17th section of the same Act, the holder for the time being of an ecclesiastical office in the Church of England cannot lawfully be made an ex-officio member of the governing body of an educational endowment; the commissioners being by that section required to provide, in every scheme to which it is applicable, "that the religious opinions of any persons shall not in any way affect his qualification for being one of the governing body." The ground of that decision may be presumed to have been that particular religious tenets are implied in, and are necessary conditions of, the tenure of an ecclesiastical office, and must, therefore, "affect the qualification," consisting in the incumbency of such an office. The words at the end of sect. 19 are very different. They direct, not what a scheme shall, but what (without the consent of the existing governors) it shall not provide. What they prohibit is, not a qualification for a particular place on the governing body, which may be "in any way affected" by a man's religious opinions, but any provision "respecting the religious opinions of the governing body." And this occurs in a section relative to a particular class of denominational schools, of which it is intended to preserve (subject only to a conscience clause) the denominational character, and which, for that reason, are thereby expressly exempted from the operation of the 17th section, unless the existing governors consent that they shall be made subject thereto. Their Lordships agree with the argument of the respondent's counsel, that the object of the concluding part of sect. 19 was only to fortify the former part of the same section, and to prevent the commissioners from making particular religious opinions more or less necessary, in these cases, than they were before, to qualify, generally, for the office of governor. This particular school is a Church of England school in the strictest sense; and by the law, as settled by the House of Lords in the Ilminster School case (Baker v. Lee, 8 H. of L. Cas. 495), all the members of its governing body ought properly, before the scheme was made, to have been members of the Church of England. No religious opinions are implied in the office of rector of the parish of Aikton, except those which, independently of the scheme, would have been held, by the Court of Chancery, to be necessary to qualify for the office of governor or trustee. In the plain and natural sense of the words, "any provision respecting the religious opinions of the governing body," there is here no such provision; and to say that the office of rector shall not in this case be made a qualification for one place on that body, merely because the holder of that office must necessarily belong to the church, in the catechism of which the children of this school are to be instructed (and instructed publicly in the church by the rector himself), and the worship of which they are required to attend, would, in their Lordships' opinion, be to contravene the spirit of the entire section by an unnecessary implication from the letter of this part of it. Before leaving this point, it may be right to notice a passage in the will of the foundress, which was referred to in the argument, to the effect that it was her "meaning and desire that no minister of the gospel in holy orders officiating at any church or chapel shall, at any time, be schoolmaster of the said school, nor any of the trustees for the time being." Their Lordships understand this passage, not as directing that no clergyman officiating at any church or chapel shall be a trustee, but that neither any such clergyman, nor any one of the trustees for the time being, shall ever be schoolmaster of the school. The objection with which their Lordships think it convenient next to deal had reference to the 33rd and 34th clauses of the scheme, which were said to confer upon the Charity Commissioners larger powers of deciding questions arising under the scheme, and binding all persons interested by such decisions, than belong to them by law under the Acts defining their general powers as to charities; and it was suggested, that such larger powers were in excess of the objects for which the commissioners were authorised to provide by schemes under the Endowed Schools Acts. Their Lordships are not satisfied that the difference be-between these particular clauses and the general powers of the commissioners is a really substantial one, or is at variance with the spirit and general intention of the Acts by which those powers are conferred; but, taking that difference to be as great as it was contended to be by the appellant's counsel, it does not follow that these clauses are therefore ultra vires. The 23rd section of the Act of 1869 authorises the commissioners to insert in any scheme "all powers and provisions that may be thought expedient for carrying its objects into effect;" and their Lordships have reason to believe that these particular clauses are in a common form, which has been adopted in many schemes for other endowed schools already approved by Her Majesty in Council. Their purpose, that of establishing in the commissioners, with respect to the cases for which they provide, a species of arbitral or visitatorial jurisdiction, sufficient to indemnify the governors and to bind the objects of the charity within certain limits, may reasonably have been thought expedient for carrying the objects of the scheme into effect. And it is to be observed that they relate only to questions affecting the regularity or the validity of proceedings "under the scheme," and as to the proper construction or application of the provisions "of the scheme." Their Lordships, after full consideration, are of opinion that it cannot be held to be ultra vires of the authority by which the scheme itself was made, so to provide for the settlement of questions of this nature arising under that scheme. The objection which their Lordships have reserved for consideration in the last place arises under the 11th section of the Act of 1869, which is thus worded: "It shall be the duty of the commissioners, in every scheme which abolishes or modifies any privileges or educational advantages to which a particular class of persons are entitled, and that whether as inhabitants of a particular area or otherwise, to have due regard to the educational interests of such class of persons." The 39th section of the same Act makes any scheme, "not having due regard to any educational interests" in the cases contemplated by this 11th section, the proper subject of an appeal (by the governing body) to Her Majesty in Council. The appellants say, that in the present scheme due regard is not had to the educational interests of three classes of persons, who have hitherto, under the deed and will of the foundress, enjoyed special privileges or educational advantages, which will be abolished or modified by the scheme, viz.:—(1) All persons of the name of Hodgson, whencesoever coming, who may think fit to attend this school; (2) All children of poor persons within the parish of Aikton not having real estate worth 20*l.* per annum; and (3) All children of poor persons within the parishes of Brough-by-Sands and Beaumont not having real estate worth 12*l.* per annum. By the deed and will the benefits of the foundation were open to these three classes of persons (under some limitations, as to age, affecting the two latter of them), and to them alone. The objection is, that the scheme supersedes all provisions of the deed and will by which these privileges and advantages were conferred, and makes its own provisions the sole rule (subject to an immaterial exception in clause 37) for the future administration of the charity; and that there is no provision in any part of the scheme by which any educational interests of any of these classes of persons are directly or indirectly regarded, except the 29th clause. That clause gives certain opportunities of competing for scholarships or exhibitions to boys or girls educated either in the school of the foundation, or in "some elementary school in any of the parishes mentioned in the schedule" (being ten parishes in Cumberland, of which Aikton, Brough-by-Sands, and Beaumont, are three), with an absolute preference, as to scholarships, of duly qualified candidates from the school of the foundation, and a ceteris paribus preference, as to exhibitions, of candidates from the school of the foundation, or from "an elementary school in the parish of Brough-by-Sands or of Beaumont." Their Lordships are of opinion that unless, upon the true construction of the scheme, children of the three classes who were the objects of the foundress's bounty are still admissible, as of right, upon fair and equitable terms, to the school itself, due regard has not been had to their educational interests, by merely giving them these occasional chances of competing, when educated elsewhere, for scholarships and exhibitions. Their Lordships do not doubt that it was intended by the commissioners (as they have been assured by the commissioners' counsel at the bar) that all such children, if resident within such a distance as might be consistent with their attending the school as day scholars (and indeed all other children, whether of the three parishes favoured by the foundress or of any others who might be able to do so) should be admissible to the school under such reasonable regulations as the governing body might from time to time make. And if it were clear that the scheme had provided for this, their Lordships would have thought that sufficient regard had been shown to the educational interests of those classes (although their exclusive privileges would have been abolished), subject only to the question whether they ought, under any circumstances, to have priority in the order of admission to the school. But the difficulty is, that the scheme nowhere directly says what children—of any classes or class whatever—are to be admissible to the school, and contains no rules whatever as to their admission. All this seems to be left to the Governors. The capacity of the school buildings (which are to be enlarged) is, indeed, to be "suitable for not less than 100 day scholars," and it may be inferred, from clauses 24, 25, and 28, that the commissioners had in view the general character and conditions of a public elementary school, capable of receiving the benefits provided for such schools by the Elementary Education Act of 1870. But even if the Elementary Education Act of 1870 could for this purpose be referred to, there is nothing in that Act which, being read into this scheme, would show that children from the parishes of Brough-by-Sands and Beaumont, or persons of the name of Hodgson not residing in the parish of Aikton, would be admissible, as of right, to the school. There being nothing to that effect in the scheme, the very large powers of making regulations, conferred upon the governors by clause 32, would seem to enable them (if they should think fit) to exclude these classes of children, or some of them; or, at all events, to decline to recognise them as entitled of right to the benefit of the charity. It may be that, as the school buildings are situate in the parish of Aikton, there would be a necessary inference in favour of the right of poor children of that parish; but their Lordships do not see how, without falling back on the directions (which are exclusive) contained in the deed and will of the foundress, such an implication could be extended to children from the other two parishes, or to persons of the name of Hodgson not resident in Aikton. Their Lordships, therefore, have come (though reluctantly) to the conclusion, that there is not in this scheme enough to satisfy the requirements of the 11th section of the Act of 1869, and they think it their duty to advise Her Majesty to remit it to the Charity Commissioners for amendment; with a declaration, that, in its present form, it is defective, as not having due regard to the educational interests of the several classes of persons who were entitled, under the deed and will of the foundress, Margaret Hodgson, to the privileges or educational advantages which it is intended to abolish or modify. Although it would not, in their opinion, be proper, by Her Majesty's order, to give any further directions for the government of the commissioners, it may be useful for their Lordships to add, that they do not adopt the view that any new privilege, preference, or exclusive advantage need be given, by any scheme under these Acts, to a class originally favoured, when the commissioners think it right to abolish the original privilege or advantage. In the present case, it appears to them, that if children named Hodgson, who can conveniently attend the school as day-scholars, and children from the three parishes originally favoured, are recognised as entitled to be educated, under reasonable regulations, in this school, no preference or advantage need be conferred upon them beyond this, that, as the school is to be limited to 100 children, it may probably be right to give them priority of admission, ceteris paribus, if the number of duly qualified applicants for admission should at any time exceed the number of vacancies for the time being in the school. As to age, and as to examination (if the governors should think it right to submit candidates for admission to a competitive or any other kind of preliminary examination), their Lordships see no reason why they (the Hodgsons included) should not be placed on exactly the same footing with other children, not of the favoured classes; who may, if found better qualified in these respects, be admitted in preference to them. And their Lordships think that due regard may well be paid to the educational interests of the Hodgsons, without allowing them to remain in the school beyond the age which may be limited as to other scholars. Their Lordships do not think that this is a case which either the appellants or the respondents ought to be ordered to pay costs.

Re SHAFTOE'S CHARITY AT HAYDON BRIDGE. (a)

Endowed Schools Act 1869, sects. 13 and 39—Vested interests—Persons directly affected by scheme—Right of appeal.

Sect. 39 of the Endowed Schools Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 56) gives to the governing body of any endowment, or to any person or body directly affected by any scheme, an appeal to the Queen in Council, on the grounds (1) of any decision of the commissioners from which an appeal lies; (2) of the scheme not saving or making due compensation for their vested interests as required by the Act; (3) of the scheme not being in uniformity with the Act; and to the governing body alone on the ground (4) of the scheme not having due regard to the educational interests of any privileged class.

Sect. 13 of the Act defines the vested interests to be saved, or for which compensation is to be made, as those of existing foundationers, exhibitioners, masters, pensioners, and governors.

Held, that the inhabitants and ratepayers of the chapelry in which a school was situated, who had enjoyed the privilege of sending their children to the school free of payment, had no locus standi under sect. 39 to appeal against a scheme which took away such privilege.

THIS was an appeal by Matthew Winter and others, described as "inhabitants and ratepayers of the chapelry of Haydon and Woodshields in the county of Northumberland," against a scheme of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales for the administration of the foundation at Haydon Bridge, in the county of Northumberland known as "Shaftoe's Charity."

The schools were founded by John Shaftoe by indentures of lease and release, dated respectively 16th and 17th June 1685, and were regulated by two Acts of Parliament passed in 1785 and 1819.

The respondents framed a scheme under the Endowed Schools Act 1869, for the administration of the school, which was approved by the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education, but the appellants presented a petition of appeal against it.

H. Tindal Atkinson appeared for the appellants.

H. Davey, Q.C. and Romer, who appeared for the respondents, took the preliminary objection that the petitioners were not persons directly affected by the scheme within the meaning of the Endowed Schools Act 1869, or persons to whom a right of appeal was given, and that they had no locus standi.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD SELBORNE.—Their Lordships are of opinion that the preliminary objection taken to the hearing of this petition must prevail. By the 39th section of the Endowed Schools Act of 1869 the right of appeal against schemes settled by the commissioners is defined and rather strictly limited. Of course it must be taken for granted that Parliament had good reason for those limitations; at all events it is not open to any tribunal to review those reasons or to consider whether they were expedient or otherwise. The provision of the section is that on certain specified grounds, of which there are four, there may be an appeal by petition to Her Majesty in Council against the scheme; as to three of the grounds, by the governing body of the endowment or by any person or body corporate directly affected by the scheme, or, on the fourth ground, by the governing body alone. Whoever appeals under that clause is required to state in the petition to Her Majesty in Council the grounds of the petition; and their Lordships take that to mean that he must show on the face of the petition that he appeals on one of the grounds expressly recognised by the clause, and is a person directly affected by that of which he complains. Now these petitioners describe themselves in the course of their petition as "the undersigned inhabitants and ratepayers of the chapelry of Haydon and Woodshields;" and the only ground which they allege for their objection to the scheme, repeated indeed in various forms of expression several times over, is that by the founder's deed they have a right, and that all inhabitants and ratepayers of the chapelry in common with them have a right, to have their children taught free of expense in the school; and that this right will be taken away, or subjected to charges of which they complain, by the scheme. It was said at the bar that there might be other objections connected with a branch of the charity not educational, but their Lordships find in the petition no such ground alleged. There is no reference on the face of the petition to any objection whatever, except the loss of privileges in respect of education given to the inhabitants of this place by the founder's deed, and given to them evidently as a class. No individual complains that he has a child at the school whose status will be interfered with. Manifestly they come here as representing the class of inhabitants and ratepayers, and the general interest of that class in the benefit of this place of education under the founder's will. Their Lordships are of opinion, and would be of opinion even if there were no previous authority, that this is not an interest within the category of "vested interests" saved or required to be saved by the Act, and therefore that in respect of any vested interests these petitioners are certainly not directly affected by this scheme. The class of vested interests to be provided for is expressly defined by the 13th section of the Act, and so far as relates to any matter connected with this complaint it is defined in a manner which excludes the subject of the complaint; being only "the interest of any boy or girl" (which their Lordships take to include the interest of the parent), "who was at the time of the passing of this Act on the foundation of any endowed school." The case clearly, therefore, is not one falling under the second sub-section of clause 39, in which there ought to be a saving of a vested interest or compensation for taking it away. Under which, then, of the other sub-sections can it fall? Certainly not under the first, because the thing complained of is not a decision of the commissioners in a matter in which an appeal to Her Majesty in Council is expressly given by the Act. Does it fall under the third, "of the scheme, being one which is not within the scope of or made in conformity with the same?" Now, their Lordships do not inquire, though they may be able perhaps to form an opinion, but they will not inquire whether the objections taken in this petition are of a nature which could have been brought within that division of the clause; but one thing is quite clear, that no one under the clause can complain upon that ground without showing that he is directly affected by that of which he complains. These petitioners, in the strict and natural sense of the word, are not "directly" interested; they have no present personal interests in this matter which are taken away; they have merely, as members of the class constituted by the inhabitants of a particular area, a general privilege or educational advantage; that, is the opportunity, if from time to time they or their children should require it, of sending their children for education, free of charge, to this school. But the loss of such opportunities, so far as they are interfered with by the scheme, affects not directly and immediately, but indirectly and contingently, each of these individuals. That point does not rest merely upon any judgment which their Lordships might now form, if the case were free from decision, as to the meaning of the word "directly" in the clause. Three cases were referred to. Their Lordships have not satisfied themselves, on referring to the records of those cases, that more than one of them is certainly in point; but one of them, unquestionably, is so. That is the case of Harrow School (not reported), which was determined on the 17th June 1874, at this Board, not, indeed, by the Judicial Committee, but by a special committee, which included among its members Lord Hatherley and Sir Montague Smith. The petition was by an inhabitant of Harrow, and it is at the present moment here; the objection to the scheme was, that the founder had, by his will, provided for the free admission and perpetual education and instruction of the children and youth of the parish of Harrow, and that the benefits given to the inhabitants of Harrow were practically taken away by the scheme. It was in substance the same objection that is made here; the only difference being, that the complaint was by one individual, and not by so many standing in the same situation as these petitioners. No doubt it was not under the same Act of Parliament—it was under the Public Schools Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 118); but that Public Schools Act, in the 9th section, provided, that it should be lawful for the trustees of any scholarship, exhibition, or emolument to which any statute made under the powers of the Act might relate, or for any person or body corporate directly affected thereby," to petition Her Majesty in Council against such statute. The case, therefore, was exactly like the present, with this difference only, that in that Act there was not anything equivalent to sub-sect. 4 of this clause 39. Their Lordships will consider what difference that sub-section makes presently. This inhabitant of Harrow having petitioned that he, as an inhabitant of Harrow, was directly affected by statutes which took away the privileges of the inhabitants of Harrow, their Lordships made this minute of their decision after hearing the arguments: "The Lords of the committee came to the conclusion that, looking at the provisions of sect. 9 of the Public Schools Act 1868, the petitioner was not directly affected by the new statutes for the government of Harrow School, and agreed to advise Her Majesty that it was desirable that those statutes should be approved and confirmed by Her Majesty." It does not appear that in point of form the objection was taken as a preliminary objection; it was treated as substantially a question upon the merits; and their Lordships expressly determined that the petitioner had not an interest which was directly affected, and on that ground advised Her Majesty to confirm the statutes. It appears to their Lordships that were it not for the more precise definition in this 39th section of the grounds on which a person directly affected may appeal, and were it not for the addition of the 4th sub-section, that would be an authority directly in point. What difference does the more precise definition and the 4th sub-section make? A difference not favourable, but unfavourable, to these petitioners; because, while none of the other grounds are such as tend to show that in the view of this Act of Parliament these petitioners are directly affected, the 4th sub-section distinctly shows the reverse; because that precise class of interests, in respect of which these petitioners complain under this scheme (that is to say, interests consisting in privileges or educational advantages to which a particular class of persons are entitled—and it may be observed that the 11th section expressly adds, "whether as inhabitants of a particular area or otherwise")—that particular class of interests is distinctly dealt with, as one which cannot be directly affected by the scheme, and as to which therefore the right of appeal is given, not to "the governing body of any endowment to which a scheme relates, or any person or body corporate directly affected by such scheme," but to the governing body only. In this case their Lordships do not know whether the governing body of the endowment has actively consented or not to the scheme; but certainly they have not appeared as petitioners against it: and it would be going against the plain intent of the Legislature, if in the face of that limitation of the right of appeal for such a cause to the governing body alone, their Lordships were to entertain the present appeal on the petition of the inhabitants and ratepayers, as if they were directly affected by the scheme. Their Lordships will therefore humbly report to Her Majesty their opinion that this petition ought to be dismissed, the Charity Commissioners not asking for costs.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Hall, V.C. (reported 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399). John Bates, by his will, bequeathed to the Corporation of Brighton 9000l. debenture stock of the Midland Railway Company for charitable purposes, for the benefit of the poor of Brighton. The question raised was, whether railway debenture stock was within the Act 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, commonly known as the Mortmain or Charitable Uses Act; and whether, therefore, a valid bequest of such stock could be made to a charity. The point turned to a great extent on the effect of the provisions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act 1863, which are referred to in their Lordships' judgment. The Vice-Chancellor held that the gift of John Bates was void under the Mortmain Act, on the ground that the debenture stock was a charge upon, or an interest in, land; and that the stock in question belonged to the testator's next of kin.

The corporation appealed.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by JAMES, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Hall, V.C., that debenture stock of the Midland Railway Company is subject to the prohibitions of the statute of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, restraining gifts of land to charitable uses. That decision is in direct conflict with a recent decision of Malins, V.C., in Holdsworth v. Davenport; and, assuming the case of debenture stock to be the same for this purpose with the debentures formerly given by railway companies and other public bodies (which will require to be considered), there are two conflicting decisions, one by Lord Langdale, holding that they were not, and one by Knight Bruce, V.C., holding that they were within the prohibition. Having to deal with this conflict of authority, it is well to refer to the Act itself, and a little to the history of the decisions upon it. The Act recites as follows: "Whereas gifts or alienations of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in mortmain, are prohibited or restrained by Magna Charta and divers other wholesome laws, as prejudicial to and against the common utility, nevertheless this public mischief has of late greatly increased by many large and improvident alienations or dispositions made by languishing or dying persons, or by other persons, to uses called charitable uses, to take place after their deaths, to the disherison of their lawful heirs; for remedy whereof be it enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, that from and after the 24th day of June, which shall be in the year of our Lord 1736, no manors, lands, tenements, rents, advowsons, or other hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, whatsoever, nor any sum or sums of money, goods, chattels, stocks in the public funds, securities for money, or any other personal estate whatsoever, to be laid out or disposed of in the purchase of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall be given, granted, aliened, limited, released, transferred, assigned, or appointed, or any ways conveyed or settled to or upon any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, or otherwise, for any estate or interest whatsoever, or any ways charged or incumbered by any person or persons whatsoever, in trust or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever," unless by deed indented and executed before two witnesses twelve months before the death of the donor, and enrolled in the Court of Chancery six months after such execution, the said limitations not to extend to purchases or transfers made for valuable consideration. It had from the earliest times been the policy of the common law, as interpreted by the judges, to discourage the inalienability of land, and this altogether irrespective of the peculiar mischief supposed to arise from the vesting of lands in mortmain, which deprived the Sovereign and the lords of the profitable incidents of feudal tenures; and this policy in more modern times approved itself to the Legislature. It was deemed in itself a mischief that lands should be rendered inalienable, and the Legislature found that this mischief was being mischievously increased in one particular way—that is to say, it was found that dying persons were, sometimes from spontaneous weakness, and sometimes from their readiness to yield to the many influences which can be brought to bear on persons in extremis, too easily minded to give lands to charitable uses (words of the widest signification) and to be posthumously benevolent at the expense of their lawful heirs. And this was the mischief, and the sole mischief, which the Legislature set itself to prevent—viz., to prevent the increase of inalienable land through the weakness of, or practices upon, dying persons, or through posthumous charity. Upon examination of the enactments it will be found that the Act is in entire consistency with the recital. In the Act there is no prohibition of gifts of land by deeds inter vivos; but there are regulations securing that such gifts shall not be in substance posthumous merely by avoiding the form. There is no prohibition of any amount of testamentary charity confined to pure personal property; but the Act does, in the most comprehensive terms, forbid any such testamentary or posthumous charity as to any interest in land or other real estate, or as to any charge or incumbrance affecting the same. At first sight it may seem that the enactment has gone far beyond the scope of the recited object, for it extends, as has always been held, even to a pecuniary legacy, so far as it is payable out of land or any charge or incumbrance on land. But it will be found on examination that all the comprehensive words in the prohibitory enactment were in truth necessary or useful to prevent evasions and devices contrary to the main intent of the Act, although, from the impossibility of legislating for every particular case, they have been found to apply in a great many cases to gifts which were, neither in effect nor intention, contrary to the real object of the Legislature. No interest in land can be given because, under colour of a gift of a mere pecuniary interest, the land itself could easily be given. Let a perpetual annuity of 100*l.* a year be given out of lands worth 50*l.*, the heir of course would let the annuitant take the lands themselves. A charge or incumbrance of 10,000*l.* on lands worth 5000*l.* would be an easy, practical mode of giving the lands themselves. And take the strongest case of apparently a mere legacy of a sum of money out of personal estate. A testator whose whole assets were worth only 5000*l.* gives a legacy of 10,000*l.* to charitable uses, and makes some official or other person interested in the charity his executor and residuary legatee. The result would be that the charity would get the assets in specie, which might include long terms of years in land and mortgages, and which by foreclosure or long possession would become the land itself. There is really nothing in the Act which has so far gone, or at all gone, beyond its recited object as to preclude the application of the rule of construction, the rule of common sense, that you are to construe the enacting part by the light of the recital of its object. Accordingly, it has been held that a share or interest in a trading partnership or business, incorporated or unincorporated, is not within the prohibition, although it may have, as indeed almost every business has, some interest in land with which, or on which, it is carried on; or although it may have amongst its assets any amount of mortgages, charges, or incumbrances on land; and shares in railways and shares in other public companies of a like nature, are now universally admitted not to be obnoxious to the prohibition of the Act. It was never supposed that a bond debt or other specialty binding the heir was within the Act, although its very object was to affect the real estate of the obligor. The personal estate of a testator is not for this purpose affected by the fact that an item in it is a share in the unascertained and unadministered assets real and personal of another testator. Now how, dealing with the matter on principle, does the case of a railway debenture stand? Previously to the cases about to be mentioned it was very difficult to say that it was not a charge or incumbrance on land within the words of the statute. There are in this country a great many railways which are private and individual property. All, or almost all, the Canal Acts, passed about the end of the last century and the beginning of this contained powers enabling the proprietors of any mine or work within a certain distance of the canal to make a railway or tramway communication with the canal, the same to be open to the public on payment of the same tolls as were taken by the canal itself. Now, it is clear that a mortgage or a debenture, in the very words of the ordinary railway debenture given by the owner of such a railway, would, in fact, be precisely similar to a mortgage on land. The mortgagee could, by himself, or at all events by a receiver, get into the actual possession of the line of railway, and, if the incumbrances were too heavy to be redeemed, that possession would be perpetual. Knight Bruce, V.C., who was, as I happen to know, very familiar with that class of railway property to which I have referred, evidently, in Ashton v. Lord Langdale, considered that the debenture given by the corporate body of its undertaking and tolls was, in legal effect, an operation, the same as a similar charge on a private owner's railway would be, and on that assumption it was impossible for him to arrive at any other conclusion than the one he did. On the other hand, Lord Langdale must have thought that there was something essentially different between the charge created by a private owner of a railway and a charge made under statutory authority by a parliamentary body established and empowered to make, maintain, and manage for public convenience a great public highway, the maintenance and working of which may be of vital importance to the State itself; and he held, accordingly, in Walker v. Milne, that the holder of a railway debenture issued by such a body did not acquire a charge on land, any more than a shareholder in the company acquired an interest in the land. The nature of such a debenture came under the consideration of the Court of Queen's Bench in Doe v. St. Helen's Railway Company (2 Q. B. 364), and of the Court of Exchequer in Hart v. The Eastern Union Railway Company (7 Ex. 246), by which it was established that the debenture, wide as its words were, did not pass the soil, and did not pass the rolling stock of the company. And, on the same principle, it was held in Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company that a debenture holder could not take or touch the soil of the lands required and used for the actual working of the railway, nor the soil of any surplus lands which had been acquired, but were not required for actual use, nor the rolling stock; nor could he, by himself or his receiver, get the management of the line, nor do anything in derogation of the authority of the statutory managers, who could not delegate to anyone else their powers, nor shift their responsibility. The words of the security were subordinated to the essential nature of the undertaking, and limited so as not to extend to the very destruction of the thing the maintenance of which in perpetuity was the intent and object of the Legislature; and the result of that case was that the receiver, whose appointment the debenture holders were entitled to have made, was in truth nothing but a cashier or treasurer imposed on the company. He could not appoint or discharge a ticket-taker or a railway porter, or an engine driver or platelayer. Every servant of the railway would still be under the directors, and their wages and salaries fixed by them. All purchases and contracts for the use of the railway would be made by them. The receiver, as treasurer, would take all the moneys received by every officer of the company, would thereout pay all outgoings on the warrant of the directors, the statutory managers of the concern, and would then apply the net surplus, being the net earnings of the business, in discharge of his immediate principals, the debenture holders. His functions would be, except as to the net surplus, neither more nor less than those of a banker appointed to receive all the moneys of a large brewery, and to pay all cheques of the persons properly authorised to draw on the account. Now, with the light thrown by these cases on the legal operation and effect of a railway debenture, it is impossible not to prefer the decision of Lord Langdale in Walker v. Milne to the decision of Knight Bruce, V.C. in Ashton v. Lord Langdale. But the case before us is really not that of a debenture, but of debenture stock. It seems to be called debenture stock lucus a non lucendo, because it is anything but a debenture. There is no debt except, indeed, as to the annual interest; the capital cannot be called in, and cannot be paid off. It is a right to a perpetual annuity, payable out of the concern. There is no conveyance or assignment of anything to the stockholder, or to any trustee for him. There is an entry in the books of the concern that there is so much debenture stock on which there is so much to be paid half-yearly to the holders, just like the entry of the National Debt in the great books at the Bank of England. And the whole of the rights of a stockholder depend on the Act of Parliament authorising railways and other bodies to create such a stock. The 22nd section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act 1868, so far as material, is as follows: The company may, from time to time, raise money by the creation and issue, at such times and on such terms, subject to such conditions and with such rights and privileges as the company thinks fit, of stock, and may attach to the stock so created such fixed and perpetual preferential interest as it may think fit, not exceeding the prescribed limit. By the 23rd section it is directed that the debenture stock, with the interest thereon, shall be a charge on the undertaking prior to all shares and stock of the company, and shall be transmissible and transferrable like other stock of the company, and shall in all other respects have the incidents of personal estate. By the 24th section it is provided that the interest on debenture stock shall have priority of payment over all dividends or interest on any shares or stock of the company, ordinary, preference, or guaranteed. So far it is quite clear that the debenture stock is of the same nature as other stock of the company, only with the important difference that it ranks in payment over all other stock, and that all arrears must be paid before a farthing is to reach the proprietors of the other stock. It is nothing but preference stock with a special preference. There is nothing to give to the stockholders any right, either at law or in equity, under any circumstances to take possession of a single item of the property of the company in specie, whether real or chattel. Now is any difference made in this respect by the provisions as to the appointment of a receiver? The receiver, when appointed, is to receive the whole or a competent part of the tolls or sums liable to the payment of the interest, and after payment of interest on the mortgages and bonds of the company, to distribute the money rateably among the proprietors of debenture stock. In England the receiver is to be appointed by two justices of the peace, on the application of a prescribed proportion of stock proprietors. It is difficult to conceive how this could, directly or indirectly, tend to make any land inalienable or give to the stockholder, either immediately or as the ultimate result of any amount of insolvency, the possession or the right to the possession of any portion of the property of the company which must remain legally and equitably in the possession of the company and under the absolute control and dominion of the statutory body of managers. The expression, no doubt, is "tolls or sums," but it is tolls or sums liable to the payment of the interest. It is possible to conceive the case of a company, the owner of a market, a port, or other franchise, with nothing to do but to receive tolls and pay its creditors, just as in the case of a turnpike or bridge the whole tolls may be taken by the creditors, leaving the road or bridge to be repaired by the parish or county. But with a railway company this is impossible. The actual tolls taken, whether from other carriers, or from freighters, or passengers, must, from the very nature of the case, remain under the dominion of the directors, to enable them to do what is required for the preservation of the road and the safety of life and property. The only thing really chargeable is the net earnings of the company, the same fund out of which, if sufficient, the dividends and interest of the other stockholders are to be paid. Again, there is by the Act a special machinery for the summary appointment of a receiver; but, without that special machinery, a person having a charge on the net earnings of such a body could have got a receiver of those net earnings, if the managing body were to disregard its duty of applying them exclusively to the payment of the debenture stock interest. I apprehend that, even with regard to preference shares, properly so called, if the directors, acting in the interest of a majority of ordinary shareholders, were to misapply or not to apply such net earnings, the court would have no difficulty in appointing a receiver to receive and properly apply the same. By the 31st section it is, no doubt, provided that, in all respects not otherwise by or under the Act or the special Act provided for, debenture stock shall be considered as entitling the holders to the rights and powers of mortgagees of the undertaking other than the right to require the repayment of the principal money. But what are the rights and powers of mortgagees of the undertaking consistent with the powers conferred by the special Act on the railway directors? They are not powers to take the land, or enter on the land, or in any way to interfere with the ownership, possession, or dominion of the statutory owners and managers. The result is that the debenture stock is a charge on the net profits and earnings of a trading corporation, and is no more land, tenement, or hereditament, or any interest in land, tenement, or hereditament, or a charge or incumbrance affecting land, tenement, or hereditament, than the share stock in such corporation is, or a bond or other debt due from a man who has got real property is.

Lunacy—Pauper lunatic—Maintenance—Jurisdiction—Fund in court—Payment to legal personal representatives—Claim of asylum for maintenance—16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, ss. 94, 104.

The claim in respect of the maintenance of a lunatic in an asylum is merely a debt of the lunatic, and the court has no jurisdiction, on the death of the lunatic, to interfere with the right of his legal personal representatives by ordering payment of the expenses of his maintenance out of a fund in court to which the lunatic had become entitled.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C.

In 1844, John Moore, a pauper of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition, was, by an order of the justices of Brighton, to which parish he was chargeable, placed in a lunatic asylum at Bethnal Green.

In 1855 Moore became entitled, as next of kin of persons who had interests under the will of Mary Marman, to a fund which had been paid into court by the executors of the will, and upon a petition presented in the name of Moore by his next friend, an order was made for payment to the treasurer of the guardians of the poor of Brighton of a sum of money for the past maintenance of Moore, and an inquiry was directed what provision ought to be made for his future maintenance out of the residue of the fund.

After payment of the aforesaid sum the fund amounted to 436*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.* Consols.

In 1856 an order was made by the court that Moore should continue in the asylum at Bethnal Green until further order, and the guardians of the poor of Brighton consenting thereto and agreeing to maintain and clothe Moore at the said asylum at the annual charge of 31*l.* 4*s.*, it was ordered that 31*l.* 4*s.* should be allowed for his maintenance and clothing for the past year, and that the yearly sum of 31*l.* 4*s.* should be allowed for his future maintenance and clothing during his life or until further order.

In 1859 Moore was removed by order of two justices of the county of Sussex, under the powers given by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 77, but without any order of the Court of Chancery, to the new Sussex County Lunatic Asylum, at Hayward's Heath, where he remained till his death, in March 1875.

After his removal, no payment was received by the guardians for Moore's maintenance. The costs of his maintenance at the new asylum amounted to less than 31*l.* 4*s.* a-year.

In 1876 Moore's legal personal representative presented a petition for payment of the fund to her.

The guardians, who were served with the petition, claimed payment out of the fund of the amount expended by them on Moore's maintenance since June 1858.

The Vice-Chancellor ordered payment of the fund to the petitioner, after payment thereof of the costs of both parties.

From this decision the guardians appealed.

Swanston, Q.C. and Renshaw for the appellants.—We are entitled to be paid under the order of 1856, which ought not to be so strictly construed as to defeat its object, namely, to provide for the costs of the lunatic's maintenance. In removing the lunatic, we acted under the powers conferred upon us by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 77; and we are entitled, under the 94th and 104th sections of that Act, to be repaid the amount we have expended, even if we are not entitled under the order.

Hemming, Q.C. and Freeman for the respondent.—The order of 1856 was for payment of the expenses incurred by the guardians in keeping the lunatic at a specified asylum, and the order was put an end to when he was removed from that asylum. The guardians may have a claim for the expenses since incurred by them in maintaining the lunatic, but they cannot enforce it against this fund. They are simply creditors of the lunatic, and must recover their debt from the lunatic's personal representatives, and even then they cannot recover more than six years' arrears. The Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction over persons of unsound mind as such, and when a person is incapable of managing his own property, the court authorises a trustee to deal with it for his benefit: Beall v. Smith (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 625; L. Rep. 9 Ch. 85.) The principle upon which the court acts in such a case is shown in Re Upfull's Trusts (3 Mac. & G. 281).

Swanston, Q.C. in reply.—This claim is within the spirit of the order of 1856, the intention of which was to provide for the maintenance of the lunatic at a proper asylum, and not at a particular asylum. If the order has been properly framed there could be no doubt about our claim; rate-payers ought not to suffer loss because that order was carelessly drawn up. Vane v. Vane (L. Rep. 2 Ch. D. 124) shows that the court has jurisdiction to make the order we ask for.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that, with the exception of the trifling sum of 24*l.*, which became payable under the order of 1856, before the lunatic was removed, and to which the attention of the Vice-Chancellor was not directed, the order of the Vice-Chancellor was quite right. The truth is, that the counsel for the appellants rested their case partly upon the order of 1856 and partly upon a quantum meruit. But a right cannot be pieced together out of fractions of two rights; the right must be in one way or the other. I think the appellants have no right under the order of 1856. That was an order for the yearly payment of 31*l.* 4*s.*, which the court considered a proper sum to be allowed for the maintenance of the lunatic in a particular asylum which the court had sanctioned; and the order came to an end when the lunatic was removed, just as it would have come to an end if he had recovered, or if a friend had taken him into his care. The guardians did not apply during the man's life for a new order applicable to the altered circumstances of the case. Therefore they have been guilty of the same kind of laches as if they had never asked for any order at all. We cannot make the order asked for, because it was not applied for while the court had jurisdiction to make it. At the lunatic's death the fund in court went to his legal personal representatives, who will be liable to pay out of it what is legally due for the lunatic's maintenance, just as he is liable to pay any other debts of the lunatic to the extent of the fund. The order of 1856 being at an end, the claim of the guardians is a mere debt and recoverable as such. There is no charge for the debt on the fund, and we cannot make it a charge merely because the guardians might have obtained a charge if they had applied for it in the lunatic's lifetime. As for the 24*l.* actually due under the order, that is not a subject of the appeal. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

COTTON, L.J.—The question is whether the Vice-Chancellor was right in directing payment to the lunatic's legal personal representatives of a sum to which the lunatic was absolutely entitled. How can the right of the legal personal representatives be interfered with? It is said, first, that under the order of 1856, certain sums are payable out of this fund to the appellants. I should be sorry to decide the case on a mere technicality, but in my view the order authorises no payment beyond the 24*l.*, which became payable before the lunatic was removed. The order of 1856 was made on a reference for an inquiry as to what should be allowed for the maintenance of this lunatic, and it was ordered that he should remain at a particular lunatic asylum, where it was found that the annual expenses of his maintenance would be 31*l.* 4*s.*, and that sum was ordered to be paid annually to the guardians for his maintenance. As a matter of construction that must be taken to mean for his maintenance while residing there. I do not say that it was contempt of court to order the man's removal to the county lunatic asylum, without applying to the court, or that the maintenance there was not equally good; but in my opinion it was not intended by the order of 1856 to recoup the guardians generally for all costs in respect of the man's maintenance, but to pay them a particular sum each year for his maintenance at this particular asylum. We cannot now give them the costs of his maintenance at another asylum on the ground that the court would have done so if it had been asked at the time of the lunatic's removal. It probably would have done so, but, as things now stand, the question is whether the order of 1856 enables us to interfere with the rights of the legal personal representatives. The lunatic is dead, and this is not a case in which we are asked to deal with a fund for the benefit of a person of unsound mind, who cannot deal with it himself. We are asked to interfere with the right of the legal personal representative, who is capable of dealing with the fund, and I know of no case in which the court, after the death of a lunatic, has interfered with the rights of his legal personal representative by paying debts or otherwise. During the life of the lunatic, it is a different matter. I am of opinion that we have no jurisdiction to make such an order as is asked for.

THESSIGER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the order of 1856 was conditional upon the maintenance of the lunatic at the particular asylum mentioned in it, and that the order came to an end in 1859, when he was removed. We are then asked to take an equitable view of the case, and make a retrospective order. I am of opinion that we have no jurisdiction to do so, and that the amount due to the guardians can only be recovered from the legal personal representatives in the regular way.

THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PENRYN v. BEST. (a)

Market—Right to compel sale in market or payment of toll—Immemorial custom—Grant by Crown—Evidence.The grant of a market does not of itself confer the right to prevent people from selling goods in their shops on market days, but the grantee of an ancient market may by law have such a right.Plaintiffs had acquired the rights of the grantee, under a charter of Henry III., of a market to be held on Monday, but such market was not, in fact, held. Plaintiffs had held a meat market on Saturday as long as living memory went back, and had claimed and enforced a right to compel butchers to close their shops on Saturday and sell in the market, paying stallage, or to make payments in place of stallage if they sold in their shops on Saturday. Defendant, a butcher, sold in his shop on Saturday, and refused payment.In an action for disturbance of market,Held, that plaintiffs had shown a title to a Saturday market, that the right claimed by them might legally exist as incident to such market; and (reversing the judgment of the Exchequer Division, which had proceeded on a misapprehension as to the evidence given) that there was sufficient evidence of enjoyment to establish such right, and plaintiffs were entitled to recover.APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the judgment of the Exchequer Division (Cleasby, B. and Hawkins, J.), reported 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 318. The action was for disturbance of a market.In the year 1259 King Henry III. by charter granted that the Bishop of Exeter and his successors might have a market in the manor of Penryn every week on Monday, and also in every year a fair of three days' duration on days named, and that they should have the aforesaid market and fair "cum omnibus libertatibus et liberis consuetudinibus ad hujusmodi mercatum et feriam pertinentibus."This charter was proved at the trial, and evidence given which brought the right of market down to the time when the plaintiffs acquired the rights of the Bishop of Exeter by purchase from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. This evidence, and the pleadings in the action, are set out in the report in the court below.Evidence was given of the holding by the plaintiffs of a meat market on Saturdays, as far back as living memory went, a person named John Robins, who was sixty-three years of age, being one of the witnesses called to prove this. There was no evidence to connect the Saturday market with the Monday market granted in 1259, and no market was in fact held on Mondays.It was the practice for the butchers in Penryn to close their shops on market days, and go into the market house, and there sell their meat in stalls provided by the council of the borough, paying 1s. 6d. stallage.In 1862 two butchers opened their shops on Saturdays during the market, and refused to pay to the council for selling meat in their shops onmarket days. Writs were issued against them, and they paid the money claimed with costs, and have ever since paid when they sold in their shops on Saturdays. The defendant, who was a butcher in Penryn, having refused such payment, this action was brought.June 21 and 22.—Herschell, Q.C. and Charles, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, appellants.—It must be conceded that the mere grant of a market does not necessarily give a right to compel people to close their shops on market days; but it is clear from the authorities that such right may be incident to a market by grant, custom, or prescription:Mayor of Macclesfield v. Chapman, 12 M. & W. 18;Mosley v. Walker, 7 B. & C. 40;Mayor v. of Macclesfield v. Pedley, 4 B. & Ad. 397.The plaintiffs here have a stronger case than the plaintiffs had in Mayor of Macclesfield v. Pedley; it is as strong as the plaintiff's case was in Mosley v. Walker. The only distinction is the existence of the charter of the Monday market, but that can have no bearing on the incidents of the Saturday market. The Earl of Egremont v. Saul (6 A. & E. 924) is, if anything, an authority in the plaintiffs' favour; it only decides that the words of the charter there did not give a right to take tolls, but it shows that the charter did not destroy the evidence of immemorial usage. The judgment of the court below proceeded on a misapprehension as to the evidence. Cleasby, B. says: "The evidence in the present case, except as to the existence of a market, only dates from the year 1848." This is clearly a mistake, for it dates from as far back as a witness aged sixty-three could remember.Murphy, Q.C. and Wormald for the defendant, respondent.—The right here claimed can only exist by immemorial custom, and it cannot be granted by the Crown. If the market is not immemorial, neither can the custom incident to it be so, and therefore the plaintiffs, in order to establish their right, must ask the court to infer that at the time when the Monday market was granted there was already a Saturday market in existence belonging to the Bishop; but there is no evidence to warrant such an inference. The Crown has not the power to grant the right here claimed, and can never have had it, for had such power ever existed it would have been a franchise, and could not have been lost: (see Viner's Abridgment, Prerogative, b. 18.) Then the right claimed by the plaintiffs cannot exist as incident to a right of market; the cases which have been cited as showing the contrary are open to review in the Court of Appeal. [BRAMWELL, L.J.—I think the law as laid down in those cases is now the law of the land, and can only be upset, if at all, by the House of Lords.] As to the judgment of the court below, if for the statement that the evidence only dates from 1848 were substituted "from living memory," the inference drawn would still be justified.Charles, Q.C., in reply, referred toPrince v. Lewis, 5 B. & C. 363;Curwen v. Salkeld, 3 East, 538.Cur. adv. vult.BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. If I differed on a point of law from Cleasby, B., I should have great misgiving in doing so, but our opinion is upon a matter of fact, upon which we think there has been a misapprehension in the court below. Now, the first question that arises here is, have the plaintiffs shown a title to a Saturday's market? I think we ought to hold that the plaintiffs have a title to such a market. One can have no doubt that such a market has been held, as long as living memory goes, and there is nothing to show that there is not a right to a Saturday market, except certain charters which would go to show they had a right to a Monday market. It is a most convenient thing that every supposition, not wholly irrational, should be made in favour of long-continued enjoyment. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that, if these plaintiffs were attempting to hold a Monday market as of right, the most vigorous efforts would be made to show they had no right to do so; I think, therefore, we ought to hold that the plaintiffs have shown a title to a Saturday market. Then the next question is this: was there such a right attached to the market as was necessary to enable the plaintiffs to maintain this action? It was contended, and, in my opinion, truly enough, that if there was a modern grant, or, that if you had the actual instrument granting a market in a particular place, that would not, of itself, entitle the grantee of that market to shut up shops; but on the other hand authorities were cited, and it was stated as law (and I do not think if we thought it wrong we ought to overrule it considering the number of years it has prevailed; I think we ought to take it as part of the law of the land) that the grantee of the market not only has certain rights within the place where the market is held, but may also be entitled to say to persons within a certain area, "You must shut up your shop when my market is held, or you must pay me some compensation for selling in your shop!" I take it, that is established in law, and can only be altered by the Legislature, or, at all events, by the Supreme Court of Appeal, after the number of years it has been in existence. Now, so far we go, I am glad to say, with the court below, and the only question is, whether they were right in the conclusion they drew from the evidence. It seems to me they would have been right if the facts had been as they assumed in their judgment. I understand the assumption in the judgment is, that the earliest evidence of any such exclusive right as the plaintiffs were asserting was in the year 1848, but that really is not so; on the contrary, the evidence is this, that as long as living memory can trace back (and one of the witnesses called was sixty-three years of age, therefore we may assume he may well remember fifty years ago, or possibly more) the state of facts has existed upon which the plaintiffs rely. There is evidence that as long as living memory can trace this state of things, which is undisputed, existed, that when this market was held all the butchers' shops in Penryn were shut up, even those which were within a stone's throw of the market-house, and the butchers, even those who occupied the shops within a few yards of the market-house, not only shut up their shops, but went into the market and sold their meat, as any other person going into the market to sell their articles would have done. Now, that is a remarkable thing to my mind. It is said by Mr Murphy, that of itself it proves very little, because, as the market would be the place to which intending purchasers would throng, butchers would naturally go there, and shut up their own shops. I really cannot think so; one cannot help thinking that, though the butcher might like his stall in the market, he might also keep his shop, which was within a few yards of it, open; but every one of them in Penryn shut their shops. I think that is a very remarkable thing, and cannot be accounted for if such a right as the plaintiffs contend for did not exist. Further, there is this: in the year 1862 there were two recalcitrant butchers, who resisted the right of the corporation, and the corporation then insisted upon their right, and these butchers acquiesced, and paid the dues claimed. They did not shut up their shops, they continued to have them opened, but upon the terms of making compensation to the plaintiffs upon the footing that the plaintiffs were entitled to the right they now claim. It is a possible observation to make, was it, or was it not, much better for them to pay the trifle they had to pay, than run the risk of litigation with a corporate purse? I think that is a just remark; but then it is almost met by this, that, at the present moment, this defendant does not think so, and I do not know why we should say his predecessors in the butcher trade may not have had the same opinion, and have acquiesced in it, because they knew the corporation were right. But suppose it is a piece of evidence which admits of the observation Mr. Murphy made, what else can a plaintiff prove in such a case? He cannot prove more than that he has asserted his title when the occasion has arisen, and that assertion has been acquiesced in. If evidence of title were to be met by such arguments as this, I am not sure it would not weaken the title of the best estates in the world, because, when a man was found trespassing, and was sued, and gave in in respect of it, and the owner of the property relied upon that as proving possession, it might be said, "It was much better for the man to pay you a few shillings than to fight you." Assuming, for the reasons I have given, that there was a good Saturday market here, and assuming, as I think we are bound to do, there might be such a right attached to the person entitled to a market as the one claimed, it really does seem to me the plaintiffs have proved it, and I agree that the evidence, when appreciated, is stronger than in the case of Mosley v. Walker (ubi sup.). As I have said before, the judgment of Cleasby, B. and Hawkins, J. was founded upon this, that the earliest evidence of enjoyment was in 1848. If that had been so, and it had been left uncertain what had been the practice of the butchers and the corporation prior to 1848, and within the time of living memory, I should have thought it was a very different case; but the evidence being as I have pointed out, it seems to me we ought to give judgment for the plaintiffs.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have very few words to add. I entirely assent to the principle of law applicable to cases of this kind, as enunciated by Cleasby, B., first, that the mere grant to a man does not, of itself, confer a right to prevent persons selling in their shops on market days, though within the town or manor where the market might be held; and secondly, that such right may be acquired by immemorial enjoyment or prescription. I agree in almost all the conclusions which the Court of Exchequer drew from the facts not in dispute before them.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BIPHOSPHATED GUANO COMPANY.

[CHAN. DIV.]

I accede to the conclusion arrived at, that it was clear the plaintiffs were entitled to a market on Saturdays, with or without the incident claimed. I think I may say I agree with all the conclusions drawn from the facts, with one exception, to which the Lord Justice has referred. It appears to me the misapprehension as regards that fact may have easily arisen. I presume the Court of Exchequer had before them, as we have before us, a document of some five-and-twenty pages of printed matter. There were only three witnesses called. The evidence of the town clerk, who became town clerk in 1848, and who spoke to the time during which he knew the borough, occupied fourteen or fifteen pages of the evidence. Then at page 17 there are a dozen lines only of the evidence of John Robins, who proved all the circumstances. There is also this, Mr Robins was not cross-examined upon his evidence. Thereupon Mr Herschell, who appeared for the plaintiffs, said, "As my friend does not cross-examine, I do not call any more witnesses on this point." It is clear the evidence of this Mr. Robins escaped the notice of the Exchequer, and Mr. Jenkins being, as they thought, the only witness who spoke to what was the custom during the time he had known the borough, they went upon his evidence.

THESTIGER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Inasmuch as there really is no difference, as regards the law, between the view taken in this court and that taken in the court below, the whole question resolves itself into, what was proved at the trial? and I entirely agree in what has fallen from Bramwell, L.J. I would merely say this, the view we take of the facts is the view which was taken by Lord Coleridge, who tried the case. I find at the end of the case he says this: "Whatever may be said of the legal origin of this, and whatever the rule of law may be, the fact is proved, that, for a great number of years past, and no time is shown at which it did not happen, this custom at Penryn, of shutting up the butchers' shops on Saturday, and going into the market, or paying as if they went into the market, is proved beyond all doubt." It appears to me, as has been suggested by Baggallay, L.J., that the mistake in the court below must have arisen from not having appreciated the evidence given by Mr. Robins, which was very short; and it is to be observed that at the close of his evidence, there being no cross-examination, further evidence as to what the facts were, as regards this shutting up of the butchers' shops, was stopped by Mr. Herschell, who was the counsel for the plaintiffs.

Judgment reversed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BIPHOSPHATED GUANO COMPANY. (a)

Right of way—Contract to dedicate to the public—Purchaser for value without notice.

B., in possession of certain property under an agreement for a lease, contracted to make a road, and throw it open to the public in place of one which he stopped up. The road was made and used by the public to the date of the action. After it was made a lease of the property was granted to B. "subject to existing rights of way." The lease referred to a plan of the property on which the road was shown, but it was marked "private road."

Held, that the contract was binding on B., and those claiming under him with notice.

Held, also, that the effect of the words in the lease alone would have been to put a purchaser on inquiry; but that the description of the road on the plan was to take away that effect, and that the user by the public, which had been proved, was not sufficient to affect a purchaser with notice that the road was public.

Held, also, that a purchaser for value with notice was protected by the want of notice in the vendor.

THIS was an information and bill filed in Sept. 1874, by the Attorney-General, at the relation of the vestry clerk of East Greenwich as informant, and the vestry clerk as plaintiff, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from obstructing a road which crossed certain land of which they were leasees, and over which it was alleged the public had a right of way.

In 1864 the trustees of Morden College, who were owners in fee of the land in question, agreed to demise it to Capt. Blakely for eighty years, from the 25th March of that year. Capt. Blakely wished to divert a public footpath which crossed the property, and in the document submitted by him to the vestry and the other necessary authorities he proposed, "If the said old highway and footway be so stopped up and diverted as aforesaid, to give and make a new roadway to the waterside, forty feet in width between the places marked with the letters D and E respectively in the said plan, and to throw the same open to the public." This was assented to by the vestry in Dec. 1864, and sanctioned by the court of quarter sessions in April 1865. The footway having been diverted and the new road made, on the 14th May 1866, the trustees of Morden College executed a lease of the property to Capt. Blakely, in which it was described as "all that piece of land as the same is more particularly delineated in the plan drawn in the margin hereof," and was demised "subject to the existing rights of way over it." The new road was shown on the plan and marked "private road."

Capt. Blakely afterwards assigned the lease for value to the Blakely Ordnance Company, who had no notice of his agreement with the vestry, or of the existence of a right of way over the road, except what was conveyed by the lease itself and an actual inspection of the property.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BIPHOSPHATED GUANO COMPANY.

[CHAN. DIV.]

After several other assignments the lease became vested in Mr. Weguelin. The defendants were his sub-lessees, and they obstructed the road. The meane assignees bought under the description and plan in the original lease; but Weguelin bought under conditions of sale, and a new plan which showed the road with a ferry at the end of it.

The defendants contended that there was no contract which bound Blakely or those claiming under him, and that the question was solely one of dedication.

North, Q.C. and Speed, for the informant and the plaintiff, contended that the defendants had notice of the contract and of the existence of the road, as the lease was granted "subject to existing rights of way," which put them and their predecessors on inquiry. Further, the road had been used by the public for some time, and the plan under which Weguelin bought gave him notice.

Fischer, Q.C., Patchett, Q.C., and Kingdon, for the defendants, contended that on the plan on the lease the road was marked "private," therefore subsequent purchasers had no notice. The road had not been used in such a manner as to give notice of its being a public road.

Speed in reply.—The words in the lease, "subject to existing rights of way," put the defendants and their predecessors on inquiry. [Fry, J. referred to Jones v. Smith (1 Ph. 244) and that class of cases, with reference to a party being relieved from notice of the contents of a deed, which might or might not affect the property, by a statement bona fide believed that the deed did not affect it.] The word "private" had only a limited meaning, as a road might be private property although there were rights of way over it.

Fry, J., after stating the facts, and that in his opinion there was a contract between the vestry and Blakely that he should form a road and dedicate it to the public, which contract might be enforced against Blakely and against every person who took the land to which he became entitled under his agreement with notice of that contract, continued:—Now the only question I have to consider is, whether or no the defendants are entitled to say that they are purchasers for value without notice. The first step in that inquiry of course arises on the lease of May 1866, whether from that lease every subsequent purchaser must be deemed to have notice. Now that lease describes the property as "subject to existing rights of way over the said land," and if the matter had stopped there I should have held that every person who took a title derived from that lease was bound to make this inquiry: What were the rights of way over that land existing on the 14th May 1866? And whether they did make the inquiry or not, they would be affected with notice of the information they would have received on making that inquiry. But it appears that the premises so demised were described in the lease as "a piece or parcel of marsh land in the county of Kent, with the several messuages or tenements, factories, workshops, and buildings thereon erected and built as the same, are more particularly delineated and described in the plan drawn in the margin hereof." When I look at the plan drawn in the margin hereof, I find that the road dealt with by the contract of 1865 appears, but it appears and is described as a "private road." Now the effect of that description seems to me to amount to this: It seems to me to say to everybody who looks at the deed and the plan, that although you will find a road physically existing upon the land, that road is a road for the use of the owner of the estate, over which no third person has any right of way. It says in short, that although there are existing rights of way, or may be existing rights of way over the land, there is no existing right of way down that private road. The road is there for the use of the owner of the land, the road is there free from any right of way in any other person over it—it is private. "Private" implies that nobody else has any right over it. To my idea it means privacy. But it is further to be observed according to the case of plaintiff and of the defendant, at that time other rights of way existed; therefore there was enough to satisfy those words in the lease: "subject to all existing rights of way." It appears to me that, while it says that there are rights of way, it also says that there are no rights of way over this private road. Therefore it seems the lease did not carry notice to this company of any rights of way existing under this contract. It did more; it negatived the existence of that right of way. Of course Capt. Blakely, the lessee under that lease, could not say that he had not notice of that contract, because he was a party to it; but he assigned the lease to the Blakely Ordnance Company. Now is there any evidence to bring home to my mind that the Blakely Ordnance Company took with notice in effect either of the contract or of an existing right of way? With regard to the contract, there is not a tittle of evidence to show that they knew anything about it. With regard to the public right of way, there is this, that undoubtedly at that time persons occasionally used the road; but upon the whole of the evidence I come to the conclusion that the user was not of the description which would necessarily bring to the mind of a person who inspected the property the knowledge that there was a public highway. It was a short piece of road leading up from the river, at which end there had been, or perhaps was then, a temporary jetty; at the other end of it was a public footpath, and if men did land at that spot occasionally there would be a trespass of that description that a reasonable owner would not be likely to interfere with. I must couple that with the fact that it is in evidence before me that before these buildings were erected, watermen would land passengers anywhere where they could find a place hard enough, at any place where they could get to the bank without sticking in the mud. Under those circumstances that user of this piece of road would not carry to the mind of a person the existence of a public highway. There is no evidence whatever to show that the Blakely Ordnance Company took from Capt. Blakely with notice. The same observation applies with regard to the assignment of the Blakely Company to the Agra Bank and Mr. Dent. I have no evidence beyond that of the description in the lease, to which I have referred to affect them with notice. But when I come to the assignment of the Agra Bank and Dent to Weguelin the matter is in a somewhat different position, because it appears that Weguelin bought under conditions of sale and a plan, and that plan undoubtedly did represent that there was a ferry at the end of this road, and I am not prepared at the present moment to say that there might not have been notice that there was a right of way over the land from the ferry to the nearest highway. But that appears to be immaterial, and for this reason: I conceive that where A. buys without notice, and sells to B., who has notice, B. sells free of notice. That is well ascertained law; and if that is the law with regard to one kind of incumbrance, it is the same with regard to another kind of incumbrance. The reason of that law is evident. If it were not so, the right of the person who purchased without notice would be limited—his market would be limited. That is the general principle of law; therefore it is immaterial for me to determine whether Mr. Weguelin had or had not notice. If Mr. Weguelin was entitled to hold free of notice, it follows that persons holding from him are also free of notice. In the result I hold that, although there was a contract which originally might have been enforced against Capt. Blakely, it cannot be enforced against the defendants, because they are purchasers for value without notice. I give judgment for the defendants with costs.

BRADLEY (app.) v. METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS, GREENWICH DISTRICT (resps.) (a)

Metropolitan sewers, expense of construction of—Apportionment by vestry amongst owners—No limit of time for apportionment—Metropolitan Management Act 1861 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 52, 53.

By sect. 53 of the Metropolitan Management Act 1861 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), "where any sewer shall be constructed by any district board in a street in which previously to such construction there have been no sewers, but sewers rates have been levied, the expense of constructing such sewer . . . shall be borne in part only by the owners of the houses abutting on such street, and the amount to be borne by such owners shall be determined by the district board in each particular case, and the amount so charged shall be payable either before the works shall be commenced, during their progress, or after their completion, as the board shall determine, either in one sum or by instalments within such period not exceeding twenty years as the board shall direct."

In 1868 a sewer was constructed by the respondents in a street in which the appellant owned a house within the meaning of the above section. In 1876, the appellant still remaining owner of the house, an apportionment was made upon him by the respondents of the expense of the sewer.

Held, that the apportionment was not too late, and that there was no time limited within which such an apportionment must be made.

THIS was a case stated by a police magistrate.

1. On the 28th March 1878 the appellant was summoned upon a complaint charging that on the 21st March 1878 he refused to pay 18l. 18s. 5d., being the amount charged upon, and to be contributed by him as owner of a house forming, and certain lands abutting on, a street called St. John's Park, in the parish of Greenwich, Kent, being a proportion of the expense of constructing a sewer for the drainage of the street, and the works appertaining thereto. Upon the hearing, on the 3rd April 1878, I made an order upon him for the payment of the sum of 18l. 18s. 5d. in the terms of the summons.

2. In 1868 the board constructed a sewer in and for the drainage of St. John's Park, the said St. John's Park being a new street within the meaning of the Metropolitan Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), and the Metropolitan Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 52 and 53. (a) In such new street there had been no sewer previously to the construction of the said sewer, in which sewers rates had been levied between the 1st Jan. 1863 and the 31st Dec. 1869.

3. The sewer was constructed under a contract for the construction of sewers in ninety-nine streets within the district of the board, some of such streets being old streets and some new streets

(a) The following is the text of the sections referred to:

Sect. 52: Where any sewer shall, after the passing of this Act, be constructed by any vestry or district board in or for the drainage of any new street, or of any house or houses erected since the 1st day of Jan. 1856, the expense of constructing such sewer and the works appertaining thereto, including the costs of gullies, side entrances, lengths of sewer at the intersection of streets, and other incidental charges and expenses, shall be borne and defrayed by the owners of such street or houses, and of the land bounding or abutting on such street respectively, and the said expenses shall be apportioned by the vestry or district board in such proportions as they may deem just, and the amount charged upon or payable in respect of each house or premises shall be payable before the works shall be commenced, during their progress, or after their completion, as the vestry or district board shall in each case determine, either in one sum or by instalments, within such period not exceeding twenty years as the vestry or district board shall direct; and any such sum or instalments shall be recoverable from the present or any future owner of the said house or premises either by action at law, or in a summary manner before a justice of the peace, at the option of the vestry or board.

Sect. 53: Where any sewer shall be constructed by any vestry or district board in a street in which previously to such construction there had been no sewer, or only an open sewer, but where sewers rates have been levied previously to such construction, the expense of constructing such sewer and the works appertaining thereto, including the cost of gullies, side entrances, lengths of sewer at the intersection of streets, and other incidental charges and expenses, shall be borne and defrayed in part only by the owners of the houses situate in and of the land bounding and abutting on such street respectively; and the amount to be borne by such owners shall be determined by the vestry or district board in each particular case, and the residue of such expenses shall be defrayed by the vestry or district board out of the sewers rates levied in their parish or district; and the amount so charged by the vestry or district board upon or in respect of each house or premises shall be payable either before the works be commenced, during their progress, or after their completion, as the vestry or board in each case determine, either in one sum or by instalments within such period not exceeding twenty years as the vestry or board shall direct; and any such sum or instalment shall be recoverable from the present or any future owner of such house or premises, either by action at law or in a summary manner before a justice of the peace, at the option of the vestry or board: Provided, that no street or property in respect of which sewers rates have been levied for five years prior to the first day of January 1856 shall be subject to be charged under the provisions contained in this section.

Q.B. Div.]

SPON LANE COLLIERY COMPANY (apps.) v. BAKER AND OTHERS (resps.)

within the meaning of the Acts, and completed on or about the 1st Dec. 1868.

4. On the 14th Jan. 1866, and before the making of the contract, the board resolved that, in order to carry into effect the provisions of the Metropolis Management Act 1862, with regard to the expenses of constructing sewers in new streets, where there had been previously no sewer or only an open sewer, a person should be appointed with directions to lay before the board a correct statement of all streets formed or laid out since the 7th Aug. 1862, so that the board might determine upon the proper charges under the authority of the statute.

5. On the 1st Dec. 1869, at a special meeting of the board, resolutions were passed, that, in the several streets in the district in which sewers had been constructed by the board, but in which sewers rates had been levied between the 1st Jan. 1851 and 31st Dec. 1855, the owners of land and houses therein be charged 30 per cent. of the cost of such sewers; between the 1st Jan. 1856 and the 31st Dec. 1858, 40 per cent., between the 1st Jan. 1859 and the 31st Dec. 1862, 60 per cent., and between the 1st Jan. 1863 and 1869 90 per cent., together with all incidental expenses in each case, that twelve calendar months be allowed to owners for payment of the charges and expenses to be so borne by them respectively under the provisions of the statute, and that such payments be made by three equal instalments, that is to say, one-third within four months of the date of the board's order, one other third at the end of the next succeeding four months, and the remaining one-third at the end of twelve months from the same date.

6. In pursuance of these resolutions the board from time to time, during and since the year 1869, and on and prior to the 14th June 1876, made various apportionments of the cost of certain of the sewerage works mentioned in the contract amongst the persons liable to contribute to such cost under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, ss. 52, 53. The works mentioned in the contract were in the first instance paid for out of moneys raised upon the credit of the sewer rates of the parish of Greenwich, repayable by instalments with interest, and all moneys which had been received by the board under such apportionments have been applied so far as they would go by the board in payment of the instalments and interest, and the remainder of each instalment and interest has been made up out of the mortgaged rates.

7. No apportionment in respect of the sewer in St. John's Park was made until the 14th June 1876, when the board apportioned 90 per cent. of the cost of constructing the sewer in such street amongst the owners of the houses in the street, and of the land bounding and abutting thereon, and on the same day the board made an order for the payment of the amount apportioned. The amount so charged to the appellant was 18l. 18s. 5d.

8. The appellant was at the time of the construction of the sewer and of making the apportionment, and now is, the owner of a house in, and of land bounding and abutting on, the street called St. John's Park.

9. The appellant contends: 1. That the apportionment of the 14th June 1876 is bad, inasmuch as it was not made in accordance with 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, and that the owners of houses and lands bounding and abutting on the street called St.

John's Park cannot now be charged with the costs of the construction of the sewer or any part thereof. 2. That the costs of and incidental to the construction of the sewer must be defrayed and borne by the Greenwich District Board of Works, and paid for out of the sewer rates.

10. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the apportionment of the 14th June is a valid apportionment.

J. Brown, Q.C. (Biron with him), for the appellants, argued that although no time was expressly limited by the statute for ascertaining the contribution payable under sect. 53, a reasonable time was intended, and that upon the ground of public convenience the court would imply such reasonable time.

Philbrick, Q.C. (Petheram with him) argued that, as the statute had not fixed the time, the court had no power to fix it.

J. Brown, Q.C. in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am clearly of opinion that we have no power to introduce into the statute a limit of time which the Legislature have not introduced, and it is beyond all question that no limit has been introduced here. If the board were guilty of unreasonable delay, that might be a ground for a mandamus calling upon them to exercise the powers of the Act. But however that may be, this appeal wholly fails.

MELLOR, J.—There might be cases in which a delay in making the apportionment would be reasonable, but whether the delay were reasonable or not, I feel sure that we have no power to invalidate an apportionment when made, for no time or making it is limited by the statute.

SPON LANE COLLIERY COMPANY (apps.) v. BAKER AND OTHERS (resps.) (a) Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76) ss. 46-51—Inspector's jurisdiction—Remedy for danger—Withdrawal of workmen.

The appellants' coal mines adjoin coal mines belonging to other persons, which have been long disused. Water had accumulated in one of the disused pit-shafts which communicated with the same seam as the appellants'; and the respondent, one of Her Majesty's inspectors of mines, gave notice thereof to the appellants under sect. 46 of the Mines Regulation Act 1872, and that he was of opinion that the matter was dangerous and threatened or tended to the bodily injury of the workmen employed; he thereby required the appellants forthwith to remedy the said matter.

The appellants were convicted upon an information for failing to comply with this requisition, and the quarter sessions on appeal quashed the conviction, subject to a special case. The quarter sessions found that there was danger to the appellants' workmen from this accumulation of water; that the appellants had used reasonable diligence to acquire the right to reduce the water, but had not complied with the notice; and that, notwithstanding the request of the inspector, the appellants' workmen were continued at their work.

Held (per Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J., dissentients Lush, J.), that the authority to an inspector under sect. 46 to require a remedy for a danger, did not extend to the withdrawal of workmen, which is expressly provided for under sect. 51, sub-sect. 6; and that by the proviso to sect. 46 the conviction could not be sustained.

THIS was a special case stated by the Staffordshire quarter sessions upon an appeal heard on the 15th Oct. 1877, against a conviction of the appellants by two justices of the county, dated the 21st August 1877, made under the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872. On the hearing of the said appeal, the said court of quarter sessions ordered that the said conviction should be quashed subject to the following special case:

1. The appellants are the owners and occupiers of the lands and coal mines called the Spon-lane Colliery, within the mines inspection district of South Staffordshire and Worcestershire, and the respondent, James Philip Baker, is Her Majesty's Inspector of Mines for such district. The other respondents are justices of the county of Stafford.

2. The lands and coal mines of another colliery called the Bromford colliery, which, prior to the 12th June 1877, and then and thereafter were and still are the property of the Blakely Hall Colliery Company, adjoin the Spon-lane colliery.

3. On the Spon-lane colliery are two perpendicular pit shafts. They pass from the surface of the earth down to a seam or vein called the thick coal, lying at a depth of 365 yards or thereabouts beneath the surface. One pit shaft is used for the purpose of drawing water through it from the mines, the other pit shaft is used for the purpose of working the mines of the Spon-lane colliery, by raising and lowering men and materials through the said pit shaft. A waterway communicates between the two pit shafts, about seventy-four yards above the said seam or vein.

4. On the Bromford colliery is one perpendicular pit shaft. It passes from the surface of the earth down to the same seam or vein which underlies both collieries, and is about on the same level as the pit shafts of the other colliery, but the depth varies in other parts of the said collieries on account of the inclination of the seam and the faults or dislocations therein. At the dates referred to in paragraph 2, the pit shaft of the Bromford colliery had been disused nearly two years, and water had accumulated in it. Adjoining the Bromford and Spon-lane collieries is another colliery called the Littleton Hall Colliery, which, prior to the 12th June 1877, mentioned in paragraph 2, and then and thereafter until the 5th Sept. 1877, belonged to and was occupied by Mr. William Henry Dawes, but the pit shafts therein ceased working shortly after the stoppage of the working at the Bromford colliery.

5. Prior to the dates aforesaid, much of the thick coal had been worked and gotten of the said seam or vein, at and in each of the said collieries, and water entering into and accumulating in either of the said collieries naturally passed from one to the other through the imperfectly collapsed gob and hollows of the workings in the seam as aforesaid.

6. Previous to the matters hereinafter mentioned, the appellants' pit shafts had been filled with gob or soil to the height of about seventy and seventy-five yards respectively from the bottom of the pits; this filling extending up to just below the opening of the headway, but water percolated through this stopping and was drained away in the usual manner.

7. On the 12th June 1877, twelve men employed by the appellants were working in this headway or inset. The top of the column of water then in the Bromford pit shaft was 120 yards above the level of the entrance to the headway or inset, and the respondent, James Philip Baker, considered that there was danger of the flow of water from this pit shaft increasing and flooding the headway in the appellants' colliery, and so endangering the lives of the men working therein.

8. The Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76) sect. 46, applies to the mines aforesaid, and the respondent J. P. Baker is an inspector duly appointed under sect. 43 of the Act. The state of things described in paragraph 7 is not provided against by any express provision of this Act, or by any special rule.

9. Sect. 46 enacts that:

If in any respect (which is not provided against by any express provision of this Act or by any special rule) any inspector find any mine to which this Act applies, or any part thereof, or any matter, thing, or practice in or connected with any such mine to be dangerous or defective, so as in his opinion to threaten or tend to the bodily injury of any person, such inspector may give notice in writing thereof to the owner, agent, or manager of the mine, and shall state in such notice the particulars in which he considers such mine or any part thereof, or any matter, thing, or practice to be dangerous or defective, and require the same to be remedied; and unless the same be forthwith remedied, the inspector shall also report the same to a Secretary of State.

If the owner, agent, or manager of the mine objects to remedy the matter complained of in the notice, he may, within twenty days after the receipt of such notice, send his objection in writing, stating the grounds thereof to a Secretary of State, and thereupon the matter shall be determined by arbitration in manner provided by this Act; and the date of the receipt of such objection shall be deemed to be the date of the reference.

If the owner, agent, or manager fail to comply either with the requisition of the notice, where no objection is sent within the time aforesaid, or with the award made on arbitration within twenty days after the expiration of the time for objection or the time of making the award (as the case may be) he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and the notice and award shall respectively be deemed to be written notice of such offence.

Provided that the court, if satisfied that the owner, agent, or manager has taken active measures for complying with the notice or award, but has not with reasonable diligence been able to complete the works, may adjourn any proceedings taken before them for punishing such offence, and if the works are completed within a reasonable time no penalty shall be inflicted.

No person shall be precluded by any agreement from doing such acts as may be necessary to comply with the provisions of this section, or be liable under any contract to any penalty or forfeiture for doing such acts.

10. On the said 12th June 1877, the respondent James Philip Baker, having ascertained or believing that the facts stated in paragraph 7 then existed, gave to the appellants the following notice in writing:

Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872,
35 & 36 Vict. c. 76, s. 46.

Notice.

To the Spon-lane Colliery Company, Limited, owners of the Spon-lane colliery or mine.

Whereas, on inspection and information in respect to the condition of the above-mentioned mine, I find the following matter, viz.: That a serious and increasing accumulation of water exists near to or in connection with your mining works at the above-named colliery, and which may rush into your mine or pit shaft and overwhelm everything and everybody therein, and whereas I am of opinion that the said matter is dangerous, and threatens or tends to the bodily injury of the workmen or any other persons employed therein and thereat, now I hereby give you notice forthwith to remedy the said matter.

JAMES P. BAKER,

H. M. Inspector of Mines for the District of South Staffordshire.

12th June 1877.

11. This notice was sent by post and received by the appellants on the 13th June 1877. The accumulation of water mentioned in the said notice was not immediately reduced, and the respondent J. P. Baker reported the same to a Secretary of State. The appellants did not within twenty days of the receipt of this notice or at any time send any objection in writing stating the grounds thereof to a Secretary of State.

12. The appellants having, in the opinion of the respondent J. P. Baker, failed to comply with the requisition of the notice, he said an information in writing against them on the 10th Aug. 1877, before a justice of the peace for the said county.

13. The appellants were summoned to answer the charge, and appeared before the respondents, two justices of the peace for the county, on the 21st Aug. 1877, when the case was heard and the appellants convicted as above stated.

14. The appellants gave the necessary notices and recognizance and appealed against the conviction to the next court of quarter sessions for the county.

15. The appeal was heard on the 17th Oct. 1877; evidence was given showing the situation of the respective pit shafts to be as described in paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 of this case; the accumulation of water in the Bromford pit shaft, the rate of influx into the appellants' pit shafts; and that, save for a period of a few days, during which they were withdrawn, the men continued at work in the headway. It appeared that on the 8th June, the respondent J. P. Baker, at an interview with the appellants, discussed the possibility of erecting a dam in their pits to exclude the water, and the appellants were quite willing to erect such a dam, but it was ultimately thought by all parties that such an expedient would not be satisfactory, and the idea was abandoned. Upon receiving the notice above set forth, the appellants entered into negotiations with the owners and managers of the Bromford colliery and tried to make arrangements for the raising of the water from that pit shaft, and so reducing and removing the accumulation of water there. Owing to the pit shaft and machinery in the Bromford colliery being out of repair this could not be done without executing considerable works, which would occupy some months.

16. The appellants then entered into negotiations with Mr. William Henry Dawes for permission for the appellants to pump the water out of the pit shaft at Littleton Hall Colliery, but were refused; upon which negotiations for a purchase of the Littleton Hall pit shaft by the appellants were commenced, and on the 5th Sept. last they entered into an agreement for the sale to them of the Bromford colliery.

17. On the 10th Sept. the appellants first began to draw out the water from the pit shafts at Littleton Hall colliery, and have from that time reduced the accumulation of water complained of.

18. It was proved or admitted that the appellants, in acting as above stated, had taken, and were prosecuting practicable measures for removing the accumulation of water.

19. It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the conviction must on any view of the facts be erroneous, as no offence under the Act could have been committed till long after the 12th of August, mentioned in the information. The court of quarter sessions, however, heard the appeal on the merits and quashed the conviction.

20. The court found as follows: "That there was danger to workmen from a serious and increasing accumulation of water; that the appellants had used reasonable diligence to comply with the inspector's notice, so far as taking means to reduce the water, but nothing was done down to Sept. 10th towards reducing the water. That up to that time 723 tons of water in each twenty-four hours came into the pit, and notwithstanding the request of the inspector, the men were continued at their work."

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the order of the court of quarter sessions quashing the said conviction was right. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the said order was to be affirmed.

If the court should be of opinion in the negative, the order was to be quashed, and the original conviction was to stand.

The information of the respondent J. P. Baker, mentioned in paragraph 13 of the special case was:

That the Spon-lane Colliery Company (Limited), in the county of Stafford, on the 12th day of August 1877, then being owners of a colliery called or known by the name of The Spon Lane, situate at Spon-lane, in the county of Stafford, the same being a coal mine or colliery within the true intent and meaning of the Act 35 & 36 Vict. c. 76, did then and there neglect to observe the 46th section of the said Act.

Bosanquet, for the appellants, showed cause against the rule to quash the decision of the quarter sessions.—Sect. 46 is directed only against a danger or defect in or connected with a mine which is not provided for by any express provision of this Act; in the event of which, the inspector may state the particulars in a notice, and require the same to be remedied by the owner, agent, or manager of that mine. The quarter sessions have found as a fact that the appellants had used reasonable diligence to comply with the inspector's notice; and that their further finding that the men were continued at their work is immaterial, because the only provision in the Act with regard to the withdrawal of workmen in case of danger is expressed in the general rules contained in sect. 51, and therefore the proceeding in this case is not applicable. [LUSH, J.—Sect. 46 strikes me as being intended for an additional protection to life beyond the general rules.] The section applies only to cases not expressly provided, and by subsect. 6 of sect 51 the circumstances of this case are exactly met: "If at any time it is found by the person for the time being in charge of the mine or any part thereof that by reason of noxious gases prevailing in such mine or such part thereof, or of any cause whatever, the mine or the said part is dangerous, every workman shall be withdrawn from the mine or such part thereof as is so found dangerous, and a competent person who shall be appointed for the purpose shall inspect the mine, or such part thereof as is so found dangerous, and if the danger arises from inflammable gas shall inspect the same with a locked safety lamp, and in every case shall make a true report of the condition of such mine or part thereof, and a workman shall not, except in so far as is necessary for inquiring into the cause of danger or for the removal thereof, or for exploration, be readmitted into the mine, or such part thereof as was so found dangerous, until the same is stated by such report not to be dangerous. Every such report shall be recorded in a book which shall be kept at the mine for the purpose, and shall be signed by the person making the same." By sub-sect. 9: "Where a place is likely to contain a dangerous accumulation of water, the working approaching such place shall not exceed eight feet in width, and there shall be constantly kept at a sufficient distance, not being less than five yards in advance, at least one bore-hole near the centre of the working, and sufficient flank bore-holes on each side." The contravention of any of these general rules is by the concluding paragraph of the section made an offence against the Act; but the conviction appealed against was not under this section.

Gorst, Q.O. and Bowen, for the respondents, supported the rule, and the conviction of the justices at petty sessions.—We admit that this was a conviction under sect. 46 for disobedience to the inspector's notice, and not for contravention of any general rule. Sub-sect. 6 of sect. 51 relates only to a danger found by the person in charge of the mine; and although no doubt the danger in this case might have been so found, yet the omission of the person in charge is sufficient to bring this matter within sect. 46. The general rules point out the remedy under these circumstances to be the withdrawal of the men, and the inspector is authorised to require the matter to be remedied.

Cockburn, C.J.—I wish I could take the opinion of the 46th section which my brother Lush has expressed during this discussion. As I read it, a danger only is contemplated, which a mine owner can remedy physically, irrespective of the withdrawal of men from the vicinity of the danger. It does not say that in the alternative of the owner being unable to remedy the danger, the men employed are to be withdrawn, nor does the notice in this case profess to provide or this alternative. Assuming that the circumstances of this case are within the enactment contained in this section (and of this I desire to express no opinion), the conviction must fail, because the owner is found to have used reasonable diligence to comply with the inspector's notice, so far as he could on his own premises. He cannot go upon his neighbour's land and remedy a danger which exists there: neither morally nor legally has he power or is he under the obligation to put an end to such a danger as this by trespass. The danger to human life might be averted by stopping the works and withdrawing the men; but an inspector has no power to require such a proceeding from an owner under sect. 46; he can only require an owner to remove the danger itself where he has legally the power to do so. The 6th general rule of sect. 51 is the only provision in the Act for withdrawing the men, and that can only be when the person in charge of the mine finds it dangerous. I cannot add to the legislation.

Mellor, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think sect. 46, read in connection with the general and special rules of sects. 51 and 52, applies only to matters in each mine as affected by the dangers existing in the mine itself. The substantial object of the Act is the prevention of danger to human life, and rule 6 of sect. 51 requires the withdrawal of the men under the particular circumstances there stated. Whether in the present case the inspector could interfere or not, he has no power under sect. 46 to require the workmen to be withdrawn; that can be done only when it is found by the person in charge that the mine is dangerous. The inspector has done what the words of sect. 46 authorise him to do; he has given notice of a matter pregnant with danger, and has required the same to be remedied. I can only read the section as it is; and to my mind it relates only to matters which are capable of being physically remedied. The owner's answer to this requisition is that he can do no more than he has done to effect a physical remedy. To create an offence, the failure to comply with the notice must be in respect of a matter which is within the competency of the owner to remedy. Here the appellants were unable on their own premises to remedy the danger, and they did what they could to acquire the right to do so on their neighbour's premises; in the words of the proviso to sect. 46 the court of quarter sessions was satisfied that the owner had taken active measures for complying with the notice, but had not with reasonable diligence been able to complete the works. A reasonable time for adjournment under such circumstances had not elapsed at the time of the conviction, and the quarter sessions therefore rightly quashed the conviction.

Lush, J.—I am unable to agree with the opinion formed by the rest of the court as to the meaning of sect. 46 of this Act. Two objections have been raised to this conviction; first, it is said that the circumstances are expressly provided for by sub-sect. 6 of the general rules contained in sect. 51; and therefore the office of the inspector cannot be invoked under sect. 46. But I find that sect. 46 supposes the existence of bodily injury, and therefore danger to the lives of persons employed. It appears to me that these two provisions are quite independent of each other, and there is nothing to prevent the inspector from interfering when the person in charge of the mine is ignorant of any existing danger, or unwilling to recognise it. Indeed, the jurisdiction of the inspector remains the same, whatever the manager of the mine may think fit to do. The second objection is that the withdrawal of the workmen in case of danger is not within the inspector's power to require of the owner. It is admitted that to withdraw the men would be a remedy against the dangerous matter to which the inspector has drawn attention; but it is said that, as there are particular circumstances under which this proceeding is expressly required in sub-sect. 6 of sect. 51, the omission of any express authority to the inspector to require it under sect. 46 is conclusive that no such remedy was contemplated by that section. I cannot think that the inspector's jurisdiction for the protection of life was intended to be so limited. He is not restricted as to the remedy he may require; and if, as in this case, it is impossible for the owner to remedy the danger, of which notice has been given, by any other means, he is, I think, bound to withdraw his workmen. The form of notice to be given by the inspector is indicated in the Act, and so long as there is a remedy against the danger open to the owner, I do not think it was intended that he or his manager should choose whether the notice is to be obeyed or not.

COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

March 22 and April 6, 1878.

(Before LINDLEY, J.)

HUNT v. THE WIMBLEDON LOCAL BOARD. (a)

Contract—Not under seal—Amount exceeding 50*l*.
Local board—Public Health Acts—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 85; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, ss. 173, 174.

*The surveyor of a local board, by direction of the board, entered into a contract with an architect for the preparation of plans for offices for the board. The plans were prepared, and submitted to and approved by the board, but were ultimately abandoned, as involving too large an expenditure. In an action by the architect against the local board, the jury assessed the value of the plans prepared by the plaintiff at 94*l*.*

38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 174, enacts that, "with respect to contracts made by an urban authority under this Act, the following regulations shall be observed, viz. (1) Every contract made by an urban authority whereof the value or amount exceeds 50*l*. shall be in writing, and sealed with the common seal of such authority."

Held, that the plaintiff could not recover for work done under a contract not under seal.

THIS was an action by an architect for work and labour done in preparing plans and drawings for the erection of offices, in accordance with instructions given to the plaintiff by the defendants' surveyor, acting under the authority of the defendants. The plans were submitted to and approved by the defendants, and advertisements for tenders were published; but the amount of the tenders received being too high, none was accepted. Ultimately offices upon a less extensive scale were erected from plans furnished by another architect.

At the trial, before Lindley, J., at Westminster, on the 13th and 14th March last, the jury found that the board authorised their surveyor to employ the plaintiff to prepare the plans, and that the board ratified the act of their surveyor in procuring such plans. They also found that new offices were necessary for the board, and that the plaintiff's plans were necessary for the erection of the offices for which they were designed, and they assessed the damages to which the plaintiff was entitled at 94*l*.

The learned judge reserved for further consideration the question whether, having regard to sect. 85 of the Public Health Act 1848, and sect. 174 of the Public Health Act 1875, the plaintiff could recover from the defendants an amount exceeding 50*l*., in the absence of a contract under the seal of the board.

Sect. 85 of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) enacted,

That the local board of health may enter into all such contracts as may be necessary for carrying this Act into execution; and every such contract, whereof the value or amount shall exceed ten pounds, shall be in writing, and (in the case of a non-corporate district) sealed with the seal of the local board by whom the same is entered into, and signed by five or more members thereof, and (in the case of a corporate district) sealed with the common seal, and shall specify the work, materials, matters or things to be furnished, had, or done, the price to be paid, and the time or times within which the contract is to be performed, and shall fix and specify some pecuniary penalty to be paid in case the terms of the contract are not duly performed; and every contract so entered into and duly executed by the other parties thereto shall be binding on the local board by whom the same is executed and their successors, and upon all parties thereto, and their executors, administrators, successors or assigns, to all intents and purposes. Provided always, that the said local board may compound with any contractor or other person in respect of any penalty incurred by reason of the non-performance of any contract entered into as aforesaid, whether such penalty be mentioned in any such contract, or in any bond or otherwise, for such sums of money or other recompense as to such local board may seem proper. Provided also, that before contracting for the execution of any works under the provisions of this Act, the said local board shall obtain from the surveyor an estimate in writing as well of the probable expense of executing the work in a substantial manner, as of the annual expense of repairing the same, also a report as to the most advantageous mode of contracting, that is to say, whether by contracting only for the execution of the work, or for executing and also maintaining the same in repair during a term of years or otherwise. Provided also, that before any contract of the value or amount of 100*l*. or upwards is entered into by the said local board, ten days' public notice at the least shall be given, expressing the nature and purpose thereof, and inviting tenders for the execution of the same, and the said local board shall require and take sufficient security for the due performance of the same.

Sect. 173 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) enacts that,

Any local authority may enter into any contracts necessary for carrying the Act into execution.

And sect. 174 enacts that,

With respect to contracts made by an urban authority under this Act, the following regulations shall be observed, namely:

1. Every contract made by an urban authority, whereof the value or amount exceeds fifty pounds, shall be in writing and sealed with the common seal of such authority.

2. Every such contract shall specify the work, materials, matters, or things to be furnished, had, or done, the price to be paid, and the time or times within which the contract is to be performed, and shall specify some pecuniary penalty to be paid in case the terms of the contract are not duly performed.

3. Before contracting for the execution of any works under the provisions of this Act, an urban authority shall obtain from their surveyor an estimate in writing as well of the probable expense of executing the work in a substantial manner as of the annual expense of repairing the same, also a report as to the most advantageous mode of contracting, that is to say, whether by contracting only for the execution of the work, or for executing and also maintaining the same in repair during a term of years or otherwise.

4. Before any contract of the value or amount of one hundred pounds or upwards is entered into by an urban authority, ten days' public notice at least shall be given, expressing the nature and purpose thereof, and inviting tenders for the execution of the same, and such authority shall require and take sufficient security for the due performance of the same.

5. Every contract entered into by an urban authority in conformity with the provisions of this section, and duly executed by the other parties thereto, shall be binding on the authority by whom the same is executed, and their successors, and on all other parties thereto, and their executors, administrators, successors, or assigns, to all intents and purposes. Provided that an urban authority may compound with any contractor or other person in respect of any penalty incurred by reason of non-performance of any contract entered into as aforesaid, whether such penalty is mentioned in any such contract, or in any bond or otherwise, for such sums of money or other recompence as to such authority may seem proper.

Our. adv. vult.

April 6.—LINDLEY, J.—This is an action brought to recover compensation for certain plans made by the plaintiff for offices contemplated by the defendants, but never in fact erected. The plans were made by the directions of the defendant's surveyor, and, when made, they were submitted to the defendants' board, and were so far approved and adopted that quantities were taken out and advertisements were issued for tenders for the erection of offices according to the plans. The tenders, however, proving too high, they were not accepted, and the offices designed by the plaintiff were not constructed. The plans, therefore, were of no further use to the defendants. Other offices have, however, been constructed for them from other plans. The jury have found that the defendants' board authorised their surveyor to employ the plaintiff to prepare the plans, and ratified the act of their surveyor in procuring them; and the jury have further found that some new offices were necessary for the purposes of the defendants, and that the plaintiff's plans were necessary for the erection of the offices for which they were designed; and they assessed the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled (if he is entitled to any from these defendants) at 94l. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff would clearly be entitled to judgment, were it not for the fact that the defendants are a corporation, and that their power of contracting is regulated by Act of Parliament. The Act which was in force when the plans were ordered was the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63). This Act was repealed and replaced by the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), before the plans were finished. But the 85th section of the first Act, although broken into paragraphs, and differently printed, was substantially re-enacted by sects. 173, 174 of the second Act; and, having carefully compared the above sections, I can find no difference material to the present case between sect. 85 of the Act of 1848 and sects. 173 and 174 of the Act of 1875, except that 50l. is substituted for 10l. as the limit for contracts which do not require any particular formalities. It is admitted that the defendants were a local board within the meaning of sect. 85 of the Act of 1848, and an urban authority within the meaning of sect. 174 of the Act of 1875; and it is admitted that there was no contract under seal with the plaintiff, and no ratification under seal of any contract with him. Neither was there, in fact, any resolution expressly authorising the preparation of the plans, or expressly referring to or ratifying their preparation for the board. The question I have to determine is whether, under the above circumstances, and having regard to the above enactments, the defendants are liable to pay for the plans in question. Now, in the first place, it is to be observed that the defendants are not a trading or commercial corporation having gain for its object; they are created for the purposes mentioned in the Public Health Acts, and they are in fact the representatives of and trustees for the inhabitants of Wimbledon for such purposes. I cannot therefore regard as applicable to this case those numerous decisions which show that incorporated companies having gain for their object are liable in respect of contracts not under seal, provided they are necessary for and incidental to the purposes for which they are created. Such cases, for example, as South of Ireland Colliery Company v. Waddle (ubi sup.), and Reuter v. Electric Telegraph Company (ubi sup.), do not in my opinion govern this case. Neither can I treat the defendants as a corporation to which no Act of Parliament is specially applicable. It is not necessary, in order to decide this case, to try to reconcile the conflicting decisions upon the general question whether a corporation not governed by any special Act of Parliament is liable on unsealed contracts of which it has had the benefit. Where the unsealed contract is of such a nature as to be the subject of an action for specific performance, and such contract has been in part performed, under circumstances which render the equitable doctrines of part performance applicable, the contract will, I apprehend, bind such a corporation (Crook v. Seaford, L. Rep. 10 Eq. 678; 6 Ch. App. 551); but, in other cases, it is extremely doubtful whether the mere fact that a contract, not otherwise binding on the corporation, has been wholly or partly performed renders the corporation liable to be sued either on the contract or on a quantum meruit. Nicholson v. Bradford Union (ubi sup.), Clarke v. Cuckfield Union (ubi sup.), and Haigh v. North Brierly Union (E. B. & E. 873; 28 L. J. 62, Q. B.), are the leading authorities in favour of the corporation being liable; and Waghorn's case (not reported) before Manisty, J. may be added to them. On the other hand, Mayor of Ludlow v. Charlton (6 M. & W. 815), Lamprell v. Billericay Union (3 Ex. 283), Smart v. West Ham Union (10 Ex. 367; 24 L. J. 201, Ex.; 11 Ex. 867; 25 L. J. 210, Ex.) at law, and Kirk v. Bromley Union (2 Ph. 640), and Crampston v. Varna Railway Company (L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 562), in equity, are leading authorities to the contrary. In this case, however, I have to construe and apply a special Act of Parliament; and, although some of the provisions of the above-mentioned sections are not, in my opinion, applicable to such a contract as I have here to deal with, the provision requiring a seal where the contract is for more than 10l. or 50l., as the case may be, is, I think, applicable to it; and, having regard to the objects and terms of those sections, and to the case of Frend v. Dennot (ubi sup.), I am unable to hold that the clause requiring a seal is a merely directory clause. In Nowell v. Mayor of Worcester (ubi sup.), other clauses requiring other things to be done by the board were held to be directory only, because the plaintiff could not ascertain whether they were done or not. This reason has no application to the clause requiring contracts to be sealed; and it appears to me that I should be depriving the ratepayers of the protection intended to be afforded them by the statutes with which I have to deal, if I held the defendants liable to pay for work done under a contract required by those Acts to be under seal, and not in that form. The observations of Rolfe, B., in Mayor of Ludlow v. Charlton (ubi sup.), are, in my opinion, very pertinent to cases of this description; and, thoroughly concurring, as I do, with those decisions which have relaxed the old rule as to the necessity for a seal to bind certain classes of corporations, I do not feel myself at liberty to depart from the plain words of the statutes by which this case is governed. Notwithstanding, therefore, the answers given by the jury to the questions put to them, I give judgment for the defendants with costs.

(Before KELLY, O.B., CLEASBY and POLLOCK, BB.)

LORD RIVERS v. ADAMS; SAME v. ISAACS; SAME v. FERRITT. (a)

Trespass—Right of commoners—Lost royal grant—Special case—Right to begin.

The inhabitants of T. F. claimed, as inhabitant householders or occupiers of ancient messuages therein, the right of cutting furze, &c., on T. F. common. The inhabitants based their claim in virtue of a lost royal grant, and adduced evidence of user in favour of such a presumption.

Held, that the grant, if it ever existed, was bad in law for uncertainty, and that the evidence of such grant must be of a positive nature; mere presumption is not sufficient to substantiate it.

There was a special case stated by order and by consent of parties. The actions were actions of trespass brought against three inhabitants of cottages in Tollard Farnham in Dorsetshire, to determine the rights, if any, of the several defendants to cut underwood and furze on land belonging to the plaintiff, the lord of the manor. The defendants claimed by prescription and lost royal grant to the inhabitants of the parish. The writs were issued on the 12th June 1873, and on the 15th Aug. 1873 the actions were consolidated and referred to A. E. Miller, Q.C., to state the facts in a special case for the opinion of the court. The arbitrator stated the questions for the opinion of the court to be as follows:

(1) Whether the inhabitants of Tollard Farnham, or any of them, are entitled to any, and what, right of cutting furze or underwood on the locus in quo, either as part of Tollard Farnham Common or on any other and what grounds; and if so, then

(2) Whether such right is vested in all the inhabitants of the parish of Tollard Farnham; and if not, then

(3) Whether such right is vested in all the inhabitant householders in the said parish; and if not, then

(4) Whether such right is confined to the occupiers of ancient messuages within the said parish.

(5) Whether any and which of the defendants were entitled, as such inhabitants, householders or occupiers, to commit the alleged trespasses.

(6) Whether any, and which, of the defendants were, on any other and what ground, entitled to commit the said alleged trespasses.

O. S. Bowen and B. S. Wright for the plaintiff.

Edward Clarke and McClymont for the defendants.

Defendants' counsel claimed the right to begin on the ground that by reason of the nature of the case the onus probandi was on the defendants; but the Court ruled that the right to begin was with the plaintiff, it being the established practice of the court for the plaintiff to begin on the hearing of a special case.

O. S. Bowen for the plaintiff.—The first question to be determined in this case is whether such a right as that claimed by the defendants can exist at all in law; a right, that is, for "the inhabitants" of a parish, as such, to cut underwood in alieno solo. A profit à prendre in alieno solo cannot be claimed by custom, but only by prescription, and a vague and fluctuating body like the inhabitants of a parish could not take such a right under the grant of any private person:

Selby v. Robinson, 2 T. Rep. 758;

Grimstead v. Marlowe, 4 T. Rep. 717;

N. S. 230;

Knight v. King, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 495.

It is true that a Crown grant to "inhabitants" incorporates them so far as is necessary to sustain the grant, provided that there is either rent or some other consideration reserved to the Crown; or that the grant is merely an exemption from forest laws, and not a grant of an interest in the profits of another's land (Comyn's Digest, tit. Corporation, Fr. 6); but the Crown grant must have actually existed. A merely fictitious plea of one is not sufficient. If it were so, it would have been made use of in Selby v. Robinson (ubi sup.), where the facts were similar to those in this case. Since "inhabitants" cannot prescribe for this right, the court surely ought not to presume a lost royal grant in their favour. The nature of the right here claimed and of the evidence offered in support of it show that it is practically a claim by custom, but it is disguised as a claim by lost royal grant on account of the rule that such a right is not claimable by custom. That rule would have absolutely no effect if it were permitted to evade it in the manner here attempted, and the attempt has never hitherto been made. In the present case the allegation of lost royal grant is a mere pleader's fiction. In a recent case of Angus and Co. v. Dalton (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. Div. 85) it is laid down by Cockburn, C. J., that if from the nature of the case it is improbable that a grant should have been made the court will not presume one; and here the only time at which such a grant was possible was during the last year of the reign of Edward VI., that being the only time at which the Crown was owner of the soil of the locus in quo, as well as lord of the forest in which it was situate, and during that time the records are perfect, and no trace of a grant is found in them. During the time when the Crown was only lord of the forest and not also owner of the soil, a Crown grant could only operate as a relaxation of the forest laws, and could not convey to the grantees an interest in the soil of the lord of the manor which would be valid as against him. The case of Willingale v. Mailland (L. Rep. 3 Eq. 103) may seem to support the contention of the defendants, but it does not really do so. In the present case there is no evidence of any royal grant, while in Willingale v. Mailland the grant was admitted on the pleadings; in that case the Crown was both lord of the manor and lord of the forest, while here the Crown has only once, and then only for about two and a half years, been lord of the manor, and the consideration which there existed in the maintenance of severe forest laws over a large tract of country does not exist here, because the locus in quo never was a forest but only a chase. As to the difference between a chase and a forest, see Manwood's Forest Law, chap. 1, par. 4. Moreover, Willingale v. Mailland is not undisputed: (see Chilton v. Corporation of London, L. Rep. 7 Ch. Div. 732.) At all events, it does not extend so far as to cover this case. Supposing that such a right could exist in the inhabitants, the evidence here, far from supporting the plea of a lost royal grant to the inhabitants, points strongly to manorial rights enjoyed by the tenants of the manor as being the true explanation of the user proved. The tenants of the manor enjoyed a manorial right, and the poor enjoyed to some extent a user by sufferance, it not having been worth while to prevent them. These two together account for all the user on which the defendants rely to prove a right in the inhabitants. Finally, if the claim of the defendants to take the underwood under a public right as being "inhabitants" fails, they cannot then employ the same user which they claim to have exercised under the qualification of "inhabitants" in support of pleas of a private prescriptive right. See the judgment of Lord Denman in Blewitt v. Tregonning (3 Ad & E. 587).

Edward Clarke for the defendants.—Blewitt v. Tregonning is not a parallel case to this; the two claims there in question were prescription and custom. Here it is expressly stated in the special case that the court is to decide which (if any) of the rights claimed is made out by the evidence. With regard to the extent of user found to have in fact existed, it is identical with that claimed; and with regard to the right in which that user was exercised, the evidence of reputation strongly supports the contention that the right belonged to the inhabitants. Absolute precision is not to be expected in evidence of reputation (per Cleasby, B., in Hall v. Nottingham, L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 1). The evidence of the chase rolls points to a similar conclusion. Substantially it is found that no inhabitant of the village was ever prevented from taking wood, and that no one not being an inhabitant of the village was ever allowed to take it. [KELLY, C.B.—It strikes me that Willingale v. Mailland distinctly decides that the right you claim can exist.] Yes, and with regard to the plaintiff's contention that in order to bring ourselves within Willingale v. Mailland the soil must be in the Crown, and that here the soil of the locus in quo was in the Crown for only two years, we say that the manor of Tollard Farnham was a comparatively recent subinfeudation of the manor of Cranbourne, and that the Crown was owner of the soil for about 150 years previous to the subinfeudation, during which time the grant may well have been made, and if so, the subsequent subinfeudation would have been subject to any rights previously granted. See the judgment of Mellish, L.J. in the City Commissioners of Sewers v. Glasse (L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 456). Chilton v. Corporation of London, referred to by the plaintiff, does not shake Willingale v. Mailland on the point for which we wish to use it. The plaintiff contends that this was a chase, but a chase in the hands of the Crown becomes a forest (Manwood's Forest Laws, edition of 1717, p. 80), and it is proved that this co-called chase had a royal court of attachment as well as foresters and verderers, officers that Manwood tells us only exist in forests. The absence of record of penalties inflicted for exercising the user, coupled with the fact that constant user is proved to have existed, is almost conclusive that the user was of right. The presentments made by tenants of the manor that they as tenants had the right are not evidence as against inhabitants not being also tenants that the right was not in the inhabitants. User has been proved in respect of three classes of persons—1st, tenants of the manor; 2nd, leaseholders substituted in later times for copyholders; 3rd, inhabitants not falling within either of the above classes. The leaseholders had no estate in respect of which they could prescribe, nor could they act by custom of the manor. When copyholders become leaseholders they lose their copyholders' privileges unless those privileges are then made the subject of express demise:

Massam v. Hunter, Yelverton, 189;
Crowder v. Oldfield, 1 Salkeld, 189;
Watkins on Copyholds (edit. 1825), 452.

The user by leaseholders is not accounted for by the explanation of manorial right suggested by the plaintiff. That only partly explains the user proved, and the proposition that, where user has been proved, the court will refer that user to a legal origin that suitably accounts for, is well supported by authority. The fact of the user is evidence of the existence of the grant, and the nature of the user is evidence of the terms of the grant:

Styant v. Stakes, 2 Vern. 250.

No such grant as the one here claimed has ever been known, and upon the evidence there is no room for its presumption. Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 8.—Judgment was now delivered by KELLY, L.C.B.—The question argued before us in this case has been, whether the inhabitants of the parish of Tollard Farnham, in the county of Dorset, have the right to cut and take faggots or baskets of the underwood growing upon a part of the common which has been inclosed by the plaintiff. At present we deal with the question which was fully argued before us, namely, the right of the inhabitants as inhabitants. The user, and the extent of the user, is stated in the case to have been as of right, but the nature of the right in respect of which it was exercised is one of the questions to be decided. The defendant in the first action (Adams) says in his evidence, that the common was free to anybody in the parish. So that as far as the user goes it agrees with the claim set up, and notwithstanding some expressions to be found in the evidence, there is no ground for regarding this as a case in which a particular provision has been made by royal grant or otherwise for the poor of the parish. If such a right could be claimed by custom, there is evidence of user which, coupled with the evidence of reputation, might raise a question whether the custom did not exist. But the right claimed is a profit à prendre in the soil of another, and the authorities are uniform, from Gateward's case (6 Coke Rep. 60) to Chillon v. The Corporation of London (L. Rep. 7 Ch. Div. 735), that such a custom is bad in law. See Selby v. Robinson (2 Term Rep. 758); Constable v. Nicholson (14 C. B. N. S. 230; 32 L. J. 240, C. P.), where other authorities are given. Many sound reasons are given in the authorities for this conclusion. It is only necessary to advert to some of those given in Gateward's case, because they may be applicable to another view of the present case. It was not a case in which the inhabitants of a certain village generally claimed a profit à prendre, but the plea alleged that, by custom, all persons inhabiting any ancient messuage should, by virtue of their inhabitancy, have a certain right of common. It was adjudged by all of the justices that such custom was against law for several reasons. Among others: "Secondly, what estate shall he have, who is inhabitant only, in the common, when it appears he hath no estate or interest in the house, but a mere habitation or dwelling; and, thirdly, such common will be transitory, and altogether uncertain, for it will follow the person, and for no certain time or estate, but only during his inhabitancy, and such manner of interest the law will not suffer, for custom ought to extend to that which hath certainty and continuance; fourthly, it would be against the nature and quality of a common, for every common may be suspended or extinguished; but such a common will be so incident to the person that no person can extinguish it, but as soon as he that releases and removes, the new inhabitants shall have it." It might be added also in relation to such a right as is claimed in the present case, namely, to be provided with fuel from the common, that mere inhabitancy is capable of an increase, almost indefinite, and if the right existed in a body which might be increased to any number, it would necessarily lead to the destruction of the subject-matter of the custom. There cannot, therefore, be such a custom. And for the same reasons and for other reasons there cannot be a prescription, and there could not be a valid grant to so fluctuating a body and a body so incapable of succession, in any reasonable sense of the word, so as to confer a right upon each succeeding inhabitant. The judgment in Constable v. Nicholson (32 L. J. C. P. 240), is correctly given in the head-note, except in the use by some mistake of the word "easement" for "right." It is as follows: "The right of the inhabitants of a township to take stones from the land of another for the purpose of repairing the highways is a profit à prendre, and cannot therefore be claimed by custom. Neither can it be claimed by prescription, as inhabitants are incapable of taking by that description "such an easement" (it ought to be "such a right") "unless under a grant which incorporates them." The following are the words of Willes, J., in his judgment as regards the prescription or supposed grant, after disposing of the question of custom: "The prescriptive right is not claimed for a corporation, or persons taking by succession, but only for a fluctuating body of inhabitants. The prescription pleaded is a grant to that body, but not so as to have the effect of incorporating them. It is clear that such a right cannot exist." See also the decision of the Master of the Rolls to the same effect in the current number of the Law Reports: (Chillon v. The Corporation of London, L. Rep. 7 Ch. 735.) The claim then can only be supported as resting upon a supposed grant by the Crown to the inhabitants of the right in question, as such a grant alone would have the effect of incorporating them; and the argument addressed to us was upon the propriety and indeed necessity of presuming such a grant from the user set out in the case. But there is a difference between a corporate body, and the persons who for the time being compose it, and the members for the time in their own individual right take nothing by the grant to the corporation. There was a considerable argument before us upon the effect of a grant by the Crown to the inhabitants of a parish or village. The question seems to have arisen frequently in early times, and there are several decisions in the Year-books on the subject which are to be found in all the Abridgments, under the title "Corporation." The effect of them appears to be that where there is a grant by the Crown to the inhabitants of a particular parish or village, if the grant is made for a specified purpose, it has the effect of incorporating them so as to carry that purpose into effect, but otherwise is inoperative. [After referring to these authorities, his Lordship continued:] The case, therefore, stands thus: we are called upon to say, because there has been user by the inhabitants individually in virtue of this right, not that there has been merely a grant to the same persons who exercise the right (which would be the proper inference in ordinary cases without regard to the probability of its actually taking place, but which would in this case be imperative), but that there has been a grant in such a form as to convert them into a body corporate having perpetual succession. It appears to us that we ought not to presume this, not because it is impossible, but because it is inconsistent with the past and existing state of things. We were to presume that a corporation has been formed many hundred years ago, when there is no trace at any time of its having ever existed. If the inhabitants had held meetings in reference to this right, or appointed any officer to look to the right, or done any act collectively of that description, the case would be different. We should then have the inhabitants acting in a corporate capacity in reference to this right, and from their doing so, and from their existence de facto as a corporation, we might, according to the ordinary rule, find a legal origin by a grant from the Crown; but to say that a corporation was created which has never existed, would be carrying the fiction of a grant further than has ever been done, or than is consistent with reason. And the presumption is made wholly unreasonable, when we have, as in the present case, while the supposed corporation is existing and entitled to take the haskets, another body actually existing and legally existing, namely, the tenants of the manor who are exercising inconsistent rights, and publicly asserting their entire control over the underwood of the common. There is also another reason against making this presumption, which was strongly and properly pressed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, and which is not applicable to any of the cases in which similar presumptions have been made, namely, that we are asked to presume the action of the Crown in favour of a right in the inhabitants which could not exist as a custom, because it is unreasonable and contrary to law, and that the Crown, because this could not be done otherwise, got over the difficulty several hundred years ago by constituting them a corporation. We cannot make this presumption, not because it is improbable, but because it is most unreasonable. We were much pressed on behalf of the defendants with the case of Willingale v. Mailland (L. Rep. 3 Eq. Cas. p. 103), but when that case is examined it has no bearing upon the exact question which is raised in the present case. It was a demurrer to a bill for want of equity. The bill alleged that Queen Elizabeth, being lady of the manor of Loughton, which was within the royal forest of Waltham, had by her Royal Charter granted to the inhabitants of the parish of Loughton, that the labouring or poor people inhabiting the said parish, and having families, might, at certain times of the year, cut certain underwood, and that the rightful disposition of the wood so cut should be for their own consumption, and for sale, for their own relief, to other inhabitants of the parish for their consumption. The bill being demurred to, the facts were admitted as stated, and it was therefore admitted that there was a grant in the very precise terms stated, which it was contended had the effect of incorporating the inhabitants for the purpose of carrying into effect the specified charitable object. Accordingly the Master of the Rolls says, at p. 109: "It should be observed that, though it is true, as stated in Sheppard's Touchstone, that a grant cannot be made beneficially to the inhabitants of the parish as grantees, yet it is certain that a grant may be made by a private individual in the shape of a charity in trust for the poor inhabitants, and that such a trust is perfectly good." He afterwards adds, "The books are full of cases in which grants of this description have been supported and established, and the court has carried the trusts into execution." He afterwards refers to the Act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, by which Hainault Forest was disafforested, and in which a certain privilege of widows residing within a certain district was recognised as a ground for compensation, and eventually decides that as it stands on the bill, if the whole bill be taken as true, there was a case of relief. It is to be noticed that nothing whatever was granted to the inhabitants, neither land nor privilege of any sort. The only grant to the inhabitants was, that the labouring poor should have the privilege as alleged. We are not here dealing with a trust to be performed for the benefit of a limited body, but with the right of the inhabitants generally, and the case renders no assistance in considering without a grant to the inhabitants generally what ought to be presumed from user. A passage in the 4th Institute, page 297, was referred to because it was said that Tollard Farnham was within the forest of Cranbourne—Coke is treating of the courts of the forest, and he says: "And concerning claims" (meaning claims in the court of the forest), "it is specially to be observed that by the forest law, a grant made of a privilege within the forest, all the inhabitants being freeholders within the forest, or such other commonalties, not incorporated, is good." The answer to this was that it has reference to claims made in the court of the forest, the claim being for what is called a privilege, which involves more the idea of exemption from the forest law than the acquisition of property; and further that, although we have abundant proof that Cranbourne was a chase, there is no proof that it was ever a forest in the proper sense of the word, and still further, that we are not dealing with privileges under the law of the forest, but with property under the common law. We are therefore engaged in a different court from the court of the forest upon a different subject, viz., property, and not privilege, and there is an absence of proof of their being a forest; so that the passage in Coke is inapplicable. It was impossible to pass over these matters which were so fully argued before us; but there is another reason why we cannot be called upon to find a grant from the Crown in the present case. In most cases where a grant is presumed from user in favour of an individual, the proof of user is definite and complete, but in the present case we are called upon to infer a grant not to an individual, but to a class, namely, the inhabitants of a parish, and therefore in order to found it, there must be proof of user not by some inhabitants, but by the class, that is, by inhabitants generally. [His Lordship referred to certain evidence by way of presentments taken from the court rolls of the manor and proceeded:] With regard to the right to take fuel, asserted by the tenants, the fact that other inhabitants of the parish exercised the right would only prove a right in those other inhabitants as inhabitants, and would not prove the right in the inhabitants generally, and in this way the case fails. The statements in the case, and the schedules, entirely fail to prove the user by the inhabitants generally as inhabitants, such as to justify the presumption of a grant by the Crown. We were not asked to presume a grant to such of the inhabitants as were not tenants of the manor. We now go back to the title of the defendants by prescription. As regards the defendant Ferrett, as his house was a new one, this claim clearly could not be sustained. The same objection applied to the defendant Isaacs, because his house was also a new one, and although it was built near to an old house and upon a small garden belonging to it, the old house remained, and was occupied, so that it was not in substitution for, but in addition to the old house, and thus any prescriptive right acquired by the old house could not apply to this. As regards the house occupied by the person under whom the defendant Adams justifies, the matter stands thus. He occupies a house partly new and partly old, and it may be collected from the statement that the old part may originally along with the other old building have constituted one house, or it may have been originally a separate house, and a question might arise, whether a user was sufficiently made out in respect to the present house, so as to make the prescription apply. But an opinion was intimated in the course of the argument that there was no evidence of the exercise of the right to take baskets as belonging to any particular house. On the contrary, it was proved that the right was exercised in respect to inhabitation of houses whether old or new. We should have felt justified in coming to the conclusion that Harriet Adams, as alleged in the third plea, was seised in fee of the house occupied by her, and that it was not comprised in the lease of the 15th March 1781, mentioned in paragraph 68 of the case; but we could not have come to the conclusion that the other allegation in the plea was made out, viz., that she and her predecessor in title had exercised the right of taking estovers as to the messuage appertaining. This is a conclusion of fact, and though the actual taking of baskets by the occupiers of the house was proved to the fullest extent, and though the case does not expressly find in what alleged right it was taken, yet the evidence shows that the right was exercised in respect of inhabitation. The defendant in the action, Charles Adams, says, at p. 150, the common was free to everybody in the parish. It is only necessary upon this part of the case to refer to the case of Campbell v. Wilson (3 East 294), quoted with approval in Angus v. Dalton (L. Rep. 3 Q.B. Div. 108), to show the necessity of connecting the user with the right claimed. In that case there had been an inclosure award, putting an end to all former rights of way, and a certain private right of way was set out. The question which arose was whether, from user for nearly twenty years as of right, a grant could properly be presumed, and the argument was that the user over the locus in quo was a user under the award, and by mistaking the place set out. All the members of the court expressed their opinion that if it had been shown that the user was in fact under the award, though adverse and of right, it could not have been made a foundation for presuming a grant. The language of all the judges is to the same effect, but that of Lawrence, J. is most precise. He says, at p. 301: "But it has been said that if the enjoyment were shown to have originated by mistake, however adverse it may have been, that is against the presumption, and that the learned judge misled the jury in this respect, but no facts appear to warrant the objection, otherwise it might be very material to be considered. For if from an exercise of the right of way from time to time it had appeared that the party had asserted his right to be grounded on the award, though it were exercised ever so adversely, I do not know how the jury would be warranted in referring to any other ground than what the party himself insisted on at the time." It is plain that, if we refer the user to any other right than the one in respect of which it was actually exercised, we might be doing the greatest injustice, for the lord might allow the inhabitants of cottages to exercise the right as inhabitants, knowing that it was a right which there was no necessity to interrupt, and he might afterwards be bound by his own interruption because another right was acquired. For the above reasons we think that all the questions at the end of the case must be answered in the negative, and that there must be judgment for the plaintiff in all the actions. Acting upon the paragraph at the bottom of page 22 of the case, we direct that the plaintiff's costs be assessed equally between the three defendants.

LORD RIVERS v. ADAMS; SAME v. ISAACS; SAME v. FERRITT.

MARTIN v. MACKONCHIE.

Bowen.—My Lord, the case prays for an injunction to prevent the repetition of similar trespasses, and, as the judgment is for Lord Rivers, I apprehend I am entitled to that?

KELLY, C.B.—That certainly you are entitled to. You will have a perpetual injunction.

MARTIN v. MACKONCHIE. (a)

Prohibition—Court of Arches—Sentence for contumacy—Suspension ab officio et beneficio—Previous sentence in suit—3 & 4 Vict. c. 86.

In a suit instituted under the Church Discipline Act 1840, and sent by letters of request to the Court of Arches, the Dean of that court had, on the 7th Dec. 1874, pronounced the defendant, the vicar of a parish, guilty of certain ecclesiastical offences, and sentenced him to suspension ab officio for six weeks. On the 26th June 1875 a monition to desist from the practices, thus condemned as unlawful, was served on the defendant.

MARTIN v. MACKONOCHE.

On the 23rd March 1878, upon application to the court by affidavits, the Dean was satisfied that the defendant was continuously disobeying the said monition, and on the 29th March a further monition to desist from the said practices was served on the defendant. An application to enforce these monitions was made, and, upon failure to appear after notice, the Dean, on the 11th May, decreed that the defendant had disobeyed the said monitions, and for his disobedience therein declared him to have been guilty of contumacy, and for his conduct aforesaid sentenced him to be suspended ab officio et beneficio for the term of three years, the defendant to pay the costs of suit.

Held (by Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J., dissentiente Lush, J.), on a rule for a prohibition, that this sentence was beyond the jurisdiction of the Dean of Arches; and that this court had power to prevent its execution by prohibition.

THIS was a rule nisi for a prohibition to Lord Penzance, the Dean of the Court of Arches, to set aside an order made by him, directing the defendant in the suit to be suspended ab officio et beneficio of his vicarage, for three years, as a punishment for contempt of court in continuing to disobey a monition of Sir Robert Phillimore, whilst judge of that court.

June 5.—Charles, Q.C. (with him Phillimore) obtained a rule nisi on the defendant's behalf.

June 27 and 28.—The Solicitor-General (Sir Hardinge Giffard, Q.C.), A. J. Stephens, Q.C., and Jeune, for the promoter of the suit, showed cause.

Charles, Q.C. and Phillimore supported the rule.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the considered judgments of the learned judges.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 8.—LUSH, J.—This suit was instituted by letters of request from the Bishop of London, pursuant to the 13th section of the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86). The cause was heard on the 7th Dec. 1874, when the Court of Arches decreed that the defendant had been guilty of certain practices which were offences against the laws ecclesiastical; pronounced sentence of suspension ab officio for six weeks; and admonished the defendant to abstain in future from the practices thereby condemned. The defendant appealed from this judgment to the Privy Council, but abandoned the appeal before it came to a hearing. On the 26th June 1875 a monition in accordance with the decree was duly served, and suspension published. On the 18th March last, notice was served on the defendant, alleging that he had, in contravention of, and disobedience to, the monition, on certain days therein specified (several of which were within two years from that date, and the last of which was the 24th Feb. last), done certain specified acts (being acts which he had been admonished to abstain from), and that the promoter would on the 23rd March, upon proof of the premises, ask that it might be declared that the defendant had not obeyed the monition in the particulars therein set forth, and would further ask that the monition might be enforced, as to the court should seem meet; and that the defendant might be condemned in the costs of the proceeding. Copies of the affidavits intended to be used were served at the same time. The defendant did not appear, and on the 29th March a second monition was served upon him, which recited the previous proceedings in the suit, the decree, the service of the former monition and the notice; and which alleged that on the 23rd March then instant, the court, having read the affidavits, copies of which had been served, did pronounce and declare that the defendant had failed to obey the monition in not having abstained from the before-mentioned practices; and did further admonish the defendant to abstain for the future from those practices. On the 20th April a further notice was served, to the effect that it had been alleged that subsequently to the service of the last-mentioned monition, namely, on the 31st March and the 7th April, the defendant had repeated the practices against which he had been admonished, and that the promoter would apply to the court on the 11th May, and would, upon proof of the premises, ask that it might be declared that the defendant had not obeyed the monitions, and that the same might be enforced as to the court should seem meet, and that the court might take such other steps in the matter as justice might require. Copies of the further affidavits intended to be used accompanied the notice. The defendant still declined to appear at the time appointed, and the court, after reading the affidavits and taking time to consider, declared that the defendant had disobeyed and contravened the monition of the court, and decreed that he should be suspended ab officio et beneficio for a period of three years, and be condemned in the costs of the application. Thereupon an application was made to this court for a prohibition, on the ground, and the only ground on which a prohibition can be granted, namely, that in awarding a suspension under such circumstances the Court of Arches had exceeded its jurisdiction. A rule to show cause was granted, which came on for argument shortly before the last assizes, when the court took time to consider its judgment. The contention of the defendant is that he has been punished for a contempt of court; that a contempt of court is punishable only by imprisonment under 58 Geo. 3, c. 127; that such a proceeding as the present is not in accordance with the established practice of the Court of Arches, and that even if it were shown to have been so prior to the passing of the Church Discipline Act, the provisions of that Act rendered its continuance illegal. It was not disputed that the sentence complained of is one which might lawfully have been pronounced for such ecclesiastical offence as the court had declared the defendant to be guilty of, if a fresh suit had been brought against him. I pause here for a moment to remark that much of the argument which was addressed to us appears to me to be based on the fallacy of treating the acts of which the defendant was found guilty as a mere contempt of court. A contempt of court may or may not involve an ecclesiastical offence. A wilful disobedience of an order of the court made to enforce a private right, such as an order for payment of costs, is a contempt of court, but nothing more. The acts of the defendant amount to a contempt of court, inasmuch as he thereby committed a breach of the monition or injunction of the court; but they amount to much more than a contempt of court. They constitute a distinct ecclesiastical offence. They were done in defiance not only of a monition of the court, but in defiance of the law as declared by the court, which is the constituted authority in such cases, and would have been punishable if there had been no monition, and the sentence is admitted to be an appropriate punishment for such a breach of the law. Of course the court could not have taken cognisance of the offence without a suit; but here there is a suit which has resulted in a decree and a monition, and the argument for the defendant assumes that for some purposes at least the monition is still in force: whether it is operative to enable the court by means of it to suppress the repetition of the offence—in other words, whether the monition can be effectually enforced—is the question. Now unless it be shown that the defendant is under some disadvantage by being prosecuted for the new offence by summary proceeding on the monition, or unless such a proceeding is prohibited by statute, no reason can be assigned why a new suit, which is undoubtedly the more costly and more dilatory, and therefore the less efficacious proceeding for the purposes of justice, should be adopted in preference to the more summary proceeding. The object is the same as would be the object of a new suit, namely, to put an end to the practices which had been denounced as illegal; and the sentence is the same as would or might have been pronounced in the form of a decree in that new suit. I proceed to notice in the first place the argument based on the Church Discipline Act, because, if the proceeding complained of be either expressly or by implication forbidden by that Act, it matters not what the ancient practice of the Court of Arches was, or what construction the court might have put upon the statute itself; for it is the practice and the duty of this court to construe Acts of Parliament which affect the temporal rights of the subject, and to protect the subject in the enjoyment of those rights. The object of the Church Discipline Act is declared in the preamble to be “to amend the manner of proceeding in causes for the correction of clerks,” and this it effects by repealing the statute Hen. 7, c. 4, which gave summary powers to archbishops and bishops, and by prescribing a uniform course of proceeding for the institution of suits. Then follows the 23rd section, which enacts that “no criminal suit or proceeding against a clerk in Holy Orders, for any offence against the laws ecclesiastical, shall be instituted in any ecclesiastical court otherwise than is hereinbefore enacted or provided.” The argument is, that this is a “proceeding” for an offence against the laws ecclesiastical, and not being instituted in the manner prescribed by the Act, it is therefore a violation of the Act. This argument appears to me to be founded on a misapprehension of the scope and purpose of the Act. If it were to prevail, the consequence would be that a decree admonishing the defendant in a suit to abstain in future from practices which were thereby declared to be illegal would be nugatory; and the Act would have taken away, and that by implication only, one of the most, if not the most ancient and probably the most effective of the processes of the court. For if the acts of the defendant were treated, as it was contended they ought to have been treated, as a mere contempt of court punishable under the 58 Geo. 3, that would be equally open to the objection that it was a “proceeding” for an offence which had not been already adjudicated on; and it would follow that no monition enjoining abstinence for the future could ever be enforced at all. It is clear to my mind that what the Act meant to abolish by the word “proceeding” was those arbitrary acts by which forfeiture or suspension was inflicted without a regular suit, of which precedents are to be found in the books, and that it no more intended to interfere with any established mode of enforcing the decrees of the court than it did with substantive law. Other sections recognise, as still existing and to continue, the ancient forms of sentence and the ancient modes of enforcing it. For example, the 11th section, speaking of the sentence to be pronounced upon hearing before the bishop and assessors, says that it shall be “according to ecclesiastical law,” and the 12th says that “all sentences by any bishop or his commissary shall be enforced by like means as a sentence pronounced by an ecclesiastical court of competent jurisdiction.” The Act leaves the kind of sentence to be awarded and the mode of enforcing it as it was before. It prescribes the mode by which criminal proceedings shall be originated against a clerk, but once commenced and carried on to judgment it leaves the suit to be worked out to execution according to the ordinary course and practice of the court. This section, therefore, appears to me to have no bearing upon the question before us. There is a proviso in the 13th section which at first sight seems to present a difficulty. It was not to my recollection noticed in the argument, but I am desirous of calling attention to it, that it might not be supposed I had overlooked it. The 15th section gives an appeal to the Privy Council. The 13th section, in anticipation of the 15th, provides that “no appeal from any interlocutory decree or order not having the force of a definite sentence, and thereby ending the suit in the Court of Appeal of the province, shall be allowed, save by the permission of the judge of such court.” At first sight the wording of the clause suggests that, when the case is ripe for appeal, it is ended for all purposes in the court below. But a moment's consideration suffices to make it clear that these words are only intended to emphasise the distinction between an interlocutory and a final judgment; and that they could not have been intended to enact that a definite sentence shall end the suit in the sense that nothing more shall be done upon it, not even to enforce the sentence, whether there is an appeal or not. That would be a contention too absurd to be accepted, and this no doubt accounts for this proviso not having been referred to in the argument. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the mode of proceeding which was adopted in this case, and which is the subject of complaint before us, is not prohibited by the Church Discipline Act. There being no other Act of Parliament bearing on the point, the only remaining question is, whether it is in accordance with the established practice of the court. It is admitted, as I have already observed, that the court had jurisdiction over the subject-matter; and jurisdiction to pronounce, for the offence of which it has adjudged the defendant guilty, the very sentence which it has pronounced. I regret that I am compelled to differ from my learned colleagues upon this branch of the case also. I think we have no jurisdiction to inquire whether the ordinary course

MARTIN v. MACKONCHIE.

MARTIN v. MACKONCHIE.

of procedure has or has not been followed in this case. The practice and procedure of every court where no Act of Parliament intervenes to regulate it, which I assume to be the case here, is within the exclusive cognisance of the court itself. If in a particular case the mode of proceeding were shown to be ever so irregular, and at variance with the ordinary practice, it would not give this court jurisdiction to interfere. Irregularity in procedure is matter of appeal, not of prohibition, and the appeal is given to the Privy Council not to this court. It is, of course, conceivable as a possibility that a system of procedure might be so vicious as to violate some fundamental principles of justice; as if, for example, it allowed a suit to be instituted and prosecuted to judgment in the absence of the party sued, and without summoning him, or giving him any opportunity of defending himself; that would entitle this court to interfere. It is quite superfluous to say that nothing of that kind is or could be suggested as regards the procedure in the Court of Arches. But neither was it, or could it be, suggested that the applicant suffered any disadvantage whatever from not having been cited to answer these charges in a fresh suit. The monition gave him full and precise notice, as full and precise as articles in a fresh suit would have given him, of what he was charged with; he had moreover an advantage which he would not have had in a fresh suit, namely, the advantage of knowing who were to be the witnesses against him, and what they were going to say. Every opportunity was given him of refuting the accusation; he might have appeared and cross-examined the witnesses, have given evidence on his own behalf, and have called witnesses to disprove the allegations. The same ground of defence and the same opportunity of putting it forward were open to him on the monition as would have been open to him on the hearing of a suit. For he could not in a second suit have contested the law as declared in the original judgment. That had become res judicata. Having abandoned his appeal, he could not have been heard to argue over again that the practices condemned in that suit were lawful practices. All that he could have done in a second suit would have been to dispute the facts, and that he could have done by way of answer to the monition as fully, as freely, and as advantageously as if he had been defending himself in a regular suit. The monition deprived him of no right or advantage which the Church Discipline Act intended that a defendant should have. I must therefore decline to enter into the question which was so earnestly and at length discussed at the bar, namely, whether the precedents do or do not sanction the course of proceeding which is complained of. As I have already said, I think that is a matter for the Court of Arches to decide, subject to an appeal to the Privy Council. I feel it due to the learned judge of the Court of Arches, however, to advert to the fact, that not only has no authority to the contrary been found, but that the various authorities on the subject, which are all collected in the return presented to the House of Commons in 1868, and which were the subject of so much comment in the argument, have been considered by the Privy Council on appeal, and that high tribunal has affirmed the competency of the Court of Arches to pass such a sentence as the one in question upon a similar proceeding for contumacy: (Hebbert v. Purchas, (L. Rep. 4 P.C. 301.) It was strongly urged upon us, in disparagement of that decision, that the Privy Council had not the assistance of counsel on the part of the then respondent, and that, if the authorities had been examined and discussed from an opposite point of view, that court might have come to a different conclusion. That may possibly be so; but I cannot speculate upon such a contingency. The judgment of the Privy Council is binding upon the Court of Arches, and, for the reasons I have mentioned, I think it is equally binding on this court; as the judgment of the Court of Appeal in ecclesiastical causes it has the authority of law, and any clergyman of the Church of England is bound as a loyal subject to obey that in common with any other branch of the law of the land. I cannot help repeating my regret that I should stand alone in this court upon a subject of such general importance, and that circumstance makes me feel considerable diffidence; but having given my best consideration to the case, I am unable to concur with the views of my learned brethren, and am constrained to say that in my judgment no excess of jurisdiction has been committed, and that this rule ought to be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—At the close of the argument in this case I was prepared to concur with my Lord Chief Justice in making the rule absolute, but my brother Lush then expressing his dissent from that course, and requiring time to consider the matter further, we parted without appointing any time for meeting to give our judgment. As the circuits were then immediately about to take place, I did not think it likely that we should be prepared to give judgment before the next sittings, and it is only within the last three days that I became aware that we should be able to meet for the purpose of delivering judgment. I do not mention this by way of objection or complaint, as I think it is extremely desirable that the matter should not be postponed to the sittings in November. I say it merely by way of excuse for not being prepared with a judgment of my own. I have been so incessantly occupied in the performance of other judicial duties that I have found it utterly impossible to abstract the necessary time from the consideration of other pressing cases. I have had the advantage of receiving in portions during the last three days a judgment prepared by my Lord Chief Justice, with whose view of the case expressed to me at the time of the argument I entirely concurred, and with whom I was then prepared to concur in delivering judgment. I have, as far as my opportunities have enabled me, considered his judgment; and although I do not desire without further consideration to be bound by every reason which he has assigned for the conclusion at which he has arrived, yet I am perfectly satisfied to rest my judgment upon the reasons and authorities stated in his most learned and elaborate judgment. I have also had the opportunity of reading the judgment prepared by my brother Lush. I cannot do otherwise than dissent from the conclusion at which he has arrived; but I am sure he will permit me to say that, in my opinion, his judgment does not grapple with the real difficulty in the case. There are two cardinal points on which I am at issue with him. The first is, that he seems to consider that this court in the exercise of its high functions is bound by the decisions of the

MARTIN v. MACKONOCHIE.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which were so often referred to during the argument. It is to be observed that the Privy Council have no original jurisdiction in questions of this description; their authority is simply appellate, and is merely a substitution for the former authority of the delegates. It cannot be doubted, as it appears to me, that in this matter that high court is as much subject to review by this court in the exercise of its authority as the Court of Delegates was. The judge of the Court of Arches was no doubt bound by those decisions, and could not have rightly acted contrary to their tenor, but in the exercise of our jurisdiction we are not bound to treat them as conclusive authorities on the subject, but are at liberty to consider the circumstances under which they were given, and the authorities on which they were based. My second difference from my brother Lush consists in this, that I consider that the offence upon which Lord Penzance adjudicated and passed the sentence now appealed against was a fresh and distinct offence against the laws ecclesiastical. I mean new and distinct from the offence for which he had been sentenced to suspension and payment of the costs by Sir Robert Phillimore when Dean of the Arches. It appears to me that Lord Penzance had no jurisdiction to adjudicate and condemn the defendant, Mr. Mackonochie, to a sentence of suspension applicable only to a definite and specific offence without fresh letters of request from the Bishop of London, in whose diocese the offence arose. All the offences charged against the defendant were committed within the diocese, and might have been dealt with in the Consistory Court of the Bishop of London; and without letters of request by the Bishop of London the Arches Court of Canterbury had no jurisdiction to take proceedings in the matter; when, therefore, Mr. Mackonochie had been convicted and sentenced by a definitive sentence of the then Dean of the Arches, and had suffered the punishment assigned to such offence, that suit was at an end. He might be liable to a summary proceeding by way of contempt and punished in the course prescribed by the statute of Geo. 3, by significavit and imprisonment; but it appears to me that in order to proceed for a fresh specific offence, which might end in a sentence of suspension or deprivation, it was essential that a new cause should be instituted, and that fresh letters of request should have been obtained from the Bishop of London. There is no analogy in the law in criminal matters by which when a new offence has been committed by a defendant he can be called upon to answer without the institution of a fresh suit conducted with the formalities which the law prescribes. It might as well be said that a man who has committed a burglary and been sentenced and suffered his punishment for such offence, and had afterwards committed a fresh burglary in the same house, could be dealt with summarily and tried and punished without any bill being preferred before a grand jury for such second offence. Possibly the monition given by Sir Robert Phillimore on the trial for the former offence might be used in aggravation of punishment on a second trial for a similar offence, but, as it appears to me, could have no other effect. That the conduct of Mr. Mackonochie is deserving of the highest censure for remaining in a church whose law and discipline he habitually disregards may be true, but that is not ad rem to the present question, and it is our duty to prohibit a course of proceeding before a tribunal which has no authority by law so to proceed. Had the proceeding been simply irregular, that could have afforded no ground for the exercise of our extraordinary jurisdiction, as irregularity by a court having general jurisdiction is no ground of prohibition, but of appeal. I do not intend, and indeed am not able, to follow these differences further, but I refer to them out of respect to my brother Lush, that he may see that I consider I have grounds of difference from him which are of essential importance to our judgment in this case.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This was an application to this court for a writ of prohibition to prevent the execution of a sentence of the Dean of the Court of Arches, suspending the defendant ab officio et beneficio, as incumbent and perpetual curate of the parish of St. Albans, Holborn, for the term of three years, for contumacy in disobeying two monitions of the court, of the 26th July 1875, and the 29th March 1878, admonishing him to abstain from wearing certain vestments while officiating in the Communion service; from causing the prayer or hymn commonly called the "Agnus" to be sung during the reception of the elements by the communicants; from making the sign of the cross to the congregation during the administration of the Communion; and from kissing the Prayer-book during Divine worship and the communion service. The suit against the defendant in respect of this departure from the established ritual, as an offence against the ecclesiastical law, had been originally instituted under the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86), in the Consistory Court of the Diocese of London, on the complaint of the promoter, Mr. Martin, as promoting the office of the judge, and had been sent by letters of request from the Bishop of London to the Court of Arches. On the 7th Dec. 1874 the Dean of the Court of Arches, by an interlocutory decree, having the force of a definitive sentence, pronounced the defendant guilty of the offences charged against him, and sentenced him to suspension ab officio for six weeks; to which sentence the learned judge superadded a monition to desist from the practices thus condemned as unlawful. On 12th June 1865 a monition was issued under the foregoing decree, admonishing the defendant, as stated, which monition was duly served on the defendant. On the 23rd March 1878 application was made by the promoter to Lord Penzance, who had succeeded Sir Robert Phillimore as Dean of the Arches, alleging disobedience on the part of the defendant to the monition of Sir Robert Phillimore, and praying that obedience thereto might be enforced. Satisfied by the affidavits adduced in support of the application, Lord Penzance declared that the defendant had disobeyed the monition of 1875, and thereupon further admonished him to abstain from the practices in question. A monition was accordingly issued on the 29th March 1878. On the 20th April ensuing a similar application was made to the learned judge, by motion, on affidavits showing continued disobedience, and asking that the monitions might be enforced in such manner as to the court should seem meet. Notice of this motion having been served, but the defendant failing to appear, Lord Penzance, on the 11th May, decreed that the defendant had disobeyed the monitions of the 12th June 1875 and 29th March 1878, and for his disobedience therein declared him "to have been guilty of contumacy," and "for his conduct aforesaid" sentenced him to be suspended ab officio et beneficio for the term of three years, condemning him also in the costs of suit. I have been the more particular in stating the proceedings thus far in detail, because it was insisted by the learned Solicitor-General, in showing cause against the rule, that the sentence pronounced by Lord Penzance was not founded on the defendant's contumacy, but was only an enforcement of the former judgment of the court. When the language of Lord Penzance is looked at, this is obviously an error. The sentence is founded expressly and exclusively on the alleged contumacy; nor can it have been otherwise. There could not possibly have been a sentence in respect of the fresh offence as such without a fresh suit. It is against the execution of the sentence thus founded on disobedience to the monition that the present application is made to this court. For the reasons I am about to state presently, I am of opinion that the rule for a prohibition must be made absolute. In the first place, I must say I entertain the gravest doubt whether the decree of Lord Penzance on the first application to him and the monition of the 29th March were not altogether ultra vires. The monition of Sir Robert Phillimore formed part of the definitive sentence pronounced in the original suit. If it had not done so, and no monition had then been given, I apprehend that the suit, which had thus been brought to an end, and in which the defendant had been condemned and had undergone his punishment, and had paid the costs, could not have been resuscitated in order to append to the sentence, on a new state of facts subsequently arising—in other words, on a new offence having been committed—something which had formed no part of it as pronounced, for the purpose of reaching such new offence summarily, instead of proceeding against the offender as for a substantive offence. I do not, however, desire to base my judgment on this ground. I am disposed to think that if a monition thus appended to a sentence for a specific offence can be made the foundation of a summary proceeding for contempt on the commission of a further offence, the monition of Sir R. Phillimore was still sufficiently alive for that purpose. It seems to me that there are much stronger reasons for making this rule absolute. I must premise what I have to say in support of the view I entertain of this case by stating that, taking the original monition to have been the foundation of the decree which we are asked to prohibit, the learned judge of the Court of Arches, after the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the cases of Martin v. Mackonochie (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 409) and Hebbert v. Purchas (L. Rep. 4 P. C. 301), could not have done otherwise than as he did in treating the disobedience of the defendant as contumacious. The Judicial Committee having appellate jurisdiction over his own court, it would have been inconsistent with the deference always paid to the decisions of a court of appeal to refuse to act upon the precedents which had been deliberately set—especially in the case of Hebbert v. Purchas—by the appellate tribunal. We, on the other hand, are not bound by the decisions in question. On the contrary, we are called upon as matter of judicial duty, on such an application as the present, to review these decisions and, if necessary, to overrule them. For it is the province of this court to restrain all tribunals not forming part of the High Court of Justice, or having appellate jurisdiction over it, within the limits of their respective jurisdictions; and among the tribunals so within its restraining authority are the Ecclesiastical Courts, of which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in its character of a court of appeal from these courts, forms a part, and is, therefore, as such—however high its position and authority in other instances—subject to our controlling jurisdiction by way of prohibition. That this is so not only results from general principle, but is established by several decisions in which it was deliberately held that a prohibition would go to Commissioners of Review, the highest court of appeal in ecclesiastical matters, as well as to the High Court of Delegates. The first is the case of Parlor v. Buller, in the 39th of Elizabeth (Moore 460). This was a suit for defamation before the High Commissioners. The commissioners entertained the suit, but a prohibition was granted on the ground that the words were not of ecclesiastical cognisance. The next was the case of Halliuell v. Jervoise (Moore 462), a suit for tithes commenced in the Consistory Court. The defeated party appealed to the Court of Audience, where the sentence was affirmed; but on further appeal to the Court of Delegates, both sentences were reversed. Thereupon an appeal was preferred to commissioners appointed on a Commission of Review under the Great Seal, under the 1 Eliz. c. 1. On an application to the Queen's Bench for a prohibition, the question turned on the validity of this commission, which was disputed on the ground that such a commission was inconsistent with the statutes of the 24th and 25th Henry 8. But on a conference of all the judges, it was held that it was within the power of the Crown to issue such a commission, as the power of appeal on review, formerly exercised by the Pope, had become vested in the Crown, and had not been taken away by the statutes of Henry 8; but it was further agreed that if the commissioners proceeded otherwise than according to the law of England, a prohibition should go to restrain them. A later case is that of Reese v. Denny (Latch. 85), which was an administration suit commenced in the Episcopal Court of Norwich, and carried thence to the Court of Arches, where the sentence of the former court was affirmed. An appeal having been brought in the High Court of Delegates, an application was made for a prohibition, the question being raised whether the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to grant administration, and whether the cause must not be remitted to the court below for that purpose. After argument a prohibition was granted. Next we have the remarkable case reported by Hobart under the name of Hutton's case (Hob. R., 15), the facts of which were as follows: Sir Timothy Hutton had presented one Rowth, as his clerk, to the Bishop of Chester for institution to a living, who, however, refused to institute him; whereupon Sir Timothy complained to the Archbishop of York, who sent a monition to the bishop to receive the clerk, or to appear before him and answer for not doing so, but the bishop did neither; whereupon the archbishop himself instituted the clerk, who was by his warrant inducted. In the meantime one King had been presented by the Crown, and he and the bishop brought a suit in the Court of Delegates to set aside the institution and induction of Rowth. Thereupon a prohibition was applied for in the Court of Common Pleas, on the ground that induction was a temporal act, triable by temporal law, and the church being full could only be avoided by a suit of quare impedit or the like, at the common law, and a prohibition to the Court of Delegates was granted. This case is the more striking from the fact mentioned by Hobart, that complaint of this act of the court was made to King James, who signified his pleasure that he would have the prohibition set aside and a consultation granted. "But," says the learned reporter, "we answered his Majesty by letter that we could not do it by the law; and in the end, after many passages to and fro, it was left, and so it stands." In another case reported by Hobart (Rep. p. 288), one Searle, "Parson of Heydon German," having been indicted and convicted of manslaughter, and having been allowed his clergy without being burnt on the hand owing to his being in orders, a suit had been instituted in the Consistory Court of London to deprive him of his benefice by reason of such conviction. The suit was carried by appeal to the Court of Delegates. But while the delegates were proceeding with it, Searle moved in the Common Pleas for a prohibition, which was granted. Hobart, who was at the time Chief Justice of that court, gives the reason, namely, that, though the conviction of a clerk for felony would suffice in the spiritual court to "build a sentence of deprivation," in the present case Searle, having been allowed the benefit of clergy, had in fact been pardoned, and under the 18 Eliz. c. 7, s. 2, which prohibited in such cases the delivery of the offender to the ordinary, as had been accustomed, could not be further corrected or called upon to make purgation in the spiritual court. In Bacon's Abridgment, tit. "Prohibition," it is stated as law that the delegates may be prohibited when they exceed their authority or proceed in matters not properly within their cognisance. These authorities abundantly establish that the High Court of Delegates was subject to the prohibiting control of this court. This being so, there can be no doubt that the same rule applies to the Judicial Committee, who have in all respects taken the place of the High Court of Delegates. Having, then, this jurisdiction, we are, in my opinion, bound to exercise it ex debito justitiæ, and not as mere matter of discretion. For though some difference of opinion has existed on this point, as appears from Bacon's Abridgment, "Prohibition B.," yet such I take to be the effect of the answer of all the judges of England in the Articuli Cleri, in the 3 Jac. I., as given by Coke in the Second Institute, p. 607, where they say that "prohibitions are not to be granted of favour but of justice;" and so it was held by all the judges of the King's Bench, in the case of Woodward v. Bonithan (1 Haym. 3), and in that view, whatever may have been said by individual judges since, I entirely concur. So that I cannot but think that to hold that the decisions in question are not to be reviewed, but are to be taken as conclusively binding upon us, would amount to little less than a dereliction of judicial duty. I yield to no one in respect for the authority of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or for the eminent members of it who took part in the decisions I have referred to, and I say unfeignedly that I feel all the responsibility and delicacy involved in the task of reviewing and overruling the decisions of such a tribunal—more especially as, in doing so, I have to deal with a branch of law with which, as a common law judge, I am, of course—though I have taken the utmost pains to make myself master of the authorities—less familiar; but I cannot allow these sentiments to lead me to shrink from a duty which, as a judge of this high court, I feel myself bound to discharge. And I have the less hesitation in dealing with the judgments in question from the circumstance that the Judicial Committee had not the advantage of hearing counsel on behalf of the parties against whom they decided, or of having their attention specially directed to the procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts; and it has always been considered that a decision pronounced against the side which has not been heard carries with it but little authority as compared with a case in which the arguments on both sides have been presented to the court. I shall presently give my reasons for holding the proceeding in the former cases of Martin v. Mackonochie and Hebbert v. Purchas to have been unwarranted by law, and for the conclusion at which I have arrived, that both the monition by Sir R. Phillimore, as well as that by Lord Penzance, as also the sentence of suspension founded upon them, the execution of which we are now asked to prohibit, were ultra vires and bad in law. But I cannot give effect to the contention of the counsel for the applicant that a suspension a beneficio is beyond the competency of an ecclesiastical court, as being a dealing with the freehold. There can in this respect be no difference between suspension and deprivation; and, as we know, deprivation a beneficio for ecclesiastical delinquency has in many instances occurred; and that the subject-matter of this suit, the wilful departure from the ritual of the church, as established by the rubric, the canons, and the Acts of Uniformity, was within the jurisdiction of the court, cannot be disputed. It is true that the common law courts have from the earliest times rigorously interdicted the Ecclesiastical Courts from exercising jurisdiction where the freehold was concerned; and there can be no doubt that the assertion of the power to deprive an incumbent of his benefice, as well as of his clerical office, was originally a usurpation on the part of the ecclesiastical authority. But the common law courts declined to interfere on the simple ground that the sentence of deprivation of the office carried with it of necessity the deprivation of the benefice, inasmuch as the clerical office gave the title to the temporal interest, and with the loss of the former all right to the latter was, as a necessary consequence, at an end. Thus Godolphin says: "Deprivation is an ecclesiastical sentence, whereby an incumbent being legally discharged from officiating in his benefice with cure, the church pro tempore becomes void" (ch. 27, tit. "Deprivation.") Therefore where the right of presentation to a living had been obtained by a simoniacal contract, and the party after having been instituted and inducted had been deprived by the spiritual court, it being urged, on an application for a prohibition in the Queen's Bench, that it was not competent to a spiritual court to meddle with the freehold, it was answered: "True it is they should not meddle to alter the freehold; but they meddled only with the manner of obtaining his preferment, which by consequence divested the freehold from him by the dissolution of his estate when his admission and institution are avoided." (Baker v. Rogers, Cro. Eliz. 798.) The sentence of deprivation a beneficio was, therefore, only the expression of what followed as a necessary effect from the sentence of deprivation ab officio, a sentence admittedly within the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical tribunals. Passing this by, and starting with the position as incontestable that a departure from the established ritual by a clerk in holy orders when officiating in public worship is an offence against the ecclesiastical law, which if made the subject of a suit properly instituted and conducted may be punished by suspension, I come to what is the real question—namely, the efficacy of such a monition as has been issued in the present case—where the monition has been appended to a definitive sentence in a penal suit—as founding a sentence of suspension or deprivation on a summary proceeding for contumacy; which, again, as the two learned judges of the Arches Court have done no more than follow the precedents set by the Judicial Committee, involves the necessity of reviewing the decisions of the latter tribunal. Now I must begin by observing that, prior to the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Martin v. Mackonochie, no instance was brought to our attention in which this summary jurisdiction, founded on a monition appended to a sentence in a penal suit, had been exercised. In Hebbert v. Purchas (L. Rep. 4 P. C. 301) the Judicial Committee caused a search for precedents to be made, but none could be found. Three or four cases were brought forward; but, as was admitted in the judgment, they totally failed to satisfy the purpose for which they were adduced, and it may safely be asserted that no such instance exists. Nor, in the numerous works on ecclesiastical law and the jurisdiction and procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is any mention of such a jurisdiction or procedure to be found. I have gone carefully through, I believe, all the writers—certainly all the writers of authority—who have written on the subject of ecclesiastical jurisdiction and procedure since the Reformation, and I have not only found no authority for the exercise of such a power, but not even a trace of it. Monition, indeed, as is well known, is a frequent incident in ecclesiastical procedure. To issue a monition and then to pronounce contumacious a party who set the process of an ecclesiastical court at defiance, or refused to obey its lawful order, and then to call in aid the statutory remedy, was, after excommunication, its earlier resource, had been done away with, the only means, except so far as modern legislation had come to its assistance, by which an ecclesiastical court could enforce its authority. But there is no mention made by former writers of a monition being superadded to a penal sentence for an ecclesiastical offence, and being thus made the means of exercising a summary jurisdiction over the offender in respect of a future offence. The first reference I find to such a jurisdiction is in Sir Robert Phillimore's work on Ecclesiastical Law, published subsequently to the two decisions of the Judicial Committee. Treating of admonition, the learned author says: "Disobedience to this admonition assumes the grave character of contempt or contumacy, and is visited by a graver punishment:" (vol. 2, p. 1088.) And in another place he says: "It is to be observed that when an admonition has been duly served after a trial upon the admonished person, disobedience to it entails the penalties incident to the contempt of the order of a lawful court:" (vol. 2, p. 1367.) But, for neither of these positions does the writer cite any authority; and in so laying down the law I presume he is speaking on the strength of the two decisions I have referred to; and I am the more led to think so because I find no reference to any such position in his edition of Burn's Ecclesiastical Law; and because when, in the later part of his work, he is dealing with the subject of suspension, and has occasion to refer to the cases of Mackonochie and Purchas, he uses this language: "In two recent cases the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council thought themselves warranted by the law in inflicting the punishment of suspension for disobedience of their orders;" to which he adds, "But for these decisions, it would have seemed that these contempts of court would be punished, as contempts of all courts are, by committing, or in the case of Ecclesiastical Courts, signifying, the offender:" (vol. 2, p. 1377.) It is pretty clear to my mind from this significant language that these decisions must have struck the very learned author as novel, and as going a good deal further than he had been prepared to expect. To get at the bottom of this question, as the foundation of any sound and satisfactory opinion, it becomes necessary to look a little more closely into the authority and procedure of these courts; and it is all-important to attend to certain distinctions which have frequently been lost sight of, and from inattention to which much confusion on this subject appears to me to have arisen. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction is divided into two main branches—civil and penal. Principles and rules of procedure applicable to the one will frequently be found inapplicable to the other. We are here dealing exclusively with the penal jurisdiction, except so far as the procedure in civil causes may throw light upon the subject of this inquiry. The suit in which the office of the judge is promoted against the defendant is for an offence against the ecclesiastical law. Now, the judicial authority capable of being exercised in respect of such offences was threefold—first by the bishop at his periodical visitations; secondly, by the bishop or his judge in the Episcopal Court, ex mero officio, if the bishop or his judge thought fit so to proceed; or, thirdly, on the office of the judge voluntarily promoted by a third party by the permission of the bishop. But between the exercise of these different forms of judicial authority an essential difference existed in respect of procedure; for, by the practice of the ecclesiastical tribunals, all causes are divided into summary and plenary. Where the jurisdiction is summary, all formality may be dispensed with. Where it is plenary, the formalities of procedure must be followed, and cannot be dispensed with. "Summary causes," says Conset (Practice, sects. 2, 3), distinguishing them from plenary, "are such as respect not the solemn and ordinary way of proceeding in judgment, but require a summary and short proceeding

'absque strepitu judicii et de simplici et plano.'" Such, it is agreed, may be the proceedings at an episcopal visitation, which may be conducted according to Ayliffe (Parergon, tit. "Visitation," p. 516), sine figura judicii, all that is strictly required being that the party who is to be visited and punished for any offence or omission shall have an opportunity of being heard. So Comyns says (Dig. Visitor C.), "the proceedings are to be summariè, simpliciter, et de plano, sine strepitu aut figurâ judicii." It will be important to bear this in mind further on. On the other hand, causes in which the office of the judge was promoted by a private individual were always plenary, and, as such, required to be conducted according to regular form. Oughton enumerates among plenary causes, "Causæ omnes correctionum ex officio voluntariè promotæ" (Ordo Judiciorum, tit. vii., 12). "Negotium ex officio mero," he says, "est causa summaria, ex officio voluntariè promotæ, plenaria" (Ibid. n. 2). "Notandum est," he says again, "quod omnes causæ correctionem ex mero judicis officio institutæ sunt summariæ; saltem in iis solet summariè procedi, et ita est procedendum. Secus de officio voluntariè promotæ" (tit. 144, s. 9). Again: "Causa correctionis ex officio mero est causa summaria; causa vero correctionis ex officio voluntariè promotæ est causa plenaria" (tit. 150, n. 2). For which reason he says, "Eo modo procedendum est ut in cæteris causis plenariis" (tit. 150, s. 3). Where the cause was plenary, it was essential that all the formalities incident to a plenary cause should be observed. "Plenary causes," says Conset (Practice, part 1, sect. 2), "are those which require a solemn order in the proceedings." There must," he says, "be a formal citation to appear in the cause; the style of the court must be observed, with the names of the parties. A time and place must be named for appearing. Articles must next be exhibited. Then comes the answer of the defendant; then the contestatio litis; and, if required, the oath of the defendant; then the proofs, with the opportunity for cross-examination; then the hearing, and finally judgment." Assuredly there could be no relaxation as to these requirements in a penal suit. "In all causes of deprivation," says Ayliffe, followed herein by the other text writers, "where a person is in actual possession of an ecclesiastical benefice, these things must concur—viz., first, the person must be cited or admonished to appear; secondly, a charge must be given against him by way of libel or articles to which he is to give an answer; thirdly, a competent time must be assigned for proofs and interrogatories; fourthly, the person accused shall have the liberty of counsel to defend his cause, to except against witnesses, and to bring legal proof against them; and, fifthly, there must be a solemn sentence read by the bishop after hearing the merits of the cause or pleadings on both sides; and these are the fundamentals of all judicial proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts in order to a deprivation; and if these things be not observed the party has a just cause of appeal, and may have a remedy in the Superior Court:" (Parergon, p. 208.) Speaking of the articles necessary in such a suit, Sir Robert Phillimore (Eccles. Law, p. 1296) says, "The court cannot go beyond the offence charged, nor the articles beyond the citation." And if these formalities are essential to a proceeding as founding a sentence of deprivation, so must they also be necessary to found a sentence of suspension, which, on all hands, the authorities agree in treating as a deprivation pro tempore. Such being the former law, the Church Discipline Act (the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86) has intervened, prescribing the mode in which proceedings against persons in holy orders for offences against the ecclesiastical law shall be initiated, but leaving the former procedure of these courts unaltered (see sect. 13). What was before a plenary cause remains so still, and in it all the formalities incidental to a plenary suit must be observed. That that procedure has not been followed in the present instance is beyond controversy. The proceedings have been altogether of a summary character. Let us next consider in what cases monitions have been used either as incidental to ecclesiastical procedure, or as matter of ecclesiastical censure and punishment in the way of definitive sentence: for in one or other of these forms alone do monitions occur as incidental to such procedure; after which we shall have to consider in what way contumacious disobedience to such monitions has been dealt with according to established law and practice. As incidental to procedure, monitions were frequently used, whether in a civil or in a penal suit, in order to compel the party proceeded against to do something necessary to the progress of the suit—as to appear; to answer to the articles; to appear to be examined on oath, or the like. Disobedience to such a monition became contumacy, and was treated as contempt of court. As incidental to a definitive sentence, where the decree of the court was not completed by the act of the court itself, but required some act to be done by the party, a monition to do the thing decreed to be done was issued; and here again disobedience rendered the party contumacious. Thus, as Sir Robert Phillimore observes (vol. 2, p. 1259), there might be a monition for alimony, or to churchwardens to hold a vestry, or to a clergyman to reside, or the like; so also to pay the costs if decreed. In short, a monition might be issued, to do anything which it was competent to the court to order the party against whom the decree was directed to do, and if disobeyed rendered the party contumacious. But then how was such contumacy to be dealt with? In one way and in one way only. It is familiar knowledge that the only coercive process or punishment for contumacy possessed by the Ecclesiastical Courts was, prior to 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, excommunication, which, when "signified" (as it was termed) to the Court of Chancery, was followed by the writ de excommunicato capiendo, confirmed and regulated by the statute of the 5 Eliz. c. 23, under which the party was committed to prison till he made his submission and rendered obedience. For this process, by the Act of 53 Geo. 3, was substituted the writ de contumace capiendo, under which a party decreed to be contumacious might be imprisoned till submission and obedience; to which was added by 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 93, power to sequester the estates of contumacious persons privileged from arrest, and who were not, therefore, subject to the process in question. Thus the Ecclesiastical Court Commissioners say: "The execution of the sentence, in case there be no appeal interposed, is either completed by the court itself, as by granting probate or administration, or signing a sentence of separation; or remains to be completed by the act of the party, as by exhibiting an inventory and an account, by payment of the tithes sued for, and other similar matters, in which case execution is enforced by the compulsory process of contumacy, significavit, and attachment." The law is fully stated in Dr. Stephen's very learned and useful treatise on the Laws relating to the Clergy under the title "Excommunication." "By the ancient practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts," he writes, "it was only by means of an excommunication that they were able to enforce their sentences in any case whatever. So here the common law stepped in to their assistance; for in case of the refusal of the party to submit to his sentence, and being thereupon excommunicated as for a contempt, a writ de excommunicato capiendo was issued, under which he was to be taken and committed to the county gaol till he was reconciled to the church, and such reconciliation certified by the bishop. But now, by statute 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 2, excommunication in all cases of contempt is discontinued; and in lieu thereof, where a lawful citation or sentence has not been obeyed, the judge shall have power, after a certain period, to pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt, and to signify the same to the Court of Chancery. Whereupon a writ de contumace capiendo shall issue from that court, which shall have the same force and effect as formerly belonged in case of contempt to a writ de excommunicato capiendo." Thus, in R. v. Baines (12 A. & E. 210), it was held that in a civil suit, judgment being given that a party shall do a given thing—as, e.g., pay a given sum for church rate—a monition may issue, and a writ de contumace capiendo may follow upon it, where contumacy occurs, either as incidental to procedure or by disobedience to a lawful order of the court. This being so, was there anything to alter the process in the case of a clerk in orders? Could suspension be resorted to in such a case as a means of overcoming the contumacy and enforcing obedience? I apprehend assuredly not. The process is spoken of as being, and I see no reason whatever to doubt was, the same whether directed against a layman or a clerk in orders—the clerk in orders not being in this respect in a less favourable position, except when subject to the visitatorial authority of the bishop. Suspension is, not mentioned by the ecclesiastical authorities as a proceeding to which a clerk is liable by judicial sentence as a means of coercion, as distinguished from punishment, as will be seen on referring to the title "Suspension," in the standard works on Ecclesiastical Law. "The mode of enforcing all process," say the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, "in case of disobedience, is by pronouncing the party cited to be contumacious; and if the disobedience continues a significavit issues, upon which an attachment from Chancery is obtained to imprison the party till he obeys." The writers on Ecclesiastical Law are agreed in saying that, except where the powers of the courts have been enlarged by statute, as in the case of simony, non-residence, and the like, the only means of enforcing the decrees of the Ecclesiastical Courts, whether interlocutory or definitive, and whether in a civil or criminal suit, was by the writ de contumace capiendo. And here I have to observe that in the instances in which a definite decree thus requires for its completion an act to be done by the party, and a monition to do it issues, the suit in which this occurs is, with one or two exceptions, in the nature of a civil proceeding, or has reference to some obligation or duty which it is the object of the suit to enforce, and the performance of which it is competent to the court to enjoin. Penance, to which I shall presently refer, affords such an exception. Non-residence would appear to lie on the confines of the civil and penal jurisdictions. If the suit is brought simply to enforce residence, monition would be proper, and would carry with it the statutory consequences of contumacy, and no other. If non-residence is made the subject of a suit with a view to deprivation or suspension, the suit becomes a plenary one and cannot be disposed of summarily as a case of contumacy. I find no instance of such a proceeding, by way of anticipation, in a suit in panam in respect of an offence committed against the ecclesiastical law. Nor could it well be otherwise. No one has a right to presume, where an offence has been committed, that the offender, having undergone his punishment, will again offend; still less could a court of justice, unless authorised by established practice or by statute, on such an assumption arrogate to itself the power, if the offence should be repeated, to withdraw it from the ordinary course and procedure of law, and to make it the subject of summary procedure as amounting to contumacy. The case is still stronger when looked at as one in which monition is resorted to, not as a means of furthering the progress of a suit—for which purpose it would be equally available in a penal as in a civil suit—or as a means of compelling the performance of a duty under a decree in a civil suit—but as a definitive sentence in a penal suit. Punishments, or, as the civilians term them, "censures"—"censuræ sive coerciones ecclesiasticæ"—according to Sir Robert Phillimore, following herein the writers who have preceded him, are, as regards those to which both clergy and laity are subject in common, as follows: 1. Admonition, otherwise called monition; 2. Penance; 3. Suspension ab ingressu ecclesiæ; 4. Excommunication, with the spiritual and temporal consequences incident to it. Those to which the clergy alone are subject are: 1. Suspension; 2. Sequestration; 3. Deprivation; and 4. Degradation. "Of these," says Sir Robert Phillimore, "admonition or monition is the first and lightest form of ecclesiastical censure, whether to clergymen or laymen." It is obvious that here "monition" is spoken of not as the foundation of any ulterior consequences, but as a form, however mild, of punishment—the open and public censure or rebuke of the judge for ecclesiastical misconduct—generally accompanied by the party thus censured being condemned in costs—and to be remembered, doubtless, as matter of aggravation should a repetition of the offence occur—but not capable of being used as the foundation of any future proceeding of a summary character on the score of contumacy in case of such repetition. And this for two reasons—first, that any repetition of the offence would in itself constitute a substantive and distinct offence; second, that constituting a substantive offence, the offender, where the suit was instituted by a prosecutor promoting the office of the judge, could only be proceeded against in a plenary suit—that is to say, a suit in which a formal citation must be served articles exhibited, and all formalities strictly observed—a summary proceeding in a penal suit, otherwise than as matter of process, being altogether unknown to and contrary to the spirit of ecclesiastical procedure. Nor has the Church Discipline Act abated anything of the formal requirements of the Ecclesiastical Courts in a penal suit. Sect. 13 leaves the procedure precisely as it was before. It introduces no abatement of its rigour in respect of the formalities previously required in a penal suit. And here an observation presents itself, which it will be important to bear in mind. It is nowhere said, nor does it appear to have occurred to any of the authorities on ecclesiastical law, that of these different forms of ecclesiastical censure or punishment, from monition to excommunication, a second can be superadded to a first; still less than when once a definitive sentence has been pronounced, and a specific punishment awarded, the judge is not functus officio and the judicial authority exhausted, as is the case on the trial of an indictment in the court of common law. I am strongly disposed to think that monition, as part of a definitive sentence, with the view of treating disobedience as contumacy, has been adopted in these recent instances from its use in the procedure or civil jurisdiction of the courts, the distinction between civil and penal jurisdiction not having always been kept sufficiently in view. The subject of monition, as also that of contempt or contumacy, is fully discussed by the civilians. Nowhere is it said that a monition can be superadded and appended to a definitive sentence in a penal suit, so as to enable a subsequent offence to be treated summarily as contumacious. Suspension is, as might be expected, amply dealt with. But nowhere is it said that suspension ever has been or can be inflicted as a punishment for contumacy in disobeying a monition in a penal suit in which the office of the judge has been promoted by a third party. It is possible that the notion that suspension might follow on a monition may have had its origin in the doctrine of the early canonists, that when in the exercise of the visitatorial power the bishop inquires summarily into clerical offences with a view to deprivation or suspension, a monition must precede the sentence: (see Gibson Codex, p. 1046.) Again, whatever the penalty to which a party pronounced contumacious was liable, such penalty was not treated in the way of punishment, but as a means of overcoming the contumacy and enforcing obedience, and was only imposed quousque. It ceased on submission and obedience. The party in contempt could not be summarily condemned to punishment for a definite period independently of future submission. A striking illustration of the position that even in a penal, as well as in a civil suit, the only means of enforcing their decrees which the Ecclesiastical Courts possessed, except where their powers had been enlarged by statute, was derived from the statutes I have been referring to, is to be found in an instance in which, in a penal suit, the decree was not completed by the act of the court, but something was required to be done by the party against whom the decree was directed in order to carry it out—namely, in the instance of penance, which, as we have seen, is a form of ecclesiastical punishment, and which, though now obsolete, was formerly much in use as a punishment for certain offences. If the party enjoined to do penance refused to comply, the only mode of enforcing obedience mentioned in the books, whether against layman or churchman, was by excommunication, or, in later times, by the writ de contumacia capiendo. It is nowhere suggested that suspension or deprivation might be applied in such a case where the offender was a clerk in orders. Before I quit this portion of the subject I have also to call attention to a very important distinction taken in the Act of the 53 Geo. 3, in civil suits and as a means of enforcing interlocutory decrees, between excommunication as incident to a civil suit and excommunication as a form of punishment in a penal suit. While the Act supercedes the former, substituting for it the writ de contumacia capiendo, it expressly preserves it “on definitive sentences, or in interlocutory decrees having the force and effect of definitive sentences, pronounced as spiritual censures for offences of ecclesiastical cognisance,” limiting, however, its operation in such cases to a period of six months—thus affording a statutory recognition of the difference I have been adverting to between contumacy in the course of a suit, and any act amounting to an offence under the ecclesiastical law. Thus far I have been dealing with the law as administered in a plenary penal suit in the Episcopal Courts. But where the bishop dealt with offences of the clergy of his diocese—in which would be comprehended simony, non-residence, non-performance, or irregular performance, of divine service, heresy, false doctrine, profaneness, immorality, drunkenness, and the like—in his office of a visitor at a visitation, in what has been termed his forum domesticum, or where a proceeding was instituted ex mero officio, the case was altogether different. There the formalities required in a regular suit were not deemed necessary. There the bishop in the one case, or his judge in the other, might proceed summarily, subject, however, to the condition insisted on by the canonists, that, where the offence was one of omission, a monition should precede deprivation or suspension. Not, however, that, in a matter which amounted to an offence against the law or discipline of the church, disobedience to the monition created the offence for which deprivation or suspension might afterwards be decreed. The definitive sentence was founded, not on the disobedience, but on the offence itself. The purpose and effect of the monition was practically to give a locus penitentie to the offender or party in default. Thus stood the law as administered by the Ecclesiastical Courts till the time when, within the last few years, the jurisdiction now exercised was for the first time assumed. I had almost said—I hope it will be understood not using the term in any offensive sense—usurped—not, indeed, by the judges of the ordinary Ecclesiastical Courts, but by judges of whom, however great and eminent, I hope I may be pardoned for saying that they may be supposed to be less familiar with the administration of ecclesiastical law, namely, by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council sitting on appeal. In the year 1863, in a case of Martin v. Mackonochie (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 409), the parties being the same as are before us in the present proceedings, a suit had been instituted in the Consistory Court of London against the defendant, a clerk in holy orders, and perpetual curate of the parish of St. Albans, Holborn, for offences against the ecclesiastical law in the manner of administering the Holy Communion, in the use of incense, the undue elevation of the paten and cup, as also the practice of excessive kneeling and prostration before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, the mixing of water with the wine, and the use of lighted candles during the celebration of the Communion. The suit having been transferred by letters of request to the Court of Arches, the learned judge of that court decided that the defendant had offended in respect of the use of incense, the elevation of the paten and cup, and in mixing water with the wine used in the administration of the Communion, and admonished him not to repeat these practices; but he declined or omitted to pronounce that the defendant had offended by the alleged kneeling and prostration, or by the use of lighted candles. The promoter having appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council against this judgment in respect of the two last-mentioned particulars, the Judicial Committee held that the respondent, the defendant in the original suit, had offended against the law ecclesiastical, within the meaning of the Uniformity Acts, in the particulars relating to the kneeling and prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, and in the using of lighted candles during the celebration of the Communion; and reported that the respondent, in addition to the admonition administered in the court below, should be admonished to abstain from the practices pronounced by them to be unlawful. An Order in Council to that effect was accordingly made, and a monition under the seal of the court was in due course issued and served on the respondent. This judgment having been pronounced at the close of 1868, two years afterwards a petition was presented to the Judicial Committee praying them to enforce obedience to the monition, on affidavits showing that the defendant still persisted in the practices against which he had been admonished. The defendant, the respondent in the cause, not appearing either by counsel or in person, their Lordships, on the application of the appellant's counsel, made an order that the respondent and the witnesses who had made affidavits in his favour should appear on a given day to be cross-examined, which was accordingly done. The evidence having been taken, their Lordships decided that the respondent had been guilty of disobedience to the monition, and sentenced him to be suspended ab officio for three months: (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 409.) It is to be observed that, the respondent neither appearing in person nor being represented by counsel, no question was raised as to the jurisdiction thus invoked and exercised. Two years later the case of Hebbert v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 105), a case in many respects similar to the foregoing, came before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, on an appeal from the decision of the Court of Arches, so far as the judgment there had been favourable to the defendant, in a suit in which he, being a clergyman in holy orders, had been charged with various breaches of ecclesiastical law in the celebration of the Communion, among other things as regarded the vestments worn by him during its performance, the position assumed by him during the prayer of consecration, as also in the use of wafer bread, and of an admixture of water with the sacramental wine. The judge of the Court of Arches having declined to pronounce against the defendant and to admonish him in respect of these particulars, the promoter appealed to the Judicial Committee, who, after argument, decided against the respondent in respect of these charges, and advised, as in the former case, that a monition should be issued admonishing him to abstain from such practices in future; and an Order in Council having been made accordingly, a monition was issued and served on the respondent. Later in the year an application was made to the Judicial Committee, by a motion founded on affidavits showing a continued use of the practices against which the defendant had been thus admonished, for a sentence of deprivation against him for his contumacy and contempt: (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 605.) In this case, notwithstanding the precedent set in the case of Martin v. Mackmochie, their Lordships appear to have had some misgiving as to their power to pass sentence of deprivation or suspension for contumacy on motion, and desired to have further information regarding the exercise of such a power by the Court of Delegates, to whose powers they had succeeded under the Acts of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 92, and 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 41; and they accordingly directed the motion to stand over for that purpose. Their Lordships having on a subsequent occasion been referred by counsel to certain alleged precedents, the Lord Chancellor Hatherley pronounced a judgment, as to which I can only say I think there must be some error in the report, as his Lordship, having first observed that "the researches of counsel have resulted in no such precedent being found—as, indeed, their Lordships supposed would probably be the case;" and, having added that the court was of opinion that it "could not proceed to enforce compliance with the order which had been disobeyed by any summary process for contempt through the medium of a motion," is notwithstanding made to say: "On the other hand, their Lordships are quite satisfied that there exists in this tribunal, as there did exist in the High Court of Delegates—all the powers of which have been transferred to this committee—a power of suspension, not only ab officio, but a beneficio also, as a summary punishment for contumacy;" having said which, his Lordship proceeds to pass sentence of suspension for a year in respect of the contumacy. Yet the only proceeding then pending before their Lordships, and on which this summary jurisdiction was exercised, was a summary application on motion. The suit, out of which the appeal had sprung which gave jurisdiction to the Judicial Committee over the defendant, had terminated in the suspension for six weeks; and the two-fold monition, which together formed the sentence—monition being, as we have seen, a form of ecclesiastical censure; and assuming even that disobedience to a monition of this nature would amount to a substantive offence against ecclesiastical law, which might be made the subject of a substantive charge in a fresh suit, no such charge was before the Judicial Committee: the only proceeding before it was an application to deal with a further and substantive offence summarily on motion. I am unable—if I may be forgiven for saying so—to follow the reasoning in the judgment in question. Precedent and authority being altogether wanting, we are left without any ground being assigned for the assertion that the Court of Delegates had before possessed, and therefore the Judicial Committee, as their successors, now possess, the power of suspending a clergyman as a summary punishment for contumacy. So far as I am aware, no instance of the exercise of this power in a penal suit, prior to these judgments of the Judicial Committee, is anywhere to be found. Assuming even that the issuing of the monition was within the competency of the court—which, however, I cannot admit—and that the defendant in disobeying it had been guilty of contumacy, the recognised penalty of contumacy was not suspension, but, as I have shown, imprisonment under 53 Geo. 3. Moreover, it is not a question whether the Court of Delegates possessed such a power, but whether the courts of the first instance, the Consistory Court, and the Court of Arches, possessed it; for, the authority and power of a court of appeal, however high its position, can be no greater, except as to correcting the judgment of the court below, than those of the court appealed from. It can annul the judgment or can affirm it, or in some cases may reform it; but it can pronounce only the judgment which the court below could and should have given. What required to be established, therefore, was, that the episcopal or archiepiscopal courts possessed this power of suspending summarily for disobedience to a monition in respect of an offence against the ecclesiastical law. But for this neither authority nor precedent is to be found; nor, I venture to think, has or can any sufficient ground be given for asserting it, while there is, as I shall presently show, very sufficient ground for maintaining the contrary. The cases referred to in Hebbert v. Purchas were again brought forward on the argument in the present case, but they fail to furnish any precedent or authority in support of the jurisdiction now in question. The case principally relied on is that of Harrison v. The Archbishop of Dublin, which in the first instance came before the courts on a writ of prohibition, and eventually found its way to the House of Lords: (2 Bro. P.C. 199.) Harrison, being the rector of St. John's, Dublin, had altogether omitted to perform divine service in the parish church. Summoned by the archbishop to attend at a visitation to answer for not performing divine service, he declined to appear, upon which he was suspended by the archbishop for contumacy. Hereupon he applied to the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland for a writ of prohibition; and, having been put to declare in prohibition, set forth that the rectory of St. John's had formerly been attached to the priory of the Holy Trinity of Dublin; and that when that priory had been suppressed by King Henry VIII. and the deanery of Dublin established in its place, the rectory had by the King's gift been attached to one of the prebends of the cathedral; that, having been appointed a prebendary, he had acquired the rectory by right of his prebend; and that, so long as he continued to be a prebendary, the rectory being inseparable from the prebend, he could not be deprived of the rectory unless first deprived of his prebend; that as prebendary he was not subject to the visitation of the archbishop, and therefore was not subject to it in respect of the rectory, nor subject to be deprived of or suspended from the rectory so long as he remained prebendary of the cathedral. This contention was overruled by the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, as also on appeal by the Court of Queen's Bench in England, and lastly by the House of Lords. But it is to be observed that the sole question raised was as to whether under the special circumstances the living was subject to the visitatorial power of the archbishop. No question was raised as to the manner in which that power, assuming it to exist, had been exercised. The decision does not therefore in any way affect the present question. In a subsequent stage, the matter assumed a different form. Some years later, Harrison, who persisted in not performing service, was admonished by the archbishop, at a visitation, to extract, within a month of that time, a licence to serve the cure of souls, and to preach in the parish church of St. John's. Disobeying the monition, he was pronounced contumacious, and sentenced to be suspended. He appealed to the Court of Delegates, taking, in the first place, the same ground as before, as to the rectory of St. John's not being subject to the archbishop's visitation; but, in addition thereto, insisting that the proceeding had been irregular and void, because no articles had been exhibited against him or any proofs brought in. The delegates rejected the appeal, and rightly. The first point had been settled by the decision of the House of Lords in the previous case; and, as regarded the second, it was established law that proceedings instituted by the ordinary ex mero officio, and a fortiori proceedings at a visitation, might be dealt with summarily. Articles and proofs therefore in a matter within the personal knowledge of the bishop, and within his immediate jurisdiction—as non-performance of divine service undoubtedly was—would be superfluous and unnecessary, and could not be insisted on. Here, again, no question was raised, nor was any decision pronounced, as to the power of the archbishop to suspend, whether before or after monition; the only questions involved being whether the rectory was within his jurisdiction, and whether the proceedings were not void for irregularity. This case, and those which follow it, were cited from a series of cases extracted by Mr. Rothery, the Registrar of the Court of Arches, from the records of the Court of Delegates, and printed by order of the House of Commons in 1868 (No. 135). But it is to be observed that in these records neither the arguments of counsel nor the grounds of the decisions appear; and it is therefore impossible to say with certainty on what points these decisions turned. They are therefore of but little authority. The case of Higgins v. The Archbishop of Dublin (Ib., No. 136) was precisely the same as the foregoing, except that the appellant appeared before the archbishop, and therefore was not declared contumacious for not appearing. Having, however, been ordered to procure a licence, as Harrison had been, he was suspended for contumacy in not doing so, and the sentence was upheld on appeal. The same observations apply to this case as to the foregoing. That a complaint of non-residence or non-performance of public worship is within the visitatorial authority of the ordinary seems clear. "To whom," asks Sir Robert Phillimore, in the case of The Bishop of Winchester v. Rugg, L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 252 (a case of non-performance of divine service), "are the parishioners to look for redress for this wrong done to them? How are they to obtain the performance of divine service in their church? Surely by an appeal to the authority of their bishop. He has the cura curarum animarum within his diocese. It is his bounden duty to enforce in every church in his diocese the performance of the services prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. I see no reason to doubt," the learned author goes on to say, "the general authority of the ordinary in matters of this kind, recognised by the universal ecclesiastical law as inherent in the nature of his office and necessary for the performance of the duties which are cast upon him, is properly applied to a case of this kind." Another case referred to was that of Boughton v. The Archbishop of York (No. 134), which again was an appeal from the exercise of episcopal authority. Boughton, a vicar choral of the cathedral of York, having absented himself from the discharge of his duties, the dean and chapter appointed a substitute, and sequestered the revenue of the office for his use; upon which Boughton gave notice to the receiver not to pay the substitute. For this the dean and chapter called upon him to make a suitable apology, and on his refusal suspended him until he should comply. On appeal to the archbishop the sentence of the dean and chapter was confirmed. A further appeal to the Court of Delegates was attended by a like result. This, again, was an instance of visitatorial authority summarily exercised in foro domestico. The cases, therefore, which have arisen on the exercise of visitatorial jurisdiction are beside the present question, when we are dealing with a jurisdiction in which the formalities required by strict law have to be complied with. The case of Thomas Jones (No. 63), rector of Llandyrnook, in the county of Denbigh, differs somewhat from the foregoing, inasmuch as the suit against him, for not reading the prayers in the accustomed place, had been instituted not by the bishop ex mero officio, but on the presentment of the churchwardens in the consistory court of the diocese. Having been monished to read the prayers in the accustomed place, the defendant had peremptorily refused to obey the monition. For this the bishop ordered him to show cause why he should not be suspended ab officio. Not appearing to show cause he was suspended. On appeal the sentence was upheld by the Court of Arches, and afterwards by the Court of Delegates. But here the churchwardens were, beyond all question, the proper persons to present in respect of any irregularities in the performance of divine service, as fully appears from the statement of the law, as found under the title "Churchwardens" in Burns' Ecclesiastical Law, or in Dr. Stephen's treatise on the Laws relating to the Clergy. The proceedings may therefore have been considered as instituted ex mero officio, and consequently as not subject to the necessity of being strictly formal; nor does it appear that any objection was taken to the exercise of the episcopal jurisdiction in a summary form. These cases are, for the reasons I have already given, inapplicable to the question before us. I entirely concur with the Judicial Committee in thinking that none of them establish a precedent for the exercise of the summary jurisdiction in dispute. That neither precedent nor authority is to be found for the existence of this jurisdiction prior to its recent exercise is, I cannot help thinking, a very strong argument against it. Nor do I feel the force of the observation that no instance has been found of its exercise being held to be unlawful. That no attempt has ever been made to exercise it will readily account for the fact that no instance of its rejection is to be found. I cannot help thinking that it is incumbent on those who assert and invoke a jurisdiction so unusual to give proof of its existence. But it is not only that no authority or precedent can be found to support the summary jurisdiction thus exercised; a still more formidable objection is, first, that such a jurisdiction cannot in the nature of things properly exist, and, secondly, that its exercise would be contrary to fundamental principles. As regards the first point, it is clear that the Court of Arches possesses no primary jurisdiction over offences committed within any other diocese than that of Canterbury, except so far as such jurisdiction is conferred by the letters of request from the bishop of the diocese. But the letters of request are necessarily confined to the specific offence which is the subject-matter of the suit transferred, and, as I have already stated on the authority of Sir Robert Phillimore, the suit so transferred relates to the offence expressly set forth in the articles which form the subject of the complaint, and to that alone. Being confined to the specific charge thus articulated, the letters of request, as it seems to me, do not and cannot confer jurisdiction in respect of any other offence committed beyond the sphere of the metropolitan jurisdiction, and any further offence so committed remains in that of the diocesan. It may, perhaps, be said that the bishop, having transferred the cause to the Court of Arches, transfers with it the power to issue such a monition, and to punish for contumacy in disobeying it. But this assumes that the bishop's commissary would himself have that power in the diocesan court, which remains to be proved, and which, as far as I can see my way, is not only not proved, but incapable of proof. A fortiori is it to be proved that the diocesan can thus, by transferring a specific cause, confer, as it were, by anticipation, on the metropolitan court jurisdiction over offences not yet committed, and which are therefore not as yet within his own—a proposition which to my mind I must say involves a legal absurdity. And what if the second offence should be committed within the limits of a different diocese? Would the transfer of the cause by the bishop of one diocese give the court power to treat as contumacy an offence committed in another, the bishop of which might possibly have refused his sanction to a prosecution on account of the second, and thus enable one bishop to invade the province of another? Finally, I ask by what authority can an ecclesiastical court—whatever may be the stage of the proceeding—by reason of a suit having been instituted in reference to a specific offence, assume to itself, without statutory authority, a power to keep the party, for all time to come, in a state of surveillance, and as subject to a summary jurisdiction hitherto unknown to the ecclesiastical law? To what extent is this jurisdiction to be carried? Over what area of episcopal jurisdiction is it to reach? To what limit in point of time is it to endure?—considerations which would be important if the matter were made the subject of legislation, but which are left wholly at large in the exercise of this novel authority. I fail altogether to see how it can be competent to a bishop to confer on the Court of Arches, by way of anticipation, jurisdiction over offences to be committed in the future. Be this as it may, I am of opinion that letters of request relating to a specific charge carry no such jurisdiction with them with reference to a future offence. That the exercise of such jurisdiction would, in more than one respect, be inconsistent with general principles of penal jurisprudence will, I think, readily appear. In the first place, the difference between plenary and summary jurisdiction in the matter of criminal procedure is recognised and established in every system of penal jurisprudence, including, beyond all question, the law ecclesiastical; and no court can, without legislative authority, take upon itself, ex proprio motu, to substitute the one for the other. Yet that is what has been done here. Every departure from the established ritual in a member of the church having the cure of souls is an offence against ecclesiastical law, and constitutes in itself a distinct and substantive offence, and not the less so because the offender may already have been guilty of the like offence. It is therefore obvious that a repetition of a first offence may be so treated. What reason can be given why it must not be so treated? But if it were so treated, the prosecutor promoting the office of the judge would in such a case have to go through all the formalities of procedure required in a plenary cause; and, as I have shown, a suit so instituted in respect of an ecclesiastical offence was, and still remains under the Church Discipline Act, a plenary cause; and, as we have seen, in a suit in pœnam for an ecclesiastical offence all the formalities of the criminal procedure must of necessity be observed. If a suit were thus instituted in respect of a second offence as a distinct and substantive offence, a citation with all its formalities would be necessary, and articles must be exhibited—and how much is involved in these requirements will be seen on consulting Oughton, title "Citation," or Burn's "Ecclesiastical Law," title "Practice"—the defendant must have the opportunity of answering, and of being examined on oath, of traversing the facts, of demurring in point of law; in short, all the incidents of procedure required by the established law and by the statute must be gone through, and any summary proceeding, such as treating the case as one of contumacy, would be out of the question. By what authority short of legislative enactment can a defendant be deprived of the right to insist on the observance of these formalities? Oh, but, it is said, substantial justice has been done, the facts were fully proved, and the offence was the same as that of which the defendant had before been convicted; and, though this may have been, strictly speaking, an informal and possibly irregular proceeding, full opportunity was afforded him of being heard and making his defence as much as if all the formalities required in a plenary suit had been complied with. To which, at least out of court, many persons will be disposed to add in thought, if not in words: "These Ritualists are very obstinate and troublesome, and this, being the shortest, is the best way of putting them down; there is no occasion to be over nice in dealing with them." It seems to me, I must say, a strange argument in a court of justice to say that when, as the law stands, formal proceedings are in strict law required, yet, if no substantial injustice has been done by dealing summarily with a defendant, the proceedings should be upheld. In a court of law such an argument a convenienti is surely inadmissible. In a criminal proceeding the question is not alone whether substantial justice has been done, but whether justice has been done according to law. All proceedings in pœnam are, it need scarcely be observed, strictissimi juris; nor should it be forgotten that the formalities of law, though here and there they may lead to the escape of an offender, are on the whole intended to insure the safe administration of justice and the protection of innocence, and must be observed. A party accused has the right to insist on them as matter of right, of which he cannot be deprived against his will; and the judge must see that they are followed. He cannot set himself above the law which he has to administer, or make or mould it to suit the exigencies of a particular occasion. Though a murderer should be taken red-handed in the act, if there is a flaw in the indictment the criminal must have the benefit of it. If the law is imperfect, it is for the Legislature to amend it. The judge must administer it as he finds it. And the procedure by which an offender is to be tried, though but ancillary to the application of the law and to the ends of justice, is as much part of the law as the substantive law itself. I cannot, therefore concur in the view that because the defendant might have defended himself on this summary proceeding, or, if a formal suit had been instituted against him, must upon the facts necessarily have been condemned, therefore the proceeding in question was valid and ought to be upheld. Such reasoning has and can have no place in an English court of justice. It may be that this summary jurisdiction would be exceedingly useful in order to prevent erratic clergymen from setting the law at defiance, and retaining benefices in a church, the rules and ritual of which they habitually disregard, if the Legislature should think proper to create it. But its possible utility affords no justification for usurping it, and expediency is a new and, I must say, to me strange ground to assign for upholding the exercise of assumed judicial authority when it cannot be shown to exist in point of law. If the effect of our decision will be to enable Mr. Mackonochie to continue to set the law at defiance, I shall greatly regret it; but I cannot allow any such consideration to operate in deciding, not whether rough justice may not have been done, but—what, after all, when looked at judicially is a dry question of law—whether the sentence we are asked to prohibit has been according to law. At the same time let it not be for a moment supposed that the law is not quite strong enough to deal with and punish such offences, if the right course is pursued. The only question is whether that course, as prescribed by law, may be departed from, and another, unknown to the law, substituted for it. It is obviously a very different thing to treat as contumacy the refusal to do a specific thing which the court has authority to enjoin, or to treat as such a substantive offence for which the law has itself provided the appropriate treatment. Surely the latter is to make the court, as it were, supersede the law. What would be thought if the judges were to determine without legislative authority that they would in future admonish all persons convicted and sentenced for larceny not to repeat the offence, and if they did so, were to deal with them summarily as for contempt, without the formality of an indictment or the verdict of a jury? Yet in principle the innovation would be no greater than is involved in the proceedings adopted in the present case. Another grievance of which a defendant so dealt with may justly complain is that the power of appealing, if not on the facts, at all events on the law, which he would have had on a second suit, is by this summary mode of proceeding taken from him. Nor let it be said that the power of appealing of which he is thus deprived may not be of material advantage to him. The facts may not be precisely the same. The sentence in the first suit may have been so light as not to make it worth his while to go to the expense of an appeal. Even if he has appealed in the first suit, that will not preclude him from renewing his appeal on the second. Or, in some cases, he may take the appeal to a superior court. Be this as it may, it is a right which ought not to be taken from him. But this is not all. Another and a very serious difficulty presents itself. Every fresh departure from the established ritual being, as I have pointed out, like the repetition of any other offence against the law, a distinct and substantive offence, other promoters may, with the concurrence of the bishop in whose diocese such second offence may have been committed, institute a distinct and separate suit in respect of it. Or, even the bishop in whose diocese the second offence has been committed may himself institute proceedings ex mero officio in respect of it in his own court. In the first place, I take it to be clear that the bishop, in transferring the suit in respect of the first offence to the Court of Arches, does not thereby divest himself of his jurisdiction over any other offence subsequently committed within his diocese, should he think proper to exercise it. Still less could the transfer of a suit by one bishop bind another, should a second offence be committed in a different diocese. Yet this summary jurisdiction, as here asserted, would reach the offender, so far at least as the authority of the Court of Arches extends, wherever the second offence might be committed, without affording him a ground of defence should a second suit be instituted against him in a diocesan court. This being so, how, consistently with the first principles of justice, can the defendant be made liable twice over, once for the fresh substantive offence, and again for contumacy in disobeying the monition not to repeat the offence in respect of which he had been originally condemned? In addition to the objections thus resting on general principles, technical difficulties present themselves of a no less serious character. In the first place, as I have already pointed out, a definitive sentence in a penal suit terminates the suit and exhausts the authority of the court. It is not competent therefore to a court pronouncing such a definitive sentence, in the absence of established practice or statutory power, to append to it, by means of a monition, an injunction to abstain in future from a repetition of the offence, so as to give itself summary jurisdiction over the offender in all time to come. In the second place, the letters of request, transferring only a specific charge, cannot, in my opinion, for the reasons I have already given, confer jurisdiction over an offence which has not as yet come into existence, or subject the party charged to the summary jurisdiction of the metropolitan court in respect of future offences not arising within the area of its authority. As regards the effect of a monition, the difficulty is equally great. If taken as a definitive sentence in a penal suit, unlike a monition issued in a civil suit to enjoin performance of the thing decreed to be done, so as to subject the party admonished to the consequences of contumacy if performance is withheld, it operates, as has been shown, as a punishment by way of censure, and entails no further consequences. If issued in the course of a suit, all the authorities agree that the contumacy could only be dealt with before the statute of George III. by excommunication and its consequences; since that statute, by the writ de contumacia capiendo. Even if the doctrine of contumacy upon a definitive sentence could be transferred from the civil to the penal jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, there is nothing that I can find to warrant the application of a more rigorous rule as to its consequences, or to make suspension, which it is admitted cannot be applied in a case of contumacy on a sentence in a civil proceeding enjoining a given thing to be done, applicable to a monition in a penal suit directing that a given thing shall not be done. The fact is, that monition, in the sense in which that term is used with reference to a definitive sentence in a civil suit, has no place as appended to a definitive sentence in a penal suit, and its introduction into the penal branch of ecclesiastical procedure has—I cannot help thinking, though I say it with the utmost deference—arisen from a want of attention to the essential difference which exists between these two branches of procedure. It is laid down, it is true, as a rule by the early canonists, as I have already mentioned, that monition should precede deprivation or suspension; no doubt for the purpose of preventing any too rigorous or arbitrary exercise of episcopal authority. But such a rule does not prevail in our ecclesiastical courts, as is plain from the fact that in this case no monition preceded the sentence of suspension pronounced by Sir Robert Phillimore; and though it is said that monition shall precede suspension, it is nowhere said that in a penal suit monition will suffice, without more, to found a sentence of suspension in respect of a second offence. It has indeed been suggested that contumacy in disobeying the lawful order of an ecclesiastical superior is in itself an offence, independently of any question of contempt. Conset seems to say so; but then he treats it as no longer the subject of summary jurisdiction, but as requiring formal proceedings; and he gives a form of articles applicable to such a suit: (Ecclesiastical Practice, part 2. ch. 2.) What would be the appropriate punishment is not said. Possibly, in such a case, suspension might be within the authority of the judge, or the case might come within the power to excommunicate the offender, kept alive by the 53 Geo. 3. and thus a punishment of six months' imprisonment might be imposed. But so far as relates to contumacy as matter of summary jurisdiction, the authorities are clear that the only penalty is that of imprisonment by the writ de contumacia capiendo under the statute of Geo. 3. Lastly, it is to be observed that, in the treatment of contumacy arising in the course of a suit, this statutory process was not designed for punishment, but for the overcoming of the contumacy; consequently as soon as the party contumacious submitted he was set free. It is therefore inapplicable to a case in which the contumacy, having arisen as to an accomplished fact, has become, so far as that fact is concerned, incurable. The result then at which I arrive, on the most careful consideration I can give to the subject, is—First, that a monition in a penal suit, while, if pronounced as a definitive sentence, it carries with it no ulterior consequences, cannot be appended to a definitive sentence awarding a specific punishment, so as to prolong and enlarge the jurisdiction of the court, and to warrant any further proceedings on a repetition of the offence as for contumacy; secondly, that even if a monition could be so pronounced, disobedience would entail no other punishment than is provided by the 53 Geo. 3. Consequently, that suspension is inapplicable to such a case. The only question which remains to be considered—and it is by no means the least important—is, whether the present case is one on which a prohibition should go. I quite agree that mere irregularity, or even mistake in point of law, though it may be sufficient to found an appeal, will not be sufficient to call for or warrant a prohibition. I agree with what was said by Lord Denman in Ex parte Smyth (3 A. & E. 724), namely, that “the only instances in which the temporal courts can interfere by way of prohibiting any particular proceeding in an ecclesiastical suit are those in which something is done contrary to the general law of the land, or manifestly out of the jurisdiction of the court.” But it seems to me that we have here much more than irregularity or mistake, and that something has been done which is manifestly beyond the jurisdiction. I take it to be too clear for argument that, although an inferior court may have jurisdiction over a given subject-matter when arising within the local limits of its own jurisdiction, if it takes upon itself to deal with such a matter when arising beyond such limits, it acts without authority, and may be restrained by prohibition. Such I apprehend to have been the case here. I have given my reasons for thinking that the jurisdiction of the Court of Arches was limited to the offence handed over to it by the diocesan court, and that consequently the Court of Arches had no authority to deal with a distinct and separate offence not comprehended in the letters of request, and arising beyond the local limits of its jurisdiction. Furthermore, I apprehend that if a court takes upon itself, without authority, to alter the course of its procedure, and to create a new offence, as was here done by superadding monition to a definitive sentence and converting a second and distinct act into the offence of contumacy instead of dealing with it as a substantive offence, there arises in this respect, also, an excess of authority which we are called upon to prohibit. Blackstone, in 3 Com. c. 7, speaking of the Writ of Prohibition, says that “it may be directed to the Courts Christian, where they concern themselves with any matter not within their jurisdiction; or if, in handling matters clearly within their cognisance, they transgress the bounds prescribed to them by the laws of England, as where they require two witnesses to prove the payment of a legacy, in such cases also a prohibition will be awarded.” On the authority of the law, as laid down by

Coleridge, J., in the case of Jones v. Jones (17 L. J. N. S. 170, Q. B.), Mr. Lloyd, in his treatise on the Law of Prohibition, states that prohibition will lie in cases where the judge of an inferior court transgresses the rules which ought to govern the proceedings of all courts, or is guilty of an irregularity which amounts to an excess of jurisdiction, though the case may otherwise be within his authority. In this view of the law I entirely concur, and I think it is applicable here. But the strongest ground remains to be stated. Treating the second offence of the defendant as an act of contumacy, the Court of Arches has applied to it a punishment which could not, according to the ecclesiastical law, in the view I take of it, be applied to a case of contumacy, by sentencing the defendant to suspension, instead of dealing with the case under the 53 Geo. 3. The effect of this proceeding is to deprive him of his freehold during the period over which the sentence of suspension extends. Now, I take it to be clear that, where the law which a court has to administer prescribes a given punishment as applicable to an offence, to vary that punishment, or substitute another, is an usurpation of jurisdiction. No one, I think, could say that if the Court of Arches had sentenced the defendant to a fine of a thousand pounds, and on nonpayment had sentenced him to be suspended for contumacy, such a sentence would not have been properly the subject of prohibition. But the only penalty which an ecclesiastical court can impose in a case which is properly one of contumacy is that of imprisonment under the statute of George 3rd. By applying to the alleged contumacy the penalty of suspension, the sentence, if executed, will deprive, and as I think, wrongfully deprive, the defendant of his freehold interest in his benefice; and although, where a sentence of deprivation or suspension can be properly pronounced by the Ecclesiastical Court, this court will not interfere, though the effect of such sentence will be indirectly to affect the interest in the freehold, yet where the sentence is not properly within the competency of such a court or applicable to the alleged offence, this court becomes bound to protect the temporal interest by prohibiting the execution of the sentence. The result is that, in my opinion, the monition of Sir Robert Phillimore, and a fortiori that issued by Lord Penzance, was ultra vires, and, consequently, that the subsequent proceedings before Lord Penzance, which terminated in the sentence of suspension for three years, were coram non iudice, and the sentence of suspension inoperative and null; and that, even if this were not so, the sentence of suspension, being inapplicable to an alleged case of contumacy, was one which the Court of Arches had no authority to pronounce. I am therefore of opinion that the rule for a prohibition must be made absolute. I may observe, in conclusion, that we have not called upon the applicant to declare in prohibition, as, in consequence of the court being divided in opinion, we might otherwise have done, because, the facts not being in dispute, the question is solely one of law, and as the parties, if advised to appeal, can under the Judicature Act go direct to the Appellate Court on an appeal against our order, it is better to leave them to do so, without the expense, incon-

A house-van, with ploughing gear attached, was left for some hours on some grass at the side of a road. A mare that was being driven along the road in a cart shied at the van, bolted and kicked, throwing the driver out of the cart, and kicking him on the knee so badly as to occasion erysipelas, of which he died. In an action by his executors, under Lord Campbell's Act, the jury found that the van was left where it stood unreasonably and negligently; that there was some appreciable danger in leaving it standing there, but not more so than if it had been in motion travelling along the road with horse power; that the death of the deceased was due to the van being where it was, and to the inherent vice of the mare that he was driving; and that there was no contributory negligence in the deceased.

Held, upon these findings, that there was an unlawful obstruction of the road, which caused the accident, and that, consequently, the owner of the van was liable.

This was an action tried before Denman, J., at the Oxford Spring Assizes 1878, and reserved by him for further consideration.

Our. adv. vult.

The evidence at the trial and the arguments of counsel sufficiently appear from the following judgment:

June 18.—DENMAN, J.—This was an action brought by the plaintiffs as executors of one James Harris, under Lord Campbell's Act. The defendant was the owner of a steam plough, which travelled about the country drawn by a steam engine, and which also had attached to it a house-van. The cause of action alleged in the statement of claim was that the defendant so wrongfully and negligently obstructed the highway by placing and leaving thereon a large house-van, with ploughing gear attached, that the deceased was hindered and prevented in his user of the highway, and his mare was frightened and rendered unmanageable, and his cart damaged, and he received serious injuries in the knee, of which he died. The defendant denied that he obstructed the highway, and that the injuries happened through any obstruction, or in consequence of the van being drawn up at the side of the highway, but alleged that the horse became unmanageable at a considerable distance from the house-van, and after the deceased had driven safely by the said van, and that the mare, which was vicious, kicked and upset the cart in which the deceased was driving. At the trial it appeared that the house-van in question was placed on some grass at the side of the metalled part of the line of road. It had been placed there early in the afternoon, and was still there when the accident happened between seven and eight p.m. on the 27th Sept., being engaged to work in an adjoining field on the following morning. The engine had been taken elsewhere, but the plough remained attached. The persons in charge of the van and plough had made no attempt to take them into the field, which they explained by stating that the ground was in a slippery state, not favourable for such an operation, and that from their experience they knew that it would have been impossible to get it in on that night. This view, however, did not satisfy the jury, as appears from the answers to the questions put. Several witnesses were called, who proved that on the same afternoon they had driven along the same road, and that their horses had shied and swerved considerably at the house-van, standing in the same spot, but no accident had happened in consequence. There was a strong body of evidence for the defendant, to show that the mare was a confirmed kicker, and some evidence to the effect that the deceased must have known of the habit. The finding of the jury, however, must, I think, be taken to absolve the deceased from any knowledge that the mare was a dangerous one to drive. The evidence for the defendant was also directed to an attempt to prove that the deceased was guilty of negligence in his treatment of the mare at the time she shied; but the finding of the jury disposes of this point. The house-van stood between four and five feet from the metalled part of the road. There was very little difference between the accounts given by the witnesses on both sides of the occurrence itself. The mare appears to have shied immediately opposite the van, away from the van towards the off side of the road, and to have swerved continually to the right until she got the off wheel on the footpath, and to have begun kicking while galloping on, so violently as to kick the dashboard to pieces, and finally to have got her leg over the shaft, when she fell, and the deceased rolled out of the cart, which was not itself upset, and he was kicked in the knee by the mare so badly that about seven weeks afterwards he died from erysipelas occasioned by the injury. The witnesses all agreed that the distance of the place where she fell from the van was about 140 yards. Such being the evidence so far as it was adopted by the jury, it was contended by Mr. Matthews, for the defendant, that the action would not lie on the following grounds: First, that though he admitted that the grass upon which the van and plough stood was a part of the highway, and though standing there it might constitute an obstruction so that, if a horseman or even the driver of a vehicle wishing to use that part of the highway had been obstructed and injured an action might lie, still in the present case no action would lie because there had been no obstruction, in fact, of the deceased, and no more danger caused by the van or plough than would have been occasioned by the same objects passing along the highway drawn by horse power as they lawfully might have been. It was also contended that the accident had happened wholly or in part by reason of inherent vice in the mare herself, and that it was not the necessary or natural result of being frightened that the mare should kick violently and destroy the vehicle it was drawing. The jury, in answer to questions put by me, found, that the van was left standing where it stood (1) unreasonably, and (2) negligently, "considering that no effort had been made to place it in the field." In answer to question (3), "was it dangerous to vehicles passing along the metalled part of the road?" they found "not more so than if the same van had been in motion travelling along the road with horse power." I requested them if possible to answer the question "aye" or "no," and after a second retirement to consider that question, they answered, "There was some appreciable danger in leaving it standing there. That is the only unanimous answer we can give." The fourth question put to the jury was as follows: "Was the death of the deceased occasioned by the van standing where it did? or was it a mere accident? or was it due to the negligence of the deceased in his management of the mare? or to inherent vice of the mare? or to any two or more of these causes, or to all combined?" The jury answered, "To all combined, except negligence of the deceased and mere accident." And, in answer to a further question, they said that they meant to find that it was due to the van being where it was, and to the inherent vice of the mare combined. Fifthly, they found that there was no contributory negligence in the deceased; and they assessed the damages at 250*l.*, one-third for the widow, and two-thirds for the children. I reserved the case for further consideration, and it was argued before me during the last sittings. The first point insisted upon was, that no action would lie for an obstruction of the highway, where the person alleged to be obstructed had been using a different part of the highway, viz., the metalled part of the road, and that there was no instance to be found in the books of an action for damage caused by an obstruction to a highway, where the obstruction consisted merely of some occupation of the ground likely to cause terror to horses passing along the highway. It is true that there is an absence of express authority upon this point; but I think that it follows from cases which have been decided, that if there be an act done upon any part of the highway which is not a part of the reasonable user of it, and which has the effect of endangering its use to others, and damage results from such act in the course of a lawful user of the highway, an action will lie for such damage. It has been held that the occupation of one side of a public street for several hours at a time, so as to prevent any carriage from passing on that side of the street, although room was left for two carriages to pass on the opposite side, is an indictable nuisance: (Bez v. Russell (6 East, 427); from which case, and from the case of Reg. v. Cross (3 Camp. 224), it appears that the real question in such cases is whether the highway has been obstructed for an unreasonable time and in an unreasonable manner, or, in other words, in such a way as to amount to something beyond a fair and reasonable use of the way. The jury in the present case have found that the van in question was unreasonably left where it was at the time of the accident, by which I understand that it was not a fair and reasonable use of that part of the highway with reference to the rights of others. They have also found that it was appreciably dangerous, by which I understand that it was in their opinion likely to cause horses to shy or take fright in passing along the metalled part of the road. This finding was qualified by the addition, "but not more so than if the same van had been in motion travelling along the road with horse power." On consideration, I do not think this supposed qualification material. In the first place, it leaves open the question whether, even if the van in question had been travelling along the high road drawn by horses with the plough attached, it might not, in the opinion of the jury, have been deemed to be a nuisance. I am not at all sure, indeed, that in that case, upon the same findings, it would not have been the duty of a judge to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs (see Watkins v. Beddin, 2 F. & F. 629, per Erle, C.J., p. 634); but at all events, I think it clear that the question whether it would or would not have been a nuisance in that case is a totally different question from that which arises in the present case, for it might be quite reasonable to convey such machines along the road from point to point, and yet wholly unreasonable to increase the danger caused by them by leaving them all day and night on the high road or closely adjoining to it. I cannot agree with the view submitted by the defendant's counsel, that there must be an injury caused by an actual physical obstruction before an action will lie. Suppose a man were to occupy the grassy side of a highway with three or four cannon and to keep firing them from morning to night, so as to terrify the horses passing along the metalled part of the road, I cannot doubt that he would be liable for the consequences, and that he would have wrongfully hindered and prevented in the user of the highway anyone whose horse might have been frightened by such conduct. I do not think that it could in such a case be said that the right of passage had not been obstructed, or at least hindered and prevented, merely because the horse in question had not come into actual collision with the cannons, or merely because the cannons were not on that part of the highway along which the horse was travelling. It appears to me to follow, from the above considerations, that the plaintiffs are entitled to the verdict and to judgment, so far as the above point is concerned, on the ground that the jury have, in effect, found that there was an unreasonable and dangerous occupation of a part of the highway amounting to an obstruction and prevention of its free user by the public to an extent which was unreasonable. The jury also found that there was negligence in placing and leaving the van and plough where they were, on the ground that there was no attempt to place it in the field. I am not quite sure whether the jury intended to find negligence with reference to the probable danger of leaving the van where it was, owing to the fact that they were unwilling to return any verdict expressly in favour of plaintiff or defendant, and they afterwards qualified their finding as to danger by the word "appreciable," as I surmise, from an inability to agree upon the question of negligence with reference to anything except making no attempt to get the van and plough into the field. I should therefore not feel myself justified in entering the verdict for the plaintiff upon the finding of negligence alone; and I abstain from further dealing with that part of the case. I now come to that part of the case which has appeared to me to be the most difficult. It was, I think, clearly made out at the trial that the mare which the deceased was driving was a vicious mare, in the sense that she was a kicker. It must, however, be taken that the jury negatived any knowledge in the deceased of this habit, such as would have rendered it negligent in him to drive the mare. Contributory negligence on any other ground was negatived. The immediate cause of the accident was clearly that the mare in kicking got her leg over the shaft, which caused her to fall, and in falling the deceased received the kick which ultimately caused his death. The jury found that the accident was due to the van being there (which must be taken to mean "to the van being unreasonably left on that part of the highway so as to cause some danger to vehicles passing by") combined with the vice of the mare. I understood this finding to mean that the accident would not have happened but for both these causes combined—an unreasonable and dangerous user by the defendants of that part of the road by their van and plough so as to cause danger to vehicles passing by; and an exceptionally dangerous animal shying and running away from fright at the van and plough, and then kicking the vehicle, whether from fright or vice, the kicking being an exceptional vice in the mare. This finding must also, if possible, be reconciled with the other finding that the accident was not a mere accident, which was explained to the jury as meaning one for which no one was to be fairly considered to blame. The plaintiffs' counsel argued that, inasmuch as the defendant was guilty of an unauthorised and dangerous act in derogation of the public rights by which the mare had been frightened, this must be taken to be the only material cause of the mischief, the deceased being guilty of no wrong at all, and the whole transaction being one flowing directly from the alarm caused by the defendant's unauthorised act. On the other hand, it was contended that the causa proxima of the injury was the kicking of the mare, which was not a necessary or natural consequence either of the shying or of the running away, so that, although it might be true that in some sense the van and plough being there led to the accident, it was not true that their being there was material to the accident, or caused it, in such a sense as to make the defendant responsible for it. Though not without considerable hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to have the verdict and judgment entered for them. Looking at the undisputed facts in the case, I think it is clear that, though the immediate cause of the accident was the kicking of the mare, still the unauthorised and dangerous appearance of the van and plough on the side of the highway was, within the meaning of the law, the proximate cause of the accident. It cannot, I think, be laid down that no one is entitled to recover damages for an injury caused by a kicking horse, in the absence of any knowledge on his part that it is such. In the present case it must be taken that the deceased was not aware that the horse was a kicker. Then, was the kicking which caused the death a natural and necessary consequence of the act complained of? I think, upon the whole, that it was. The van was there, and it in fact frightened the deceased's mare, so that she shied and swerved to run away, and, having got one wheel on the footpath kicked violently, and within 150 yards fell and injured the deceased so that he died. The whole transaction is within a few seconds, and originated in the fright of the mare caused by the van. I think it cannot be laid down as having been the duty of the deceased to abstain from driving the mare. On the other hand, it cannot be laid down as the right of the defendant to assume that no nervous or run-away or kicking horse would come along the highway. It is only in the case of horses liable to be frightened that any danger exists, and where a horse has once been frightened by a dangerous apparition unlawfully placed on the highway, running away and kicking can hardly be considered to be unusual or unnatural consequences of the fright. The wrong doer has no right to lay down the measure of his own wrong, or to limit the free use of the highway to horses which shall only shy when frightened and do no further mischief. On the whole, I think that the finding of the jury only amounts to this, that the accident was caused by the van, but that if the horse had not been a kicker it would not have happened. Looking at the finding and the facts together, I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to the verdict; I therefore direct it to be entered for them for the amount assessed by the jury, and give judgment for that amount, with costs.

Election of town councillor—Nomination of candidate—Burgess roll—Jurisdiction of court to review decision of mayor—Municipal Elections Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 40) sect. 1 sub-sect. 2—Corrupt practices (Municipal Elections) Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60) s. 12.

The burgess roll, on which the name of a person nominated at a municipal election for the office of councillor must appear, is the burgess roll in force for the purposes of the election on the day of election, and not necessarily the burgess roll in force on the day of nomination.

The court has jurisdiction, on a petition questioning the election, to review the decision of the mayor, allowing an objection to a candidate on the ground that his name was not on such earlier burgess roll.

W. was a candidate for the office of town councillor in the borough of P. The nomination took place on the 23rd Oct. 1877, and the election on 1st Nov. 1877. The name of W. appeared on the burgess roll published on the 22nd Oct. 1877, and in force from Nov. 1, 1877, to Oct. 31, 1878; but not on the burgess roll published on the 22nd Oct. 1876, and in force from Nov. 1, 1876, to

Oct. 31, 1877. The mayor allowed an objection upon this ground to the nomination paper of W. Held, that the nomination of W. was good, and that the court had jurisdiction to review the decision of the mayor upon petition.

SPECIAL case stated by order of Field, J. for the opinion of the court on a municipal election petition against the return of three of the respondents as town councillors for the borough of Poole. [Certain paragraphs irrelevant to the judgment are omitted.]

1. The petitioner is a person who was a candidate at the said election of councillors.

2. The election of councillors was holden on the 1st Nov. 1877. James Andrews, Titus Buckley, and Henry Thomas Trevanion were candidates, and were declared to be duly elected.

24. On the 22nd Oct. 1877 the burgess roll and ward lists of the said borough and ward were duly published.

25. On the 23rd Oct. 1877 six candidates were nominated in writing for the south-east ward. The names of the six candidates were and are as follows: James Andrews, Titus Buckley, Henry Thomas Trevanion, Henry Farmer, Philip Edward Lionel Budge (the petitioner), and George Frederick Wanhill. All the candidates were nominated in writing, and by separate nomination papers.

26. Among the burgesses subscribing the nomination papers of the said James Andrews, Titus Buckley, and Henry Thomas Trevanion, was the said Alfred Balston, who at the time of signing the said nomination papers was an enrolled burgess of such borough, and who at the time of the election in question was holding, as hereinbefore appears, the office of mayor in the said borough.

27. Copies of the nomination papers hereinbefore mentioned, marked B., C., and D., are appended to this case in the said schedule.

28. The said Henry Farmer and Philip Edward Lionel Budge were persons enrolled on the burgess roll and south-east ward list of the said borough and ward, and were in all other respects qualified to be elected councillors. The said George Frederick Wanhill was not enrolled on the burgess roll and ward list published on the 22nd Oct. 1876, but he was enrolled as "George F. Wanhill" on the burgess roll for the said borough published on the 22nd Oct. 1877, and was in all other respects qualified to be elected a councillor.

29. The said George Frederick Wanhill, though in all respects so entitled, was, by an omission of the overseer of the poor of the tything of Longfleet, in the said borough of Poole, not enrolled in the burgess roll published on the 22nd Oct. 1876.

30. No application has been made by the said George Frederick Wanhill, under the provisions of sect. 24 of the 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, to have his name inserted on such burgess roll.

31. On the 24th Oct. 1877 the mayor attended alone, without any alderman or assessor, at the town-hall, to decide on the validity of certain objections made to the nomination papers of all the candidates.

33. An objection was made by the said Henry Thomas Trevanion, under the Municipal Elections Act 1875, sect. 1, sub-sect. 3, to the nomination paper of the said George Frederick Wanhill, on the ground that the name of the said George Frederick Wanhill was not on the burgess roll published on the 22nd Oct. 1876 (copy of objection, schedule F.)

34. The mayor by a decision in writing allowed such objection.

35. A poll was held in the said ward on the 1st Nov. 1877, the result of which was as follows:—James Andrews, 476 votes; Titus Buckley, 458 votes; Henry Thomas Trevanion, 452 votes; Henry Farmer, 452 votes; Philip Edward Lionel Budge, 447 votes. There being only three vacancies in the body of councillors, the said Francis Timewell Rogers, who presided at the said election, gave a casting vote in favour of the said Henry Thomas Trevanion.

36. On the 1st Nov. 1877, the said Francis T. Rogers declared the said James Andrews, Titus Buckley, and Henry Thomas Trevanion duly elected, and published a list of their names as and for a list of the names of the persons so elected.

The questions for the opinion of the court, who are to pronounce judgment in such form as they shall see fit, with or without costs, as they shall see fit (subject, however, to the respondent's objections in respect of questions 3 and 4, as hereinafter appears), are:

1. Whether the said James Andrews, Titus Buckley, and Henry Thomas Trevanion were, or any of them was, duly elected to the office of councillor.

2. Whether, if they or one of them were not duly elected, their or his election is void.

3. Whether the nominations of the said James Andrews, Titus Buckley, and Henry Thomas Trevanion were illegal and void or not.

4. Whether the decision of the mayor allowing the objection to the nomination paper of the said George Frederick Wanhill was wrong or not.

5. Whether the petitioner is entitled to any and what relief.

The respondents object to questions 3 and 4 being determined by the court, on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain or determine the same.

Schedule "F." (Copy of Objection).

Borough of Poole.

Election of Councillors for the South-east Ward in the said borough, to be held on the 1st day of November 1877.

I, Henry Thomas Trevanion, of New-street, in the borough of Poole, solicitor, being a candidate duly nominated for the above election, do hereby object to the validity of the nomination paper of George F. Wanhill, a person nominated for the same election, on the ground that he is not enrolled on the burgess roll of the said borough, nor a person whose name is inserted in the separate list at the end of the burgess roll as provided by sect. 3 of the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55, and that he is not otherwise qualified to be elected.

Signed, &c.

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.) (with him Grantham, Q.C., and C. Bowen), for the petitioner.—Mr. Wanhill was on the burgess roll, and the objection to his nomination was therefore void. By sect. 22 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, the burgess roll is the roll of burgesses entitled to vote at any election which may take place in the borough between the 1st Nov. inclusive in the year wherein such burgess roll shall have been made, and the 1st Nov. in the succeeding year. By sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, every person nominated shall be enrolled on the burgess list of the borough, or a person whose name is inserted in the separate list at the end of the burgess roll, as provided by sect. 5 of the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55. Wanhill's name, therefore, was only required by statute to be on the roll in force on that 1st day of November (1877) on which the election took place, and its omission from the burgess roll of the preceding year was unimportant. The objection having been wrongly allowed by the mayor, the election was null and void.

Pollard (Benjamin, Q.C. with him), for the respondents, was directed by the court to confine his arguments in the first place to the fourth question. (The arguments for the petitioners on the other points have, therefore, been omitted.) First, this court has no jurisdiction to question this election on the ground that the mayor's decision was wrong. The proper remedy is by quo warranto in the Queen's Bench Division. Sect. 12 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 60 provides that a municipal election may be questioned by petition before this court on the ground that the election was wholly avoided by general bribery, treating, undue influence or personation, or on the ground that the election of the person elected was avoided by corrupt practices or offences against the Act committed at the election, or on the ground that he was at the time of the election disqualified for election to the office for which the election was held, or that he was not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes. That section defines the grounds on which a petition questioning the election may be brought in this court. By 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, sect. 1, sub-sect. 3, the decision of the mayor if disallowing any objection to a nomination paper is final, but, if allowing the same, shall be subject to reversal "on petition questioning the election or return." But by the interpretation clause of the previous Act (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33, s. 20, sub-sect. 2), the term "petition questioning the election or return" shall mean any proceeding under which a municipal election can be questioned; and therefore the provision in 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, sect. 1, sub-sect. 3, for reviewing the mayor's decision, must be taken as applying to a quo warranto, which is a proceeding questioning the election, and not to a petition in this court, which it is clear from sect. 12 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 60 does not lie on such a ground. The provision referred to was never intended to give a remedy which is expressly excluded by a previous Act, but merely to indicate that the mayor's decision shall be subject to review by the proper legal proceeding applicable to such a case. [GROVE, J.—The ground of this petition appears to be within sect. 12 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 60. If the mayor had not allowed the objection, another candidate could have gone to the poll, and the number of votes given for each of the present candidates would have been altered. This petition, therefore, comes within the words of sect. 12, "on the ground that the candidate was not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes."] Secondly, the decision of the mayor, allowing the objection, was right. Wanhill was not upon the burgess roll at the time when he was nominated, though he was upon the burgess roll which came in force on the day of election. By 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 6, at any election of councillors to be held for any borough or ward, any person entitled to vote may nominate himself (if duly qualified) or any other person or persons so qualified. The person nominating must therefore be entitled to vote at the time of his nomination. By 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 29, the persons "entitled to vote" shall be every burgess of the borough who shall be enrolled on the burgess roll for the time being. Sect. 10 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 60 makes the register conclusive as to the right of any person included therein to vote at an election for the purposes whereof such register is in force. It is therefore also conclusive as to the absence of the right of any person not included therein; and by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 5, "a person shall not be entitled to vote unless his name is on the burgess roll for the time being." Wanhill, therefore, not being on the burgess roll in force for the purposes of any election which might take place at the time of his nomination, and not being entitled to vote at such time, was improperly nominated: (Reg. v. Harvey 3 Q. B. 475.) The effect of 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 6, and 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 29, read together, is that a person nominated must be on the burgess roll in force at the time of his nomination, and also qualified to be on the burgess roll in force at the time of the election: (Reg. v. Dixon, 15 Q. B. 33; Whalley v. Bramwell, 15 Q. B. 775.) Lastly, if the case is decided upon the fourth question, the respondent Rogers, who was not a candidate, and is not affected by it, ought not to be made to pay costs.

GROVE, J. delivered the judgment of the court.—This case is the petition of Philip Edward Lionel Budge against James Andrews, Titus Buckley, Henry Thomas Trevanion, and Francis Timewell Rogers, the latter being the returning officer for one of the wards of the borough of Poole. The petition is in respect of an election of town councillors, which took place on the 1st Nov. 1877 in that borough, and the three candidates who were elected on that occasion were James Andrews, Titus Buckley, and Henry Thomas Trevanion, who have three of the respondents in this petition. By the special case which has been argued, several objections were taken to the validity of the election. One of these objections appeared during the argument of the Solicitor-General to be of great force, and, as it went to the whole question of whether the election was valid or void, we requested Mr. Pollard to address himself, in the first instance, to that objection. This objection, which, notwithstanding the able argument of Mr. Pollard, we think fatal to the election, is the one contained in the fourth question put for our decision: "Whether the decision of the Mayor allowing the objection to the nomination paper of the said George Frederick Wanhill was wrong or not?" Added to this was the further objection: "The respondents object to questions 3 and 4 being determined by the court on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain or determine the same." Perhaps it might, prima facie, appear to be more in order to take the question of jurisdiction first, as, before deciding on the other question, it might be well to give the reasons why we are convinced that we have jurisdiction. Looking, however, at many of the facts which it would be necessary to cite for that purpose, it has appeared more convenient to take the objection itself first, and afterwards to make such reference as may be necessary to the question of jurisdiction. The facts with regard to George Frederick Wanhill were stated in the case as follows: "On the 23rd Oct. 1877 six candidates were nominated in writing for the south-east ward." Here follow the names of the candidates, amongst them being that of George Frederick Wanhill. The paragraph proceeds, "All the candidates were nominated in writing, and by separate nomination papers." Paragraph 29, and this was an important statement, says as follows: "The said George Frederick Wanhill was not enrolled on the burgess roll and ward list published on the 22nd Oct. 1876, but he was enrolled as 'George F. Wanhill' in the burgess roll for the said borough published on the 22nd Oct. 1877, and was in all respects qualified to be elected as a councillor." Nothing turned upon his being styled "George F. Wanhill;" this was not insisted upon by the Solicitor-General. Paragraph 29 states: "The said George Frederick Wanhill, though in all respects so entitled, was by an omission of the overseer of the poor of the tything of Longfleet, in the said borough of Poole, not enrolled in the burgess roll published on the 22nd Oct. 1876." The question turned on this fact. Wanhill being nominated as a candidate for the election to take place on the 1st Nov. 1877, was it necessary, in order to make his nomination a valid one, that he should be upon the burgess roll made on the 22nd Oct. 1876, or upon the burgess roll made on the 22nd Oct. 1877, or on both? or, to put it as Mr. Pollard had put it, should he be on the burgess roll of the 22nd Oct. 1876, and be entitled to be on the burgess list which became the burgess roll on the 22nd Oct. 1877, and which would be the list or roll upon which the election of the 1st Nov. would proceed? It was argued by the respondents that it was necessary that he should be upon the roll published on the 22nd Oct. 1876, and should also be entitled to be upon the subsequent burgess roll, which would be made out upon the 22nd Oct. 1877, although it was said to be immaterial whether he was actually on the list, provided he was entitled to be upon it. On the other hand it was contended for the petitioners that he was rightly nominated, being not only entitled to be, but being enrolled upon the burgess roll published on the 22nd Oct. 1877, and therefore that the mayor who allowed the objection to the nomination paper was wrong in allowing it, or, to use a converse expression, in disallowing his candidature. We are of opinion that the mayor was wrong, and that Wanhill was entitled to be nominated and elected, if the electors thought fit to vote for him so as to give him a majority entitling him to be elected, he being on the burgess roll published on the 22nd Oct. 1877. I do not intend to go into all the sections of the statute that have been mentioned, but, in order to reduce what I have to say to a moderate compass, I shall only mention those particularly applying to the case before them. The first I shall cite is the 22nd section of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, which enacted as follows:—"That the burgess list so revised and signed as last aforesaid shall be delivered by the mayor to the town clerk of such borough, who shall keep the same and shall cause the said burgess list to be fairly and truly copied into one general alphabetical list in a book to be by him provided for that purpose, with every name therein numbered, beginning the numbers from the first name and continuing them in a regular series until the last name, and shall cause such books to be completed on or before the 22nd Oct. in every year, and shall deliver such books, together with the list, at the expiration of his office to the person succeeding him in such office; and such book in which the said burgess lists shall have been copied shall be the burgess roll of the burgesses of such borough entitled to vote, after the passing of this Act, in the choice of councillors, assessors, and auditors in such borough, as hereinafter mentioned, at any election which may take place in such borough between the 1st Nov., inclusive, in the year wherein such burgess roll shall have been made, and the 1st Nov. in the succeeding year." The election took place on the 1st Nov., and it was admitted that the burgess roll which was completed by the 22nd Oct. preceding was the one upon which the election was to take place. But it was said that we must view the section in a different way with regard to the nomination of candidates, and that the nomination, both as regarded the nominator and the nominee, must be made upon the previous roll, which was not the one upon which the election would take place. No doubt, if this is so, many inconvenient consequences would follow. First of all, if the nominator must necessarily be upon the old roll and need not be upon the new, the person nominating might be a person who would not be a voter at the election for which he had nominated. This would be an inconvenience, but it would not be fatal, if the words of this and other Acts made it clear that it was right. But it would not be a thing contemplated by the Legislature that a man whose time for being a voter should expire before the election for which he had nominated a candidate should be the one selected by the Act to nominate candidates, without the necessity of his being a voter at the election. It is perhaps unnecessary to decide this, because what we have to decide here is upon which roll the person nominated, not the nominator, should be. It does appear to me, however, that with regard to the nominator the proper construction of the statute is more favourable to the view that he must be upon the new roll taking effect for the purposes of the election, on the 1st Nov. 1877. The next section which applies to this case is 7 Will. 4, and 1 Vict. c. 78, s. 6, which says: "Be it enacted that in every borough, in which, by reason of any neglect or informality, a new burgess roll of the said borough shall not have been duly made in any year within the time directed by the Act, the burgess roll which was in force before the time appointed for the revision shall continue in force until such new burgess roll shall have been duly made." Then comes section 6 of the Act 22 Vict. c. 35, which enacted as follows: "At any election of councillors to be held for any borough or ward, any person entitled to vote may nominate for the office of councillor himself (if duly qualified) or any other person or persons so qualified (not exceeding the number of persons to be elected for the borough or ward as the case may be), and every such nomination shall be in writing, and shall state the Christian names and surnames of the persons nominated, with their respective places of abode and descriptions, and shall be signed by the party nominating, and sent to the town clerk at least two whole days (Sunday excluded) before the day of election, and the town clerk shall at least one whole day (Sunday excluded), before the said day of election, cause the Christian names and surnames of the persons so nominated, with such statement of their respective places of abode, and descriptions, and with the names of the persons nominating them respectively, to be printed and placed on the door of the town hall, and in some such conspicuous parts of the borough or ward for which such election is to be held." According to the argument of the respondents we must read thus: "At any election of councillors to be held, say on the 1st Nov. 1877, any person entitled to vote, not on the 1st Nov. 1877, but on the 1st Nov. 1876, and up to the 1st Nov. 1877, may nominate a person to be elected on the 1st Nov. 1877." Without some such words as those incorporated, the prima facie reasonable meaning of the statute was that the words, "any person entitled to vote," must mean at some election the period for which has not gone by. In order to give it a different construction it must mean that he must be entitled to vote, not at the general and usual election, because that has passed—the 1st Nov. 1876—but it must mean that he was entitled to vote at any bye or casual election of councillors which may accidentally become necessary before the 1st Nov. 1877. It seems to me that would be a very strained construction, and would not occur to any one in reading the section. With a contrary construction I see nothing difficult or impracticable, because although the time of the election and the time of the lists coming into force did not arrive until the 1st Nov., yet for many other purposes the burgess list was in existence. It must be duly copied and completed by the 23rd Oct. At that time it was known which would be on the burgess roll for 1877, and I see nothing against the words of the statute being read as I have stated. As to the question of convenience, that, to my mind, is in favour of the contention of the petitioners, that a roll which was completed on the 22nd Oct.—although it did not for the purposes of election come into effect till the 1st Nov.—should be in effect for enabling persons to know who would be qualified candidates, who would be qualified voters, and who would be qualified nominators for the election to take place on the 1st Nov., when the list was to come into force. If I decided on this point, I should think this was the proper reading of the statute. But we have not only to decide it on that point. There was the point whether the name of a person nominated must appear on the roll published on Oct. 22, 1876, or on the one published on Oct. 22, 1877. With regard to this, again, looking at the reason of the thing, it seems to me that many difficulties would arise, assuming that the language of the Act and its different sections is prima facie opposed to what we are now deciding. The inconvenience and curious results of it would be many. First of all, the person nominated would have to be either upon two rolls or to have his election qualification continued for two years, and such person alone could be a proper person to be nominated, because, by the argument of the respondents, he must be, for the purposes of being nominated, on the roll from the 1st Nov. 1876, and for the purpose of being elected he must be a person at all events qualified to be on the burgess list for the 1st Nov. 1877. There must, therefore, be virtually a two years' qualification, and no portion of the Act has been called to our attention to show that this was contemplated by the statute. Then, again, according to this view, the person nominating might be one whose qualification might cease before the time of the election. It seems to me that we should require some very strong words before we could adopt such a supposition as this, which seems to be negatived by some other parts of the Act, particularly by the words of the 38th and 39th Vict. c. 40, sect. 5. But before going to sect. 5, perhaps I ought to call attention to sect. 1 and sub-sect. 2 of the same Act, which says: "Every person nominated shall be enrolled on the burgess roll of the borough or a person whose name is inserted in the separate list at the end of the burgess roll, as provided by sect. 5 of the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55, and shall be otherwise qualified to be elected." This was read by the respondents as meaning that every person nominated should be enrolled on the burgess roll of the borough, not the burgess list upon which the election shall take place on the 1st Nov. 1877, but on the burgess roll upon which the election of the 1st Nov. 1876, took place. I think it would be a somewhat forced construction to read the section in this way. But when we come to sect. 5, it appears that the language used is much stronger in favour of the construction we are adopting. That section says: "That at any municipal election a person shall not be entitled to sign or subscribe any nomination paper or to vote unless his name is on the burgess roll for the time being in force in the borough." It was admitted that a person was not entitled to vote unless his name was on the later roll, or what I have called the new roll, and that the roll for the purpose of voting for the time being in force was the one which was to be used for the election of the 1st Nov. 1877. In order to construe this in favour of the respondent, it was said that we are to read the word "or" as disjunctive: "and he shall not be entitled to sign any nomination paper or to vote;" that he was not to sign any nomination paper unless he was on the previous roll, or to vote unless he was on the subsequent. It would be a strange thing for the Legislature to couple these two things together and treat as different these two qualifications and incidents—the subscribing to a nomination paper and voting at an election. It seems to me to require a great many added words to arrive at such a construction as was sought to be put upon the section by the respondents. But it requires no forced or strained manner to read it as though no person was entitled to sign a nomination paper, or to vote unless he was on one roll. And if on one roll, which was this? On the burgess roll for the time being in force. The burgess roll in force for both objects mentioned could not be that published on the 22nd Oct. 1876, as this one could not apply to the voting on the 1st Nov. 1877. Therefore, if there was only one roll contemplated, it must be the one which came into force for election purposes on the 1st Nov. 1877. But the section goes on further to demonstrate this, as it says, "And every person whose name is on such burgess roll or ward list, as the case may be, shall be entitled to sign or subscribe any nomination paper and to demand and receive a ballot paper and to vote." What could the words "in such burgess roll" mean? If the burgess roll was different for the person nominated or nominating and the person voting, how could such person be entitled "to sign a nomination paper, to demand and receive a ballot paper, and to vote?" Does not this demonstrate that the nomination and voting were both done with respect to the same roll? Without straining the section extravagantly, I cannot put any other construction on it than that it meant there was one Burgess roll and one only. And if the words apply to the same roll it appears to me conclusive that they mean the roll coming into effect for election purposes—in this case—on the 1st Nov. 1877. It is contended that this conclusion is repugnant to the decision in Reg. v. Harvey (ubi sup.); but it does not appear to me that we are at all departing from that decision. In giving judgment in that case Lord Denman used words which were not inconsistent with this case, but which would probably have been more explicit than they were if the case now under consideration had been in the minds of the court. But this could not have been so, as nomination papers had not at that time come into existence; therefore the court, not having contemplated the particular questions which they were now deciding, did not use words to contradict such a case as that now under consideration from the one then before them. I now come to the other point, on the question whether the court has jurisdiction to entertain this matter, and whether it comes within the powers vested in it by the Act of Parliament to decide whether this election was valid or void, as the case might be. The first section which was cited as applying to this point was sect. 12 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 60: "The election of any person at the election for the borough or ward may be questioned by a petition before an election court, constituted as hereinafter in this Act provided, and hereinafter in this Act referred to as the court, on the ground that the election was, as to the borough or ward, wholly void by general bribery, treating, undue influence, or personation, or on the ground that the election of such person was avoided by corrupt practices or offences against this Act committed at the election, or on the ground that he was at the time of the election disqualified for election to the office for which the election was held, or on the ground that he was not elected by a majority of lawful votes." It was contended upon that section that we have no powers to decide this case, because it was said that neither of the contingencies enumerated in that section had occurred. I cannot agree with this contention. I think the section does apply; and, in holding the respondents disqualified, we are doing so on the ground that they were not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes, because the voting might have been entirely different, had Wanhill's nomination not been disallowed. If we were not to read the section in this way, our jurisdiction would be very limited indeed, because none of those inquiries that shake elections by showing that some wrong has been done, which diverts, or might divert the course of voting, would be within the jurisdiction. But even if this section is not regarded as sufficient to found our jurisdiction here, there is another statute, which, whether it be read as explanatory and confirmatory of the former enactment, or as adding something to it, seems quite explicit and clear on this point. By 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, sect. 1, sub-sect. 3, the decision of the mayor, which shall be given in writing, shall, if disallowing any objection to a nomination paper, be final; but if allowing the same shall be subject to reversal on petition questioning the election or return. Nothing can be clearer than this. This is a petition questioning an election or return, and the mayor has allowed an objection to a nomination paper, which is one of the very things said by this statute to be subject to reversal on petition questioning the election or return. But it was argued that in the previous Act (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33, s. 20, sub-sect. 2) there was an interpretation clause, giving to these words a different effect from what is their obvious, clear, and direct meaning. It said: "The term petition questioning the election or return shall mean any proceeding under which a municipal election can be questioned." As I understand this, it means that the term petition applies not only to what were ordinary petitions against an election, but to every proceeding, such as a quo warranto and others, and therefore that it had a larger meaning than an ordinary petition. But if so, it does not negative or limit the words in the subsequent section, but enlarges them. Nor do I see how it can affect the interpretation of the words of the 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40. I am not aware of any case in which an interpretation clause of a previous Act has been given such an application. From every point of view, it appears clear that the Legislature intended the court to have jurisdiction in such a case as this; and I am also of opinion that the objection raised by the petitioner is a valid one, and that the election is therefore void. If the nomination of Wanhill had been allowed, the whole election might have been different. Two of the candidates had an equality of votes, and it is impossible for the court to say what might have been the consequence of another person being a candidate. Votes might have drifted away from some of the candidates, and a very different result might have taken place had Mr. Wanhill's qualification not been disallowed. With regard to the question of costs, it has been contended that certain objections having been made to Mr. Rogers, the returning officer, if we decided on a point that does not apply individually or peculiarly to him he should be allowed his costs, and so should stand on a different ground from the other respondents. I cannot say that if the special case had been so framed as to separate and, so to speak, to make different cases, one case dealing with Rogers and another with the other respondents, that might not have been a proper argument, and one upon which the court could act. But here the respondents have all acted together; they were bracketed together, and they each joined, apparently, in all the reasons put forward for the validity of the election. They are throughout the case termed "the respondents;" there were questions submitted for the opinion of the court subject to "the respondents' objections," &c. Rogers himself objected to the jurisdiction of the court on the ground stated in the case; he joined for his own purposes in the objections raised, thus taking advantage of the arguments used on behalf of the other three respondents. I therefore see no reason why he should be distinguished, and am of opinion that the election should be declared void, and that the respondents must pay costs.

LINDLEY, J.—I quite agree with the judgment that has been pronounced, and wish only to add a few words. Upon the question of jurisdiction I will say nothing, as the Act of Parliament is abundantly plain. With respect to the main question, whether this election is void or not, I think the key of all the statutes is to be found by examining 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76. From that Act it will be seen that there have always been two burgess rolls existing between the 22nd Oct. and the 1st Nov., one of which regulates elections taking place before the 1st Nov., and the other elections taking place on and after that day. When we come to the Act (22 Vict. c. 35, s. 6), it appears plain that the words "entitled to vote" refer to the election for which candidates are to be nominated, as a necessary sequel of the words used. It also appears that the words "burgess roll for the time being in force" means the roll upon which the election is to take place. It is contrary to the Act that the old roll should to any extent regulate the proceedings.

Corporation—"Person," meaning of word—Penalties, action for—Common informer.

A corporation cannot, except where expressly authorised by statute, sue for penalties as a common informer.

By a private Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. lxxvi. s. 45) a penalty was imposed upon all sellers of coal who knowingly sold one sort of coal for another, within twenty-five miles from the General Post Office; and sect. 85 made this penalty recoverable by the person or persons who should inform and sue for the same.

Held, that the plaintiffs, a board of guardians, incorporated, could not sue for the same.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract to sell and deliver to the plaintiffs certain coal of a specified quality and description, and further, suing in the form qui tam, for 1780*l.*, half of certain statutory penalties incurred by knowingly selling certain coals for and as a sort which they really were not, within the distance of twenty-five miles of the General Post Office.

Demurrer to the last part of the claim, on the ground that the plaintiffs, being a corporation, were not entitled to sue for penalties as a common informer, and were not specially entitled to sue by the Act which imposed the penalty.

By 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. lxxvi. s. 45, it is enacted that, if any seller or dealer in coals shall knowingly sell one sort of coal as and for a sort which they really are not, within the distance of twenty-five miles from the General Post Office, every such seller or dealer shall forfeit and pay for every such offence 10*l.* per ton for every ton of coals so sold.

By sect. 85 of the same Act, the penalties imposed by the Act, when exceeding 25*l.*, were made recoverable by action in any of the courts of record at Westminster, "by the person or persons who shall inform and sue for the same within three calendar months after the offence or offences shall have been committed;" one moiety of such penalties to go to the Crown, the other "to and for the use of the person or persons who shall inform or sue for the same."

Raymond in support of the demurrer.—A corporation cannot sue as a common informer. In a marginal note to The Weavers' Company v. Forrest (2 St. 1241), cited in Chitty's Arch. Practice, 12th edit. p. 1145, it is said by the reporter: "It was held in the C. B. (where other like actions were brought) that the words of 7 Geo. 2—the statute imposing the penalty in that case—being 'any person or persons,' a corporation could not sue as a common informer." The word 'person' or 'persons' does not include corporations, as appears from the numerous Acts of Parliament in which the interpretation clause provides that it shall include them. With regard to actions brought by the Apothecaries' Company, the master and wardens are expressly authorised to sue by sect. 26 of the Apothecaries Act (55 Geo. 3, c. 194). And an ecclesiastical corporation has been held not to be within the words "person or persons" in the Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36), s. 1. He also cited

Walker v. Richardson, 2 M. & W. 882.

J. V. Austin for the plaintiffs.—The tendency of modern legislation has been to make the word "person" include corporations (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, 1 Will. 4, c. 66, s. 28); though in Harrison's case (2 East P. C. 988; 1 Leach, 180) the word "person" was held not to include corporation in a statute relating to forgery. Walker v. Richardson (ubi sup.) is not applicable, inasmuch as the Mortmain Act, on which it was decided, is shown by its preamble to be directed to conveyances by natural persons only. He also referred to

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is, I believe, a case of the first impression, though not wanting authority which bears indirectly on the question involved. The plaintiffs are a corporation, and that part of the statement of claim which is demurred to claims penalties for the breach of a statutory duty imposed by the statute 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. lxxvi. The penalties sued for largely exceed the sum of 25*l.*, and it is provided by sect. 65 of the statute that penalties, when in excess of that sum, may be sued for and recovered by the person or persons who shall inform and sue for the same. The question therefore is whether the plaintiffs are within the words "person or persons;" that is, whether a corporation can sue as a common informer. The word "person" may, no doubt, in many cases, be taken as including a corporation. It is necessary, however, to construe this Act secundum subjectam materiam, and to consider whether it would be reasonable to hold that in this Act it should be given so wide a meaning. There are no doubt certain old penal statutes, as to which the contention would have been impossible, there being certain conditions precedent to any action for the penalties imposed which no artificial person, such as a corporation, could possibly perform. In those cases it would have made nonsense of the statutes to hold that the word "person" included corporation; though in this case I admit that it would not have that effect. I think, nevertheless, that it would be against the general current of authorities, which tend to show that a corporation cannot sue as a common informer; and this is rather illustrated by the argument that corporations are expressly included, and empowered to sue, by many statutes. That tends to show that the word "person" would not have included them without express mention. There are many statutes, no doubt, which place corporations on an equality with natural persons; but this is not by enabling them to do things contrary to their nature, but by enacting that these things, if done by certain natural persons, shall be regarded as if done by the corporation. The statutory provisions as to discovery and inspection, and the administering of interrogatories, are examples of what I mean, and show that there are many acts which it is not in the nature of corporations to do. I think that they cannot, where not expressly authorised to do so, sue as common informers. That was so under the earlier statutes, and I must hold that it is so in this case. Demurrer allowed.

COURT OF ARCHES.

(Before Lord PENZANCE, Dean of Arches.)

COOMBE v. EDWARDS. (a)

Jurisdiction—Practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts—Prohibition by the Queen's Bench Division—Monition—Summary proceeding for disobedience.

In a suit instituted under the Church Discipline Act 1840, and sent by letters of request to the Court of Arches, the Dean of that court had, on the 7th Dec. 1874, pronounced the defendant, the vicar of a parish, guilty of certain ecclesiastical offences, and sentenced him to suspension ab officio for six weeks. On the 28th June 1875 a monition to desist from the practices thus condemned as unlawful was served on the defendant. On the 23rd March 1878, upon application to the court by affidavits, the Dean was satisfied that the defendant was continuously disobeying the said monition, and on the 29th March a further monition to desist from the said practices was served on the defendant. An application to enforce these monitions was made, and, upon the defendant's failure to appear after notice, the Dean, on the 11th May (following decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council), decreed that the defendant had disobeyed the monition, and been guilty of contumacy, and sentenced him to be suspended ab officio et beneficio for the term of three years, the defendant to pay the costs of suit. The Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice made absolute a rule for a prohibition to the Dean of Arches, restraining him from executing the above sentence, on the ground that it was beyond his jurisdiction.

Held, that, the facts of the present case being similar, the judgment must be followed, but (per Curiam) that the authority of decided cases and the established practice of the court showed that the sentence, the execution of which the Queen's Bench Division had prohibited, was within the jurisdiction of the court; that the Queen's Bench Division had exceeded their jurisdiction in reviewing decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; that the Queen's Bench

Division had no power to interfere with the Court of Arches by way of prohibition in a matter over which the Court of Arches had jurisdiction, and that the ancient practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts showed that a monition did prolong the jurisdiction of the court so as to warrant punishment for a repetition of the offence as for contumacy.

THIS was a suit commenced under the Public Worship Regulation Act, in which a monition had been pronounced. The present proceedings were instituted for disobedience to the monition.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. and Blakesley for the promoter. Mr. Edwards did not appear.

LORD PENZANCE.—The court reserved its judgment in this case until the rule for a prohibition in the case of Mr. Mackonochie had been decided; for, although the cases are not identical, a prohibition granted in the one would hardly leave room for this court to take compulsory measures in the other. That decision has now been made, and I venture to think that the result has caused a very general surprise. It has been a surprise, I imagine, to the learned members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to learn that the court of Her Majesty in Council is an "inferior court," and, as such, subjected to the control and supervision of the common law courts, and still more so to find that this supervision, by a sweeping use of the word "jurisdiction," extends to the regulation of their own procedure and practice. Nor will the reason given for this asserted authority be, perhaps, wholly satisfactory. That the common law courts have been used to issue writs of prohibition to the Court of Delegates when they handled matters not within their jurisdiction is undoubted. And that the Sovereign in Council now exercises, among many other functions, the functions which the Delegates used to discharge in ecclesiastical suits is also beyond dispute. But does it follow from these premises that, when this ecclesiastical jurisdiction was transferred by Act of Parliament to a tribunal of the highest dignity, in which the Sovereign (herself signing the judgment) takes a part, this tribunal became at once an "inferior court," and subject as such to the writ of prohibition, simply because some of the duties which it discharges are those which an inferior court had previously been used to discharge? In a word, is it the character and position of the court itself, or is it the character of the jurisdiction which it exercises, which makes it liable to be controlled by prohibition? It occurs to one to ask what, before the Judicature Act, was the position of the Courts of Probate and Matrimonial Causes? The entire jurisdiction of these courts was one which had previously belonged to the Ecclesiastical Courts, and in respect of which prohibitions had been very freely and constantly granted. Did the right and power to grant such prohibitions continue after this jurisdiction had been handed over by the Legislature to new courts, created Courts of Record, and intended to take rank and position on a level with that of the Superior Courts at Westminster? These are matters which will deserve and require to be considered before the somewhat hasty assertion, without authority and without argument at the bar of a right which has I believe, never yet been exercised, and which could not, as it seems to me, be exercised in the case of a definitive sentence passed by the Queen in Council, without directing the writ of prohibition personally to the Sovereign herself, is likely to command a very general acceptance or respect. The judgment in question must also be a surprise to Sir Robert Phillimore, my very learned and highly respected predecessor. After the very unusual compliment paid to him, a living author, of quoting his valuable book on Ecclesiastical Law as a legal authority, he must be surprised to find that it is laid to his charge that he has deviated from the practice of his own court, and has acted ultra vires in issuing a monition to Mr. Mackonochie ordering him to abstain in the future, in addition to a sentence punishing him for offending in the past, the only reason given why this proceeding was ultra vires being that it was contrary to the practice of the court over which he with so much distinction presided. Nor is he able to take refuge in the excuse offered for him that in so acting he was only following what the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had done in two previous cases, inasmuch as that tribunal has never done anything of the sort; and the suggestion that it has done so is at once refuted upon carefully reading the report of the two cases in question. But to no one, I imagine, would this decision be more surprising than to the learned counsel who represent Mr. Mackonochie. The ground on which they asked for a prohibition was this—that Mr. Mackonochie's disobedience to the monitions which had been served upon him could only be punished in one way—namely, by imprisonment for contumacy; and, consequently, that to punish him by suspension was contrary to ecclesiastical law and practice. But it never occurred to them to assert that the issuing of the monition itself was a departure from the established procedure of the court in which they had been accustomed to practise, or to put forth the doctrine, which I will venture to call startling, that a monition or order to refrain in future from definite illegal practices in the conduct of divine service, even when lawfully issued by an ecclesiastical court, is nothing more than a piece of waste paper which the defendant is at liberty to treat with contempt and the court is powerless to enforce. How this can be asserted in the face of the statute of 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, which invests the Ecclesiastical Courts with the power of pronouncing in contempt "any person neglecting or refusing to pay obedience to the lawful orders or decrees as well final as interlocutory of such court," and by means of a significavit imprisoning such persons, I am at a loss to discover. But that these two propositions, if in any decree warranted by the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, or even arguable in connection with that practice, should have escaped the vigilance or exceeded the hardihood of the very acute and learned, and, I may add, sufficiently bold, ecclesiastical lawyers who had Mr. Mackonochie's interests in charge, I am still more at a loss to imagine. And lastly, the public must, I think, have been surprised to discover that a system of judicature should exist in this country so anomalous and so repugnant to common sense as that which this judgment affirms, and which I will in a few words proceed to explain. In this country there have been, time out of mind, different groups of courts exercising different jurisdictions and administering different laws—the courts of common law, the Courts of Equity, the Court of Admiralty, the Courts Ecclesiastical, part of whose jurisdiction has been in modern times transferred to the Courts of Probate and Matrimonial Causes, and many other inferior courts. All these courts (I am speaking of matters as they stood before the Judicature Act) dealt with different subjects and administered different laws. They proceeded by different methods, and had a special practice all their own, which they amended from time to time and regulated for themselves. A proper Court of Appeal from each court, or set of courts, reviewed their decisions in point of law and controlled their procedure. So matters stood before the Judicature Act, which did not affect the Ecclesiastical Courts nor confer any powers on the High Court of Justice for interference with them. In this state of things the novel claim now made by the Queen's Bench Division is this—that the judges of that court, who are wholly unskilled and uninformed (officially speaking) in the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts who have not even the means of knowing what that practice has been by access to the records of those courts, are empowered by law to sit in judgment upon the question whether a particular proceeding is in accordance with usual practice or not, and, deciding in the negative, to suddenly put a stop to the suit altogether, leaving justice wholly unadministered, and both parties to pay the costs of a fruitless litigation. If this result had been the fault of the parties in addressing themselves to the wrong jurisdiction, it might be said that they had themselves to blame. But if the thing complained of is no more than a wrong step in a rightful suit, one would have thought it impossible but that the court which reviewed that step and pronounced it wrong should have power to put matters right, and let the suit proceed. And this is the power which resides in a court of appeal. But the Queen's Bench Division is not a court of appeal from the Ecclesiastical Courts and has no such powers, and that they should thus summarily intervene, and, pronouncing a judgment upon what is or is not the practice of this court (which I will presently show is absolutely mistaken in point of fact), should thus put a summary end to the suit, to the great loss and prejudice of the suitors, is, I repeat, an anomaly in judicature for which the public was, I think, hardly prepared. But what must have been thus a surprise to others becomes little less than consternation to those who have to administer the ecclesiastical laws of the realm in future. They can only regulate their proceedings by previous decisions in their own courts, subject to the review of their courts of appeal; and if, when following the decisions of those courts of appeal, as in the present case, they are liable at any moment to have their proceedings stultified and brought to a sudden stop by an extraneous tribunal which has no official experience in these proceedings or knowledge of their requirements, they are placed in the difficulty of either ignoring the decisions of the appeal courts or inviting a writ of prohibition. In this dilemma their authority cannot fail to be impaired, if not destroyed, and I do not hesitate to affirm that the efficiency of this court will be wholly arrested in future if the principle acted upon in Mr. Mackonochie's case be applied to its future proceedings. It is for this reason that I have felt it my duty to examine

[CT. OF ARCHES.]

COOMBE v. EDWARDS.

[CT. OF ARCHES.]

freely this decision, together with the reasoning upon which it is based, and, having done so, to publicly make my protest against this new interpretation of the word "jurisdiction" and the paralyzing influence over this court which has been "usurped" by the Queen's Bench Division under colour of it. I propose to show that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice is based upon serious misconceptions of fact and equally grave misinterpretations of the law; but, before doing so, I will state exactly what it is which that judgment has decided. Sir Robert Phillimore, when presiding in this Court, punished Mr. Mackonochie for certain illegal practices by a six weeks' suspension and in addition admonished him to abstain in future from these practices. Mr. Mackonochie repeated them, notwithstanding the monition which had forbidden him to do so, and for this conduct, which was both a repetition of the original offence and a contempt of the monition, I suspended him from his office and benefice for a period of three years. The judgment of the Lord Chief Justice pronounces the whole of these proceedings, subsequent to the first punishment of six weeks' suspension, to be either ultra vires or coram non iudice—I think those are his expressions—because they are, he says, contrary to the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts. For, treating the matter as if it was a case in the common law courts or the criminal courts of the country, he conceives that the Ecclesiastical Courts have never done, and have no power to do, more than punish for the particular offences which were charged in the suit, and that, having done so, the suit is at an end, any fresh departures from the law being punishable only in a fresh suit. In this view of the case it will be difficult to account for the existence in ecclesiastical law of such a thing as a monition, which is a process or order wholly unknown to the common or criminal law of the land. But this difficulty is got over by the assertion that a monition in a criminal suit is nothing more than a mild punishment, a species of rebuke, or condemnatory shake of the head, which the defendant is at liberty to disregard if he pleases, and for disobedience of which no punishment of any kind can be inflicted by the court. Such is the view taken by the Lord Chief Justice of the practice and procedure of this and the other Ecclesiastical Courts of the kingdom up to the time when, as he asserts, the Judicial Committee, in a previous suit against Mr. Mackonochie, and in a suit against Mr. Purchas, "usurped the jurisdiction now exercised." The Ecclesiastical Courts can punish, the Lord Chief Justice contends, like the criminal courts, any offence within their jurisdiction; but, like the criminal courts, they can only do so by means of a suit commenced after the offence was committed. So that, if a clergyman systematically sets the law at defiance, and insists Sunday after Sunday on performing divine service in an illegal manner, the practice and procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts does not, says the Lord Chief Justice, permit them to do more than award a punishment for the past, and does not empower them to make any order upon the defendant to desist from the same illegal practices in future. It is upon this reasoning that the Lord Chief Justice declares that the monition issued by Sir Robert Phillimore in this case of Mr. Mackonochie's was a departure from the proper practice of the court, because that learned judge, dealing first with the past, sentenced the defendant to a suspension of six weeks; and then, dealing with the future, issued a monition to him to desist from the practices which had been condemned. The second point upon which the Lord Chief Justice has declared these proceedings to be illegal and void is that to which I have above alluded. While admitting that there is such a thing in ecclesiastical practice as the issuing of a monition to abstain from illegal practices, he declares that such a monition can only be issued as the substantive punishment awarded by the court for the past offences which the defendant may have committed; so that, if the defendant is charged with any departure from the rubrics of the Prayer-book, and the court finds the offence to be proved in fact and in law, it is then at liberty to pass a sentence of punishment, and among the punishments which the court may inflict is this "admonishing" or issuing of a "monition" to the defendant ordering him not to do so again, which monition when issued puts an end to the suit, leaving the defendant to obey it or not as he pleases and the court in the not very dignified position of having issued an order for which it cannot enforce respect. I believe I have thus correctly expressed the Lord Chief Justice's meaning, but I will quote his own words: "The result, then, at which I arrive on the most careful consideration I can give to the subject is, that a monition in a penal suit, while, if pronounced as a definitive sentence, it carries with it no ulterior consequences, cannot be appended to a definitive sentence awarding a specific punishment, so as to prolong and enlarge the jurisdiction of the court and to warrant any further proceedings on a repetition of the offence as for contumacy." I shall presently show that the Lord Chief Justice is wholly mistaken in point of fact, and that for want of acquaintance with what has been usual in the Ecclesiastical Courts he has been led to denounce as a modern usurpation by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council a practice which has the authority of the most learned judges who have ever presided in the Ecclesiastical Courts, including the distinguished names of Dr. Lushington, Sir John Nicoll, and Lord Stowell. But before doing so I must deal with what is a far more vital question. Let it be assumed, for the moment, that this court did in Mr. Mackonochie's case deviate from its ancient practice; does that constitute an excess of jurisdiction, and does the law permit a court of common law to sit in judgment upon such a question, first determining what is and what is not the ancient and proper practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and then, because it considers a particular method of proceeding to be at variance with that practice, declare that the court has exceeded its jurisdiction, and must be stopped by a writ of prohibition? Now, I venture to affirm that no such power has ever been claimed or exercised before. In all the old text books—books of the highest authority—the "Abridgments" of Viner and Bacon, and the "Digest" of Comyns, the subject of prohibition is treated at large. In Comyns's Digest alone there are no less than forty pages devoted to it, and from first to last in these books there is not a trace of the courts of law ever having interfered by way of prohibition, unless either the subject of the suit was not within the jurisdiction of the inferior court, or that court in the course of dealing with the matter which was within its jurisdiction had incidentally dealt with some other matter the determination of which properly belonged to some other jurisdiction. To these definitions may be added general statements—that the courts of common law would interfere if the inferior courts did anything contrary to the law of the land. No authority has been cited by the Lord Chief Justice for any extension of the writ of prohibition beyond these limits. On the other hand, it is not easy to prove a negative and cite authorities to disprove a right or power which has never before been asserted. The natural course in such a case is to consult such definitions as may be found in the older authorities of the writ of prohibition, its objects and its application. At the head of the title "Prohibition" in Bacon's Abridgment is the following: "And for this purpose the writ of prohibition was framed, which issues out of the superior courts of common law to restrain inferior courts, whether such courts be temporal, ecclesiastical, maritime, or military, &c., upon a suggestion that the cognisance of the matter belongs not to such courts," &c. So that prohibitions do not import that the Ecclesiastical or other inferior temporal courts are alia than the King's courts, but signify that the cause is drawn ad aliud examen that it ought to be; and therefore it is always said in all prohibitions (be the court ecclesiastical or temporal to which they be awarded) that the case is drawn ad aliud examen contra coronam et dignitatem regiam. In Viner's Abridgment, title "Court," letter D, it is said, "The court ought to take notice of, and give credit and faith to, the proceedings and sentences of the spiritual courts, and to think that their proceedings are consonant to the law of Holy Church, for cuiuslibet in arte sua perito est credendum, though what they do there be against the reason of our law," and for this is cited 4 Coke's Reports, f. 29, pl. 18. The definition given of a prohibition in Viner's Abridgment is cited from Wood's Institute, another book of high authority, as follows: A prohibition issues "to forbid a judge to proceed in a cause that belongs to the common law courts, or that belongs not to his jurisdiction, though the courts of law can give no remedy." Again, in Viner's Abridgment, title "Prohibition," 2, is the following: "The probate of wills is a matter purely spiritual, and so they may proceed in their own manner, although different from ours;" and again, "Agreed (Shower, p. 172, in the case of Shotter v. Friend) if the spiritual court proceeds in a matter purely spiritual, and pertaining to those courts, according to the civil law, though their proceedings are against the rules of the common law, yet prohibition does not lie." In Comyn's Digest, "Prohibition," F. (1), under the heading, "For what cause granted" is the following: "A prohibition should be granted to the spiritual court in all cases where the ecclesiastical judge proceeds in a matter out of their jurisdiction; though the temporal court has not cognisance of the matter for which the libel is in the spiritual court, for it is sufficient cause for a prohibition that the Ecclesiastical Court exceeds its jurisdiction." In none of these descriptive passages, it is to be observed, is anything said of a prohibition to an inferior court because it dealt in this way or that with a matter over which its jurisdiction could not be questioned. But I will proceed to other authorities. In Braddon v. Hill (Lord Raymond, p. 221) Holt, C.J. expressed himself as follows: "When the Ecclesiastical Courts are possessed of a cause which is merely of spiritual cognisance, the courts of common law allow them to pursue their own method in the determination of it, but where in such a cause collateral matter arises which is not of their cognisance properly, there the courts of common law enforce them to admit such evidence as the common law would allow." In the 13th part of Lord Coke's Reports, f. 44, there is a long case de modo decimandi, the main question being whether a custom should be tried in the Ecclesiastical Court or a prohibition should issue. But to the fourth objection made, that the Ecclesiastical Court had refused a plea de modo decimandi, the judges resolved that "If the spiritual court ought to have the trial de modo decimandi, then the refusal of acceptance of such a plea should give cause of appeal, not of prohibition, as if excommunication, divorce, heresy, simony, &c., be pleaded there, and the plea refused, that gives no ground of prohibition; as if they deny any plea a mere spiritual appeal and no prohibition lieth." The expressions used in these authorities make sufficiently clear the line which has always hitherto been drawn between entertaining a suit, or incidental matter, which lies out of the jurisdiction of the court, and proceeding in a faulty or improper way in a matter which lies wholly within it. The first is ground of prohibition, and the last is ground of appeal. This line of distinction has, unfortunately, been overlooked by the Lord Chief Justice, which is the more surprising, as it has been firmly upheld by one of the most able and distinguished members of his own court. Lush, J., in giving judgment in this very case of Mr. Mackonochie, expressed this distinction in language admirably clear and unambiguous: "It is admitted that the Ecclesiastical Court had jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and jurisdiction to pronounce for the offence of which it has found the defendant guilty the very sentence which it has pronounced. I think we have no jurisdiction to inquire whether the ordinary course of procedure has or has not been followed in this case. The practice and procedure of every court when no Act of Parliament intervenes to regulate it (which I assume to be the case here) is within the exclusive cognisance of the court itself. If in a particular case the mode of proceeding were shown to be ever so irregular and at variance with the ordinary practice, it would not give this court jurisdiction to interfere. Irregularity in procedure is matter of appeal and not of prohibition, and the appeal is to the Privy Council and not to this court." But I will now advert to a decision the great weight of which will not be denied in Westminster Hall. In the year 1835 a Mr. Smyth was engaged in a suit with his wife, which, after passing through the Ecclesiastical Court, came to the King in Council by way of appeal. The Judicial Committee retained the cause and ordered Mr. Smyth to appear absolutely. Conceiving himself aggrieved by this order, and maintaining that on a former appeal to the Court of Delegates the matter had been otherwise decided, Mr. Smyth applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a prohibition. The case was heard by Littledale, J., Patteson, J., and Coleridge, J., and the judgment of the court was determined by Littledale, J. He said: "Whether the Judicial Committee were right in decreeing Mr. Smyth to appear absolutely or not is a question of practice, not of jurisdiction. The temporal courts cannot take notice of the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, or entertain a question whether in any particular cause, admitted to be of ecclesiastical cognisance, the practice has been regular. The only instances in which the temporal courts can interfere by way of prohibiting any particular proceeding in an ecclesiastical suit are those in which something is done contrary to the general law of the land, or manifestly out of the jurisdiction of the court:" (see 3 Adol. & Ell. p. 724.) Not satisfied with this decision, Mr. Smyth made a similar application to the Court of Exchequer. The case is reported in 1 Tyrrwhit & Granger, p. 226. Lord Abinger said that he would give no opinion as to whether prohibition would lie to the Judicial Committee, and went on as follows: "It is alleged that the Judicial Committee have come to a wrong decision upon a matter in which they have jurisdiction. They have the power to remove the suit into their own court, and to take cognisance of it and to make decrees and orders respecting it. That being so, if they have fallen into any error, whether in some interlocutory matter or in their final judgment, we cannot remedy it or entertain an appeal from their decision. We cannot afford any redress, for if there be any mistake in the proceedings it is in a point of practice, which cannot be the ground of a prohibition." In the same case Parke, B. expressed himself thus: "The Judicial Committee had jurisdiction in this case, which is all we are bound to watch over in inferior courts. The Judicial Committee retained the cause, and thus obtained what may be termed an original jurisdiction, and then they ordered Mr. Smyth to appear absolutely. I give no opinion on that order, but, whether right or wrong, it was a step taken in the cause by a court having competent jurisdiction." Alderson, B. added: "If they have done wrong it is in a matter over which they had jurisdiction, and which regards the practice of their own court, and which cannot, therefore, be the subject of a prohibition." To this judgment Gurney, B. assented, and we have, therefore, the deliberate opinion of no less than seven judges to add to that of Lush J. in support of the proposition that the temporal courts have no right or power to inquire into and review the procedure or the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, but only to restrain them from entertaining matters which, by reason of their nature, are not within their proper jurisdiction. But I must cite yet another and still more modern authority. The case Ex parte Story occurred in A.D. 1852, and is reported in 8 Exch. 195. It was an application, on Mr. Story's behalf, for a writ of prohibition to the Consistorial Court of London. His complaint was that in a matrimonial suit two decrees, ordering him to receive his wife and to pay alimony, had been made in his absence and without previous notice to him. The application was refused. Alderson, B. said: "The Ecclesiastical Court had jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the suit, and we cannot assume that it has acted in this instance without jurisdiction. Every court must necessarily be intrusted with the control over its own rules of practice. If that were not so, the proceedings in the courts would continually be subject to be stayed by prohibitions supported by the rash oaths of the suitors." And Parke, B. said: "The case is strictly analogous to the Marshalsea case, and falls within the principle of law which is there expounded, namely, that when a court has jurisdiction over the suit, and proceeds inverso ordine, or erroneously, neither the party suing nor the officer is liable to an action at the suit of the party affected by the proceeding. There is no doubt that here the Ecclesiastical Court has jurisdiction over the suit, but if any proceeding of an irregular nature has taken place in that suit, it does not take away the jurisdiction of the court, but merely gives the party a remedy by application to the court itself, or by appeal. Ex parte Smyth is in principle expressly in point." Nor could an opposite opinion be for a moment entertained unless an extension and significance were given to the word "jurisdiction" at variance with its natural and proper meaning. That any given court should have power to correct and punish a particular offence, in a particular person, it is necessary that the offence itself should be of a nature to fall within its jurisdiction; that the person should be subject to its jurisdiction; and that the punishment awarded to him should be one which the court is competent to inflict for that offence. These things constitute "jurisdiction." But where they exist the method of bringing the defendant into court; the form in which the offence is charged against him; the particular forms in which facilities are provided for his defence; the specific rules under which each step in the suit is taken—these things, which are but the machinery by which justice is administered, lie widely apart from the right and jurisdiction to administer it, and to confound them together in the common use of the word "jurisdiction" is, I think, a misapplication of terms sufficiently obvious. For these reasons and on these authorities it appears to me that the Queen's Bench Division has wrongfully "usurped" (to use the expression of the Lord Chief Justice) in this case of Mr. Mackonochie a right to inquire into and decide upon the practice of this court. But I will now proceed to show that the view of that practice taken in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice is utterly unfounded in fact. I will not quote that learned judgment at large. It is enough to point attention to the specific propositions which it asserts. The first proposition is that which I have before stated—namely, that a monition not to offend in like manner again cannot, according to the practice of the Ecclesiastical Court, be appended to a sentence awarding punishment for an offence already committed. Now, in dealing with this proposition, the Lord Chief Justice has, in the very outset, fallen into a signal and unaccountable error of fact. He is clearly under the impression that the Judicial Committee, in deciding the former suit against Mr. Mackonochie and the suit against Mr. Purchas, had done this very thing—that is to say, had appended a monition to a sentence of punishment; for he says that Sir Robert Phillimore, in taking that course in this suit against Mr. Mackonochie, had "done no more than follow the precedents set by the Judicial Committee." But the contrary is the fact, as indeed will be perceived from the Lord Chief Justice's own statement in a latter part of his judgment of the proceedings taken in these cases, from which it appears that the Judicial Committee did not pass any sentence of punishment for the offences charged in the articles, but only admonished the defendant. The punishment of suspension afterwards awarded by them was awarded for not obeying that monition, and repeating the original offence. This remarkable mistake, however, only shifts the burden of having "usurped" this method of proceeding (now denounced as novel) from the Judicial Committee to the shoulders of Sir Robert Phillimore. But it cannot rest there, because, if the case of Fendall v. Wilson, which was decided on the 15th Dec. 1862, by Dr. Lushington, is referred to, it will be found that he (who during a long life had almost an exceptional acquaintance with ecclesiastical practice) did the very same thing. The suit arose in the Arches Court by letters of request, and was instituted for false doctrine. Dr. Lushington found the charge proved, and sentenced Mr. Wilson by a suspension for one year ab officio et beneficio, and in addition "admonished" him not to repeat his offence. In a similar case of the Bishop of Salisbury v. Williams, arising in like manner upon letters of request, and which was argued and dealt with by the court about the same time, Dr. Lushington did precisely the same thing. These cases will be found in the Privy Council Appeals. I will now go back thirty years, to a time when the Arches Court was presided over by Sir John Nicoll. In the year 1830 the suit of Field v. Cozens was decided. It is reported in 3 Hagg. p. 178. It was a criminal suit, brought by letters of request from the Consistorial Court of Chichester, and the offence charged was that of brawling. An affirmative issue having been given, Sir John Nicoll suspended the defendant ab ingressu ecclesie for one month, "admonished" him and condemned him in costs. Again, in the year 1826, in a criminal suit promoted by the Rev. Henry Turmine against George Clarkson for brawling, Sir John Nicoll suspended the defendant ab ingressu ecclesie "for the space of one fortnight," and admonished him "to refrain in future from offending in like manner under pain of the law and contempt thereof." The sentence of the court is set out at full length in Mr. Coote's book on the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, at p. 253, as an ordinary precedent in cases of that character. I will take another instance in Sir John Nicoll's time; it occurred as early as the year 1816. The name of the case is Blakemore v. Bridger, and it will be found reported in 2 Phil. p. 302. The suit came by letters of request from the Commissary of Chichester, and it was a criminal suit charging the defendant with having married and cohabited with the daughter of his former wife by a former husband. Sir John Nicoll held the charges to be proved, declared the marriage void, sentenced the defendant to do penance as a punishment, and "admonished" him to live separate from the woman in question for the future. The sentence is set out at length in the notes to the case. The judge pronounced that "William Bridger and Mary Walter ought to be strictly and under pain of the law 'admonished' to separate from each other, and to abstain for the future from all pretended matrimonial, incestuous, and unlawful cohabitation with each other, and we do by these presents so admonish them." Here, therefore, again was a sentence of punishment, and in addition an admonition to "abstain" from the offence in future "under pain of the law." What these latter words "under pain of the law" meant is apparent from the next case which I am about to cite—a case which has the great authority of Lord Stowell—Burgess v. Burgess, reported in the Consistory Reports, vol. 1, p. 384, which occurred in the year 1804. It was, like the last case, a criminal suit, charging incestuous cohabitation. Lord Stowell held the articles proved. In consideration of the age and infirmity of the party, he forbore to pass the sentence of penance, which, he said, was the usual punishment, but condemned him in costs, and "admonished" him not to continue the intercourse. The parties, he said, must live in future separate and apart, and if obedience be not given to this order, excommunication and other consequences will necessarily follow. I will conclude this continuous line of modern authorities with one more case taken also from the Reports of Lord Stowell's decisions. The case of Cox v. Goodday is to be found in the Consistory Reports, vol. 2, p. 138. It occurred in 1810, and was a criminal suit in which articles were exhibited against the Rev. William Goodday for brawling. The defendant having given an affirmative issue to the articles, he was sentenced by the court to a suspension ab officio for a fortnight, and was also "admonished" not to offend in future. Here, then, is a series of cases, beginning as early as 1804, in which the practice of passing a sentence of punishment and adding thereto a "monition" or injunction to abstain from the like offence in future has been adopted and acted upon throughout this century, and by the most eminent judges who have presided in the Arches Court during that period of time. This period of time, it is to be observed, covers the whole time during which any reports of ecclesiastical cases are in existence, excepting, perhaps, the notes of Sir George Lee in the middle of the last century; but if any previous reports existed, can any doubt be entertained that the same thing would constantly appear to have happened? The cases collected by Mr. Rothery, and published in the form of a return to the House of Commons, carry this same practice further back by the space of another century. The case No. 98 occurred in the year 1692. It was a suit commenced in the Consistory Court of Gloucester for an incestuous marriage and cohabitation by Richard Orchard with his father's widow. There was an appeal to the Court of Arches and thence to the Delegates. The Delegates pronounced sentence against the appeal, and "declared that the said pretended marriage was ab initio null and void, and separated, divorced, and absolved the appellants therefrom, and further sentenced them to be canonically corrected and to perform salutary and condign penance. They also condemned the appellants in costs in all the courts. A monition was also decreed forbidding the appellants to consort together except in public." Indeed so completely an established practice has it been to admonish for the future as well as correct and punish for the past, that a prayer by the promoter that the court would so deal with the defendant is to be found in the common form of articles used in this court in criminal suits. In Mr. Coote's Book of Practice, p. 222, is a form of articles given as a precedent against a layman for brawling, which concludes in this manner: "And that you be duly and according to the exigency of the law corrected and punished for the same, and admonished to refrain from the like behaviour for the future." And accordingly, in the articles exhibited in this very suit against Mr. Mackonochie, the prayer of the promoter is that the defendant be "duly and canonically punished according to the gravity of his offence, and likewise 'admonished' against so offending in future, and condemned in the costs," &c. The articles exhibited in the former suit against Mr. Mackonochie concluded with a prayer in identically the same form. And yet this is the mode of procedure which the Lord Chief Justice asserts to have been "assumed" or "usurped" within the last few years by the Judicial Committee, "not indeed," he says, "by the judges of the ordinary Ecclesiastical Courts, but by judges of whom, however great and eminent, I hope I may be pardoned for saying that they may be supposed to be less familiar with the administration of the ecclesiastical law." I might perhaps stop here, for this erroneous theory which the Lord Chief Justice has invented of ecclesiastical practice underlies (with one exception which I will presently mention) the whole of his judgment, and forms the entire basis of it; so much so, that I will venture to hazard the opinion that, had these cases and this practice been known to him, his decision would hardly have been what it was. But the other proposition which he has asserted relating to the practice of this court is equally without foundation, and is likely to be so misleading to suitors, and mischievous to the efficiency of the court, that I cannot do otherwise than mention it. An "admonition," he says, in a criminal suit, save where it is issued to compel appearance or "as a means of furthering the progress of a suit," can only be resorted to as a definitive sentence of punishment for a past offence. And when thus used it cannot be, he contends, "the foundation of any ulterior consequences, but is only a form, however mild, of punishment; the open and public censure, or rebuke of the judge, for ecclesiastical misconduct, generally accompanied by the party thus censured being condemned in costs, and to be remembered, doubtless, as a matter of aggravation should a repetition of the offence occur, but not capable of being used as the foundation of any future proceedings of a summary character on the score of contumacy in case of such repetition." Now, it is undoubted that, in many instances, the Ecclesiastical Courts have satisfied themselves in criminal suits with admonishing the defendant to abstain in future from the conduct or neglect which may have been charged against him as an ecclesiastical offence, without adding thereto any specific punishment for the past. The reason of this becomes apparent when the nature of these so-called criminal suits is adverted to and properly understood. The powers and office of the spiritual courts are correctional and disciplinary. The primary and professed object of these criminal suits is not to deter others, but to enforce upon the defendant himself pro salute animae a course of conduct no longer open to ecclesiastical censure. The reformation of the defendant being the avowed object, it is quite as much, or more, the purpose of the suit, from the ecclesiastical point of view, to provide against future misconduct as to punish for past excesses. The language of the citations and of the sentences in use in the Ecclesiastical Courts fully bears out this statement; nor will it be denied by anyone conversant with the ecclesiastical law. Such a comparison, therefore, as the Lord Chief Justice institutes between an indictment for larceny, where the prisoner is charged with an offence against the Crown and dignity of the Queen, and is punished for the sake of example, and a suit in this court against a clergyman for enforcing upon him a due observance of ecclesiastical law in the performance of divine service, is a comparison between two things which at the very foundation have no analogy whatever, and have little or nothing in common but the common name of "criminal." Is it, then, possible to accept the proposition of the Lord Chief Justice that a "monition," or order of the court to abstain in future from particular conduct or practice, is an order which the court may make, but cannot enforce? Let me glance at some of the cases in which, without any punishment for the past, the court has thus ordered the defendant to abstain or desist in future. In Barnes v. Shore (1 Robertson, 399) the suit, which was a criminal one, came to this court by letters of request from Exeter. The defendant, a clergyman, was charged with reading services and preaching without a licence in an unconsecrated chapel. Dr. Lushington held the charge proved, did not sentence him to any punishment, but admonished him "to refrain from offending in like manner in future," adding, "should he be guilty of a repetition of this offence it will be not only an offence against his diocesan, but against the authority of this court;" that is, not only an offence against ecclesiastical law, but a contempt of the authority which commanded him to refrain from committing it. Again, in the case of Hodgson v. Dillon (2 Curteis, 388), a criminal suit was instituted in the Consistory Court of London against a clergyman for officiating in an unconsecrated chapel without the licence of the bishop. The promoter prayed "that the defendant should be admonished to refrain" from so officiating in future, and the judge "admonished" him accordingly. A similar case occurred in A.D. 1789. Burton v. Wells (1 Consistory Reps. p. 34) was a criminal suit against Dr. Wells for officiating in Ely-place Chapel without a licence. Lord Stowell said, "I must therefore pronounce for the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London by decreeing that Dr. Wells has officiated without authority, and direct a 'monition' to issue to him to desist." Now, does the Lord Chief Justice really mean to contend that the monitions issued in these cases were mere rebukes for the past, and that if the clergymen in question had wholly disregarded the orders of the court they might have done so with impunity? What authority, I may ask, is there for such a doctrine? The language of the learned judges—of Lord Stowell, who, in the case above quoted, spoke of "excommunication following" upon disobedience; and of Dr. Lushington, who spoke of disobedience being an offence "against the authority of the court"—nay the very language of the monition itself, which commands the defendant to abstain for the future "under pain of the law and contempt thereof," are distinctly at variance with any such proposition. It is not to be expected that the modern reports would afford instances in which disobedience to those monitions was followed by punishment for contempt. Such a matter, involving the mere exercise by the court of its ordinary powers for enforcing obedience to its decrees, would not furnish matter for a report. But it happens (again referring to Mr. Rothery's collection of cases in the Delegates) that the older records of the courts do furnish such instances. The case No. 100, which was a suit by one Mary Hewetson against a woman named Chamberlayne for adultery with Thomas Hewetson, her husband, was promoted in the Arches Court by letters of request from the Bishop of London. "The court had previously issued a monition forbidding Thomas Hewetson and Chamberlayne to consort together except in public, and a decree of excommunication was issued against them for not obeying the monition." The Delegates rejected the appeal and issued a similar monition. The statute, moreover, of the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, which was "an Act for the better regulation of the Ecclesiastical Courts in England," &c., is distinctly opposed to the contention that a monition cannot be enforced. For it provides that in all cases in the Ecclesiastical Courts, "where any person required to comply with the lawful orders or decrees, as well final as interlocutory, of any such court shall neglect or refuse to pay obedience to such lawful orders or decrees, it shall be lawful for the judge to pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt," and to signify the contempt to the Court of Chancery with the consequence of imprisonment. But the most singular aspect of the Lord Chief Justice's proposition remains to be stated. He admits that a monition is a common process in constant use in the Ecclesiastical Courts, both in civil and criminal proceedings, "as incidental to procedure," and as a means of "furthering the progress of a suit," and he does not deny that such monitions may be and are universally enforced by the court, if not obeyed; while he asserts that a "monition" forming the definitive sentence of the court need not be obeyed and cannot be enforced by the court. So that there are two kinds of admonitions—one of a peremptory character, not to be disregarded without the liability to punishment, and another of a harmless, and I might add useless character, and which may be set at naught with safety. And yet the "monitions" in all cases are the same, and are formal documents issued under the seal of the court in precisely similar language, and in all cases they command a particular thing to be done or abstained from "under pain of the law and contempt thereof." I have thought it right thus to refute this proposition of the Lord Chief Justice—viz., that the monitions of the court may be disobeyed with impunity, because, if it should go forth to the public with his high sanction and uncontradicted, it would undermine the authority of this court in some of its most useful functions. But I have not lost sight of the fact that in this suit against Mr. Mackonochie the further question arises whether the power of this court to punish the defendant for disobeying the monition and repeating his original offence is limited to the imprisonment authorised by the statute of George III., or whether it extends to punishing him by suspension. Having expressed myself very fully upon this subject on a former occasion, I forbear to recur to it. The only remark I have to make upon it is that the sentence of suspension in Mr. Mackonochie's case was intended to be passed upon him, not only for his contempt in disobeying the monition, but also for his breach of the ecclesiastical laws in the repetition of his original offence. And some pains were taken in drawing up the order of this court (which I may add was not in existence until after the rule nisi for a prohibition had been granted) to make this intention clear and unambiguous, with what success it remains for others to decide. One point, and one point only, remains, and I notice it the more particularly because from the report which I have seen of the judgment in the Queen's Bench Division it appears to have been the one particular point upon which (subject to a general agreement with the Lord Chief Justice) Mellor, J. rested his judgment. This court, it is argued, has no original jurisdiction, and its jurisdiction in the present case arises solely under the letters of request from the Bishop of London. The bishop, it is said, could only request this court to deal with offences committed before the letters of request were issued, and, consequently, could only confer upon this court a jurisdiction to punish those offences without regard to the future. I pass by the question whether the archbishop has or has not an original jurisdiction within his province subject to the bill of citations; and, assuming the jurisdiction of this court to be conferred by the letters of request, I will answer the above objection in a few words, both on principle and on authority. The bishop, if this suit had been commenced in the Consistory Court, would have had authority not only to punish for the past, but to admonish for the future, such being the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts; and when the bishop requested the judge of the Court of Arches to institute the suit in this court, where the same practice prevails, he invoked the exercise in the Court of Arches of the same powers and jurisdiction that he himself would have exercised if the suit had been instituted in his own court. And with regard to authority I am satisfied with pointing out that the two cases of Fendall v. Wilson and the Bishop of Salisbury v. Williams, in which Dr. Lushington admonished the defendant not to offend in future, were both cases coming to him by letters of request, as also were the two cases above quoted of Blakemore v. Brider and Field v. Cosens, in both of which Sir John Nicoll did the same thing, while the practice of the Bishop's Court in this matter is evidenced by the case above quoted of Oos v. Goodday, where Lord Stowell did the same thing in the Consistory Court of London. Having thus vindicated the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and proved the existence during the whole time over which any reports of ecclesiastical cases extend, and even a century earlier, of the very procedure which the Lord Chief Justice has denounced as a modern invention, I may very properly, I think, pass by without comment the following exhortations to judicial duty. A judge "cannot set himself above the law which he has to administer, or make or mould it to suit the exigencies of a particular occasion;" "it may be that this summary jurisdiction would be exceedingly useful in order to prevent erratic clergymen from setting the law at defiance, and retaining benefices in a church the rules and ritual of which they habitually disregard, if the Legislature should think proper to create it. But its possible utility affords no justification for usurping it, and expediency is a new—and I must say to me strange—ground to assign for upholding the exercise of assumed judicial authority when it cannot be shown to exist in point of law." The imputation here apparently conveyed is that the Ecclesiastical Courts have wilfully overstepped their legal authority and adopted a novel procedure because it was "exceedingly useful." I say apparently, for I should be as little willing to believe that this was the real meaning of the Lord Chief Justice as I should be to suppose that in the novel power which he has himself "usurped" he contemplated a useful means of extinguishing the Ecclesiastical Courts. But I must be permitted to draw one practical lesson from the Lord Chief Justice's misconception of ecclesiastical practice. Speaking of himself, he says, "I have to deal with a branch of law with which, as a common law judge, I am, of course, though I have taken the utmost pains to make myself master of the authorities, less familiar;" and again, he says: "I have gone carefully through all the writers, certainly all the writers of authority, who have written on the subject of ecclesiastical jurisdiction since the Reformation, and have not only found no authority for the exercise of such a power, but not even a trace of it." That, after a search so laborious, a practice which has all along been familiar in these courts should have escaped attention, and that it should have been possible to compare, as analogous to one another, these disciplinary suits in the Ecclesiastical Courts with indictments for breaches of criminal law must afford matter for surprise. But what a light does it not shed upon the system newly asserted of a court whose function it is to administer one branch of the law sitting in judgment upon the practice and procedure of another court which administers a wholly different branch of the law! And if the highest ability, the most extended industry, and what all must know to be the most earnest desire and intention to arrive at a right conclusion, can only produce a result so much to be deplored, what hope will there be in future for the Ecclesiastical Courts when their practice may come to be handled by ability less exceptional and with industry less marked? I cannot close these observations without a word upon what has been called the "summary" nature of the proceeding under which Mr. Mackonochie has been punished. For my own part, I should be loth to adopt any procedure unless absolutely forced upon me by the law, even though it were exceedingly useful, if it bore unjustly on the defendant or diminished in any degree his means or opportunities of legitimate defence. "Though a murderer should be taken red handed in the act," says the Lord Chief Justice, "if there is a flaw in the indictment the criminal must have the benefit of it." Alas that this should be so! For this species of defence I have, I confess, no sympathy. The picture of law triumphant and justice prostrate is not, I am aware, without admirers. To me it is a sorry spectacle. The spirit of justice does not reside in formalities or words, nor is the triumph of its administration to be found in successfully picking a way between the pitfalls of technicality. After all, the law is, or ought to be, but the handmaid of justice; and inflexibility, which is the most becoming robe of the latter, often serves to render the former grotesque. But any real inroad upon the rights and opportunities for a defence of a person charged with a breach of the law whereby the certainty of justice might be imperilled I conceive to be a matter of the highest moment. I am, therefore, not contented with having shown these proceedings to be sanctioned by ecclesiastical law without pointing out, in addition, that they are wholly consonant with justice. The word "summary" is apt to convey a false impression. In the criminal courts of the country to convict by a summary proceeding is to withdraw from the defendant the advantage of a jury. In the common law courts to deal with a matter "summarily on motion" implies the substitution of affidavits for witnesses, and very often the exclusion of an appeal. But the so-called "summary" proceeding against Mr. Mackonochie in this court has excluded nothing, it has deprived him of no advantage, and placed him in no respect in a different position from that which he would have occupied had his offences been adjudicated upon under a fresh set of articles in a fresh suit. Had Mr. Mackonochie chosen to appear he would have had the same opportunity of calling witnesses, the same opportunity of arguing any points of law, and the same means of defending himself in all respects as the proceedings in a fresh suit would have given him. The Lord Chief Justice, indeed, says he would have had no appeal; but this, again, is surely an error, for all orders of this court, however trifling, were by the old ecclesiastical law matters of "grievance" and appeal, and the Church Discipline Act gives an absolute right of appeal against all definitive sentences, and an appeal with leave of the judge (which is never refused unless purely vexatious) against all interlocutory orders. The whole difference, then, between the procedure which has been adopted and that which the Lord Chief Justice says should have been adopted lies in this, that if a fresh suit had been instituted Mr. Mackonochie's offences would have been charged against him in the formal language of a paper headed "Articles," whereas in the present suit the same offences were charged against him in language equally precise and definite in a paper headed "Notice of motion," this latter being accompanied by an advantage which fresh articles would not have given him—namely, the affidavits of the witnesses who were to prove the case against him. On the other hand the additional expense and delay which a fresh suit necessarily to some extent involves are avoided. The designation, therefore, of "summary," the meaning of which in these cases is thus reduced to: "speedy and inexpensive," instead of being a reproach to this form of proceeding, is very much to its credit. The further objections which have been ingeniously suggested against it—namely, that the defendant might have removed to another benefice out of the original diocese, or, what would be a more formidable consideration, out of the province, may be properly dealt with when such a case arises. In such a case, as also in case of a great lapse of time after the issuing of the monition before it was disobeyed, it would be quite competent to the court to require a fresh suit before taking compulsory or penal measures. These considerations make it abundantly clear, I think, that this form of proceeding by "motion," which is analogous to the procedure by injunction, or perpetual injunction in the Courts of Equity, is conformable to justice, while it is not opposed to the security or even the interests of a defendant. This, though it forms no reason for adopting such a proceeding without the sanction of the law, is a very good reason for upholding it when it has, as I have already shown it has, that sanction. Regarding the criminal aspect of these suits against clergymen, it is not out of place to remark that the nature of the punishments inflicted in them, even in extreme cases, does not extend beyond a deprivation of their preferment in a church the constitutions and laws of which they may have violated, and in the case of significavit an imprisonment which terminates as soon as they declare themselves willing to conform to those laws. I have dwelt thus at large upon the judgment pronounced in Mr. Mackonochie's case, because I conceive that the independence of this tribunal in matters regarding its own procedure demanded an adequate protest against the invasion thereby made upon it. But the Queen's writ of prohibition, however unadvisedly issued, must command both obedience and respect. And, as I cannot proceed to punish Mr. Edwards, the defendant in this case, by imprisonment without the chance of running counter to the principles which have been acted upon in the case of Mr. Mackonochie, and possibly, if not probably, inviting another prohibition, I think it best for all parties to hold my hand and decline to proceed to compulsory measures at present.

COOMBE v. EDWARDS.

[CT. OF ARCHES.]

REG. v. TREADGOLD. (a)

Jurisdiction—Venue—Embezzlement.

It was the duty of the prisoner, a commercial traveller, to remit daily to his employers, who resided in London, the moneys which he collected, without reduction. The prisoner, on the 1st and 2nd March 1878, collected at Newark two sums of money which he did not remit or account for till the first week in April, when one of his employers went to Grantham where the prisoner resided, saw him, and taxed him with receiving moneys and not accounting to them for them. The prisoner then and there handed to his employer a list of moneys he had collected and not accounted for, including the above two sums. There was no evidence that the prisoner returned to Grantham on either of the days, or at what time of the respective days he received the two sums of money. He was indicted and convicted at the borough of Grantham Quarter Sessions for embezzling the above two sums of money.

Held that the conviction was bad, as there was no evidence of any embezzlement within the borough of Grantham.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of the borough of Grantham, Notts.

The prisoner was tried before me at the sessions held for the borough of Grantham, on the 23rd July 1878, on an indictment charging him with having in the borough of Grantham embezzled the several sums of 2*l.* 5*s.* and 6*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* respectively, the property of Nathan Defries and another, his masters.

The prisoner was employed by the prosecutors as a commercial traveller under a written agreement, by which he was bound to remit daily, without any reduction whatsoever, any moneys collected by him on their account.

On the 1st and 2nd March 1878 the prisoner being then at Newark, in the course of his occupation as commercial traveller, received on account of his masters the sum of 2*l.* 5*s.* from one H. Slater, and the sum of 6*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* from Thomas Edwards respectively. He never accounted to them for the money, or informed them that he had received it except as hereafter stated.

It was proved that the prisoner resided at Grantham, but there was no evidence to show that he returned to Grantham on either of the days, or at what time on the respective days he received the said several sums of money.

It was within the knowledge of the jury that Newark was fourteen and three-quarter miles from Grantham, and within easy access of it by train, although no formal proof was given of the fact.

In the first week in April 1878 Nathan Defries, one of the prisoner's employers, proceeded to Grantham and had an interview with the prisoner there; and, on taxing him with receiving money on account of his employers which he had not accounted for to them, the prisoner handed to the said Nathan Defries a list of amounts he had received and not accounted for, in which list the two items of 2*l.* 5*s.* and 6*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* appeared.

Upon the above facts it was contended, on behalf of the prisoner, that the indictment failed of proof, the embezzlement, if embezzlement there was, having been committed at Newark, in the county of Nottingham, where the money was received and appropriated by him, and not at Grantham, in the county of Lincoln.

On the part of the prosecution it was contended that the venue was well laid at Grantham, the offence having been commenced at Newark and completed at Grantham; and that, by virtue of the statute 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 12, a person may be tried either in the county in which he began or that in which he completed the offence.

I overruled the objection, holding that, as the prisoner lived at Grantham, but a short distance from Newark, there was evidence from which the jury might infer that the prisoner would return home from Newark on the day he received the money; and that, as it was his duty to remit daily the money he collected, the failure to do so was sufficient evidence of embezzlement, and I declined to withdraw the case from the jury.

The prisoner was found guilty, and I passed sentence upon him, reserving the point as to the venue, and admitting him to bail pending the decision of it by the court.

The question reserved is whether, under the circumstances above disclosed, the venue was well laid in Grantham. If the court should be of opinion that it was, the conviction to stand; or, if of the contrary opinion, to be quashed.

before the first week in April, and the receipt of the moneys was a month previously at Newark. The alleged embezzlement consisted in the fact of non-accounting, but at Grantham he did account for the receipt of the moneys. It is true that it was his duty to have remitted daily the moneys he had collected without any reduction, and it does not appear that he was ever at Grantham between the time of receiving the money and the first week in April. [HAWKINS, J.—The only statement in the case bearing on this is, that the prisoner lived at Grantham. DENMAN, J.—Where did the prisoner feloniously appropriate the moneys to his own use?] From the case it is impossible to say, but it does not appear that he did so appropriate them at Grantham. [KELLY, U.B.—It lies on the prosecution to show that the embezzlement took place at Grantham.] He then cited the recent case of Reg. v. Rogers (14 Cox C. C. 22; 47 L.J. 11, M.C.), and the case of Reg. v. Murdoch (2 Den. C. C. 298; 5 Cox C. C. 360). In the present case the evidence pointed to an embezzlement at Newark, if there was any embezzlement at all, but there was no evidence of any embezzlement at Grantham.

No counsel appeared to argue for the prosecution.

KELLY, C.B.—This conviction must be quashed. There was no evidence at all which showed the completion of the offence of embezzlement at Grantham. It is quite consistent with the facts stated in the case that there was probably an act of embezzlement at Newark, but even that is not clear. The case states that the prisoner resided at Grantham, and that there was no evidence to show that he returned to Grantham on either of the days he received the several sums of money. It further states that in the first week of April one of the prisoner's employers proceeded to Grantham and had an interview with the prisoner and taxed him with receiving moneys which he had not accounted for to them, and that the prisoner handed to him a list of amounts he had received and not accounted for, in which list the two items charged in the indictment appeared, and there the evidence stops. It is impossible to say upon these facts that there was any evidence of embezzlement at Grantham, and therefore under the circumstances the conviction must be quashed.

DENMAN, LINDLEY, MANISTY, and HAWKINS, JJ., concurred.

Conviction quashed.

REG. v. THOMAS HUGHES. (a)

Larceny—Recent possession—Evidence for the jury.

A bag was left by the owner on a Saturday night near to a place where the prisoner and two other persons were at the time. The prisoner passed by the place on his way home, and shortly afterwards one of the other persons followed in the same direction. That person and the prosecutor then met the prisoner coming back to his home from the opposite direction, and being questioned he denied all knowledge of the bag, and said that he had been into the neighbouring wood for firewood. The wood, the prisoner's cottage, and some disused farm buildings near it were then searched, without success. On the Monday morning the bag was found in a hay-loft in one of the disused farm buildings near to the highway. There was no door to it, and passers-by had easy access to it. The prisoner was then taken into custody for stealing the bag, and said to the constable, after previously denying he had taken the bag, "I suppose I shall get a month for this," and made use of some other words of no more definite meaning.

The Chairman left all the facts to the jury as evidence from which they might infer that the prisoner had had possession of the bag, and directed them, if they found so, to treat the case as one of recent possession.

Held, that the Chairman's ruling was wrong, and that he ought to have directed an acquittal.

At the General Quarter Sessions of the peace for the county of Denbigh, holden at Denbigh on the 11th day of April 1878, the prisoner was indicted for stealing a bag containing a number of articles, the property of one David Vaughan.

It was proved at the trial that a few minutes before the bag was missed, which was about 10 p.m. on Saturday the 12th Jan, the prisoner and two other men, named Thomas Bagnall and William Bagnall, were near a wall by the road side on which it had been placed by the prosecutor's wife while she went into a shop close by, but none of the three men were seen in possession of the bag at that or any other time.

The prisoner passed the wall, where the bag was placed, on his way home, and shortly afterwards William Bagnall followed him in the same direction.

After passing the prisoner's cottage, William Bagnall, and the prosecutor, David Vaughan, met the prisoner coming back to his cottage from the opposite direction. When questioned, the prisoner denied all knowledge of the bag, and stated that he had been into a neighbouring wood to fetch firewood.

It was proved on cross-examination that the owner of this wood allowed his workpeople to collect firewood for their own use there, and also that the prisoner had formerly worked for him, but was not doing so at the time in question.

William Bagnall and the prosecutor David Vaughan, in company with the prisoner, searched the wood, the prisoner's cottage, and some disused farm buildings at the back of his cottage for the bag, which could not be found.

On the Monday following the bag was, however, found by the police constable in an old hayloft, one of the disused farm buildings mentioned above.

These disused buildings, including the hayloft, belonged to an adjoining farm in the occupation of a person of the name of Griffith, and were not connected with the prisoner's cottage or garden otherwise than that he, as well as others, had access to them. The hayloft had no door, and was near the high road.

The prisoner was a farm labourer, and had worked in the neighbourhood all his life, but there was no evidence of his having worked for the aforesaid Griffith or on his farm.

When the bag was found the constable took the prisoner to the police station at Ruabon, a distance of between four and five miles. On their way there the prisoner, having previously denied to the constable that he had committed the robbery, said, "Well, it's no use, I suppose. I suppose I shall get a month for this. What do you think?" He added, "Some people get more than others," and afterwards said, "It's very odd; people get transported, and when they come back they begin the same things again."

I told the jury that in a case of larceny, after proving that the goods were stolen, proof that they were found in the possession, or under the control of the prisoner shortly afterwards, and that he did not give a satisfactory account of the manner in which he came by them, is good presumptive evidence of the prisoner having stolen them. I directed the jury to apply this rule to the present case, and to take the evidence and the whole of the circumstances, together with the prisoner's statements into their consideration, and say whether he was guilty or not guilty of the offence charged against him.

The counsel for the prisoner took exception to this direction on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury to show that the bag was ever in the possession or under the control of the prisoner, so as to raise a presumption of his guilt from his not giving any account of it.

I declined to alter my direction to the jury, being of opinion that, under all the circumstances, there was evidence sufficient to justify my direction, and the application of the above rule so as to raise a presumption of the prisoner's guilt.

The jury found him guilty, and he was admitted to bail to appear to receive judgment at the quarter sessions of the peace to be holden for the county of Denbigh when called upon.

The opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved is requested whether there was any evidence which ought to have been left to the jury that the bag had been in the possession or under the control of the prisoner, so as to make the aforesaid rule applicable to this case.

If the Court should be of opinion that there was any such evidence for the jury, the conviction to stand; if of a contrary opinion, to be quashed.

THOMAS HUGHES, Chairman.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

KELLY, C.B.—The question reserved for our decision is whether there was any evidence which ought to have been left to the jury that the bag had been in the possession of the prisoner, or under the control of the prisoner, so as to make the rule alluded to applicable to this case. We can find no evidence that the bag had been in the possession of the prisoner or under his control; and therefore the conviction must be quashed.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the case had been left in a different way to the jury there might have been something for them to consider, viz., the statements made by the prisoner to the police constable. But with respect to the direction of the chairman, that the jury might proceed to consider the case on the basis of the doctrine of recent possession, there was no evidence at all of any possession by the prisoner. The jury must, therefore, have been misled, and the conviction cannot be sustained.

Conviction quashed.

REG. v. ORTON AND OTHERS. (a)

Prize fight—Combatants with gloves on—Sparring match.

Divers persons assembled in a room, entrance money being paid, to witness a fight between two persons. The combatants fought in a ring with gloves, each being attended by a second, who acted in the same way as at prize fights. The combatants fought for about forty minutes with great ferocity, and severely punished each other. The police interfered and arrested the defendants, who were among the spectators.

Upon the trial of an indictment against them for unlawfully assembling together for the purpose of a prize fight, the chairman directed the jury that, if it was a mere exhibition of skill in sparring, it was not illegal; but, if the parties met intending to fight till one gave in from exhaustion or injury received, it was a breach of the law and a prize fight, whether the combatants fought in gloves or not, and left it to the jury to say whether it was a prize fight or not.

Held, that the jury were properly directed.

The following case was reserved by Sir Frederick Thomas Fowke, Bart., Chairman of the General Quarter Sessions of the peace for the county of Leicester:

John Orton, William Burrows, Alfred Greenfield, Henry Wilkinson, Charles Orton, George Orton, James Westerman, Edward Bodycott, William Cave, Thomas Hall, George Hardy, Henry Stokes, Joseph Collins (alias Tug Wilson), and William Henry Neale were tried before me at the General Quarter Sessions of the peace for the county of Leicester, held on the 15th Oct. 1878, for assembling together for the purpose of a prize fight.

The indictment contained six other counts, three of them for assaulting police constables in the execution of their duty, and three other counts for common assaults on the same constables.

It was given in evidence that the defendants had assembled, together with others to the number of a hundred and upwards, in a room in a vacant building which they had taken possession of without the consent of the owner; that one shilling entrance was charged to each person; that then the door was barricaded to prevent access by the police or any other person; that the two defendants Orton and Burrows were the combatants, each was stripped to the waist, a space roped in for a ring, and each combatant was attended by his second, on whose knee he sat in the intervals during the fight, and was sponged and fanned by him after the usual custom in prize fights.

It was proved by an eye-witness that the men fought with great ferocity, in the words of this witness, "like bulldogs;" that each was severely punished, and that the fight had lasted for nearly forty minutes when the police came up, brought there by information of what was going on, and by a large and disorderly crowd who had assembled on the road outside the building attracted by what was going forward.

[AMER. REPS.]

The police, after great resistance, during which the assaults before mentioned were committed, forced an entrance into the room through the windows, when those present attempted to escape in any way they could, by door or window. The two combatants and the other twelve defendants were, however, arrested.

It was found that each combatant was severely punished, and one of them had his ear bitten through. They were highly exasperated with each other, each calling the other a coward, and taunting each other with unfair fighting so much that even after they were arrested and in the custody of the police, they were with difficulty prevented from closing with each other and renewing the fight.

The fight was for money, and one of the defendants told the policeman who had him in charge, "You have done me out of 7l."

The learned counsel for the defence contended that this was a sparring match fought in gloves, according to well-known rules, and, on the authority of the case of Reg. v. Young (10 Cox Crim. Cas. 371) (a) was no offence at law.

I directed the jury that this was a correct definition of the law, if it were a mere exhibition of skill in sparring; but that, if the parties met intending to fight till one gave in from exhaustion or injury received, it was a breach of the law and a prize fight, whether the combatants fought in gloves or not, and I left this question to the jury: "Was this a sparring match or a prize fight?"

The jury had the gloves used in the fight before them, and retired to consider their verdict, and on their return they found that it was a prize fight, and that the prisoners were guilty.

They also found the defendants Collins, Westerman, and Bodycott guilty of assaulting the police in the execution of their duty.

The learned counsel contended that I was wrong in leaving the question to the jury whether or not it was a prize fight; that, as the men fought in gloves, I ought to have directed the jury that it was therefore a mere sparring match, and no indictable offence.

I respited the sentence, releasing the defendants on bail for their appearance to receive and abide by the sentence of the Court at the next Epiphany sessions if the Court be of opinion that I was right in thus leaving the case to the jury.

The case is, whether the question "Was this a prize fight or not?" was rightly left to the jury; or was the fact that the fight was with gloves sufficient to prevent the same being an indictable offence?

FREDK. THOS. FOWKE, Chairman.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

KELLY, C.B.—The question in this case is, whether the prisoners were guilty of the offence of unlawfully assembling together for the purpose of prize fighting. The jury found that this was a prize fight. No doubt the combatants wore gloves; but that did not prevent them from severely punishing each other. There can be no doubt that, upon the facts, the conviction ought to be affirmed.

(a) Reg. v. Young was tried before Bramwell, B. at the Central Criminal Court, and the marginal note is this: "There is nothing unlawful in a sparring exhibition unless the men fight on until they are so weak that a dangerous fall is likely to be the result of the continuance of the game. Therefore, except in the latter case, death caused by an injury received during a sparring match does not amount to manslaughter."

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The jury examined the gloves in their private room, and, having the fact proved that the combatants severely mauled each other, they found rightly that this was a prize fight. The question was entirely one for the jury.

LINDLEY, MANISTY, and HAWKINS, J.J. concurred.

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

COMMONWEALTH v. HAWES.

Extradition—Trial for another offence.

Under the extradition treaty of 1842 with Great Britain, a person surrendered to the United States by virtue of its provisions cannot be tried upon a charge different from that for which he was extradited; and for which his surrender could not have been demanded.

EXTRADITION.

Smith N. Hawes stood indicted in the Kenton Criminal Court for uttering forged paper, for embezzlement, and upon four several charges of forgery. He was found to be a resident of London, Canada, and in Feb. 1877 was demanded by the United States and surrendered by the Canadian authorities, to answer three of the said charges of forgery. He was tried upon two of the indictments for forgery, the other two being dismissed, and was acquitted. He was held in custody, however, to answer the charges of embezzlement, &c., and in August 1877, he moved upon affidavit to be released from custody.

The Court (Jackson, J.) ordered that the cases of The Commonwealth against Hawes for embezzlement, &c., be continued, and the prisoner released from custody. The Commonwealth appealed.

Moss (Attorney-General) and W. W. Cleary, for appellant.

J. O. Carlisle and J. W. Stevenson, for appellee.

LINDSAY, C.J. (after stating the facts).—It was the opinion of the learned judge who presided in the court below, that the tenth article of the treaty of 1842 impliedly prohibited the Government of the United States and the Commonwealth of Kentucky from proceeding to try Hawes for any other offence than one of those for which he had been extradited, without first affording him an opportunity to return to Canada, and that he could not be lawfully held in custody to answer a charge for which he could not be put upon trial. A public treaty is not merely a compact or bargain to be carried out by the executive and legislative departments of the general government, but a living law, operating upon and binding the judicial tribunals, state and federal, and these tribunals are under the same obligation to notice and give it effect as they are to notice and enforce the Constitution, and the laws of Congress made in pursuance thereof: (Fed. Cons. sect. 2 Art. 6; 2 Pet. 253, per Marshall, C.J.) When it is provided by treaty that certain Acts shall not be done, or that certain limitations or restrictions shall not be disregarded or exceeded by the contracting parties the compact does not need to be supplemented by legislative or executive action, to authorise the courts of justice to decline to override these limitations, or to exceed the prescribed restrictions, for the palpable and all sufficient reason, that to do so would be, not only to violate the public faith, but to transgress the "supreme law of the land." The tenth article of the treaty of 1842 is as follows: "It is agreed that the United States and Her Britannic Majesty shall, upon mutual requisitions by them, or their ministers, officers, or authorities, respectively made, deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with the crime of murder, or assault with intent to commit murder, or piracy, or arson, or robbery, or forgery, or the utterance of forged paper, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum, or shall be found within the territories of the other: Provided, that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime or offence had there been committed," &c. Public treaties are to be fairly interpreted, and the intention of the contracting parties to be ascertained by the application of the same rules of construction and the same course of reasoning which we apply to the interpretation of private contracts. By the enumeration of seven well-defined crimes for which extradition may be had, the parties plainly excluded the idea that demand might be made as matter of right for the surrender of a fugitive charged with an offence not named in the enumeration, no matter how revolting or wicked it may be. By providing the terms and conditions upon which a warrant for the arrest of the alleged fugitive may be issued, and confining the duty of making the surrender to cases in which the evidence of criminality is sufficient, according to the laws of the place where such fugitive is found, to justify his commitment for trial, the right of the demanding government to decide finally as to the propriety of the demand, and as to the evidences of guilt, is as plainly excluded as if that right had been denied by express language. The precise purpose for which the fugitive is to be surrendered is set out in exact and apt language, and the Act negatives, by necessary implication, the right here claimed, that the person surrendered may be tried for an offence different from that for which he was extradited, and one for which his surrender could not have been demanded. The right of one government to demand and receive from another the custody of an offender who has sought asylum upon its soil, depends upon the existence of treaty stipulations between them, and in all cases is derived from, and is measured and restricted by, the provisions, express and implied, of the treaty. The rule as stated by Mr. Lawrence is: "All the right which a power asking an extradition can possibly derive from the surrender must be what is expressed in the treaty, and all rules of interpretation require the treaty to be strictly construed; and, consequently, when the treaty prescribes the offences for which extradition can be made, and the particular testimony to be required, the sufficiency of which must be certified to the executive authority of the extraditing country, the state receiving the fugitive has no jurisdiction whatever over him, except for the specified crime to which the testimony applies." This is the philosophy of the rule prevailing in France. The French Minister of Justice, in his circular of April 15, 1841, said: "The extradition declares the offence which leads to it, and this offence alone ought to be inquired into." The rule as stated by the German author Heffter is, that "The individual whose extradition has been granted cannot be prosecuted nor tried for any crime except that for which the extradition has been obtained. To act in any other way, and to cause him to be tried for other crimes or misdemeanors, would be to violate the mutual principle of asylum, and the silent clause contained by implication in every extradition." And when President Tyler expressed the opinion that the treaty of 1842 could not be used to secure the trial and punishment of persons charged with treason, libels, desertion from military service, and other like offences, and when the British Parliament in 1843, and the American Congress in 1848, assumed to provide that the persons extradited by their respective Governments should be surrendered "to be tried for the crime of which such person shall be so accused," this dominant principle of modern extradition was both recognised and acted upon. This construction of the tenth article of the treaty is consistent with its language and provisions, and is not only in harmony with the opinions and modern practice of the most enlightened nations of Europe, and just and proper in its application, but necessary to render it absolutely certain that the treaty cannot be converted into an instrument by which to obtain the custody and secure the punishment of political offenders. Hawes placed himself under the guardianship of the British laws by becoming an inhabitant of Canada. We took him from the protection of those laws under a special agreement, and for certain named and designated purposes. To continue him in custody after the accomplishment of those purposes, and with the object of extending the criminal jurisdiction of our courts beyond the terms of the special agreement, would be a plain violation of the faith of the transaction, and a manifest disregard of the conditions of the extradition. He is not entitled to personal immunity in consequence of his flight. We may yet try him under each and all of the indictments for embezzlement, and for uttering forged paper, if he comes voluntarily within the jurisdiction of our laws, or if we can reach him through the extradition clause of the Federal Constitution, or through the comity of a foreign Government. But we had no right to add to, or enlarge the conditions and lawful consequences of his extradition, nor to extend our special and limited right to hold him in custody to answer the three charges of forgery, for the purpose of trying him for offences other than those for which he was extradited. We conclude that the court below correctly refused to try Hawes for any of the offences for which he stood indicted, except for the three charges of forgery mentioned in the warrant of extradition, and that it properly discharged him from custody.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

SANDYS (app.) v. SMALL (resp.) (a)

*Adulteration—Mixture of water with spirit—
Notice—38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, ss. 6 and 8.*

The appellant, an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, by an agent purchased from the respondent, a licensed victualler, a half-pint of whisky, which was found, when analysed, to be thirty degrees under proof. A notice, printed in large characters, to the effect that all spirits sold there were mixed, and citing this statute, was conspicuous where this whisky was sold, although it was not found as a fact that the appellant's agent saw it before he made the purchase. No label was affixed to the bottle in which the spirit was received, nor was there anything said about the mixture of water with the spirit. The justices refused to convict the respondent under sects. 6 and 8 of the Act.

Held, upon a case stated, that the respondent had sufficiently supplied to the person receiving this article, which was not intended fraudulently to conceal its inferior quality, a notice by a label distinctly and legibly written or printed on or with the article, to the effect that the same was mixed, within the meaning of sect. 8; and that the justices were right.

This was a case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, the parts of which, material to the judgment of the court, were as follows:

The appellant was an inspector of weights and measures of the county of Derby, charged with the execution of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), and in such capacity had laid an information against the respondent for an offence under the 6th section of that Act. The justices dismissed the information.

The respondent was a licensed victualler at Langley Mill, in the township of Heanor, in the county of Derby. The appellant and one Samuel Slack, his assistant, were together in the performance of their duties under the Act near the house of the respondent on the 13th March last. Slack, acting under the appellant's directions, went into the house and stood at the bar window, and there asked the respondent's wife for half a pint of whisky. The respondent's wife gave him half a pint of whisky, for which he paid, placing it in a bottle, which was produced by Slack, without making any observation as to its quality or putting a label on the bottle. It was admitted by the appellant that, on subsequently going into the house, he saw posted in the smoke-room a notice as follows: "All spirits sold here are mixed—38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, ss. 8 and 9." The said Samuel Slack denied seeing any notice at the moment when he bought the whisky, although it was proved that a similar notice was posted in full view of persons purchasing at the bar window.

It was proved on behalf of the respondent that the notice referred to was printed in large capital letters, and was placed in a conspicuous position in the smoke-room; and it was also proved that similar notices were conspicuously placed in the bar and in every other room in the house ordinarily used by the respondent for the purpose of his business. The whisky when analysed proved to be mixed with water, and thirty degrees under proof.

It was contended, on behalf of the respondent, that the posting of the notice referred to in the smoke-room and bar, and within view of persons purchasing at the bar window, was equivalent to a declaration on the part of the respondent to the purchaser that the whisky sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser.

The appellant contended that the respondent should have placed a label on the bottle in which the whisky was put, in accordance with sect. 8 of the Act.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the posting of the notice as aforesaid was equivalent to a declaration by the respondent that the whisky sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, and relieved him from the penalty.

By the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63),

Sect. 6. No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, provided that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section in the following cases; that is to say,

1. Where any matter or ingredient not injurious to health has been added to the food or drug because the same is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce, in a state fit for carriage or consumption, and not fraudulently to increase the bulk, weight, or measure of the food or drug, or conceal the inferior quality thereof.

2. Where the drug or food is a proprietary medicine, or is the subject of a patent in force, and is supplied in the state required by the specification of the patent.

3. Where the food or drug is compounded as in this Act mentioned.

4. Where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation.

By sect. 8:

Provided that no person shall be guilty of any such offence as aforesaid in respect of the sale of an article of food or a drug mixed with any matter or ingredient not injurious to health, and not intended fraudulently to increase its bulk, weight, or measure or conceal its inferior quality, if at the time of delivering such article or drug he shall supply to the person receiving the same a notice by a label distinctly and legibly written or printed on or with the article or drug to the effect that the same is mixed.

A. Wills, Q.C. argued for the appellant.—These provisions of the Act might be rendered of no effect if an exemption be granted in any case besides that of a label supplied in the terms of the 8th section. The case does not even find that the purchaser had seen the notice at the time he made the purchase.

Mellor, Q.C. for the respondent.—From the facts stated the purchaser must be presumed to have knowledge that the article he bought was mixed. The Act could only have been pointed against fraud, of which there is no evidence here.

Wills, Q.C. in reply.

Q.B. Div.]

BEW (app.) v. HARSTON (resp.)

[Q.B. Div.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the respondent. I should be very sorry to diminish the efficacy of a very useful Act of Parliament which was intended to protect the public from frauds committed by the sellers of the articles to which the Act relates; but we ought, if possible, to construe the words of the Act so as not to interfere with due freedom of dealing between the seller and the purchaser, and not unfairly to prejudice either party. I think we should be doing this if we held that its provisions apply to cases such as the present, where both parties perfectly well knew what they are dealing with. The provisions of the Act were intended to apply to adulterations of a clandestine character, which operate to the prejudice of the purchaser. The provisions of the 6th section seem to me to apply to cases where a seller professes to sell to the purchaser an article as being of a certain denomination, whereas the article has been altered by an admixture of some other ingredients, and it seems that when the article is so altered, this must be considered to have been done "to the prejudice of the purchaser," unless it is duly and sufficiently brought to his knowledge; but if the alteration of the article, as of spirits by the admixture of water, is brought to the knowledge of the purchaser, and he chooses to purchase it notwithstanding, it can never be intended that such a transaction should be interfered with. But, on the other hand, if the seller chooses to sell an article of a certain denomination, and the article is really mixed with foreign ingredients, it lies on him to show that the purchaser knew what he was purchasing. The statute in the 8th section provides a mode by which the seller may insure himself protection against the possibility of the enactment operating to his prejudice. If he delivers the label as provided by that section, he protects himself against all possibility of being charged with an offence under the Act. If he does not, then I think it incumbent on him to prove that by some other means (with regard to which he will be subject to be met by counter-proof) that the purchaser had notice what he was purchasing. If the seller can show that he had such notice, then I think no offence will be committed, because the sale will not be "to the prejudice of the purchaser." I do not think that the statute means that the affixing of the label is to be the only mode of bringing knowledge home to the purchaser. I think, for instance, if a man put up in a conspicuous position a notice in large letters, as was done here, and it is clear that it must have come under the observation of the customer, that the 6th section would not apply. It has been suggested that it was not clear in the present case that the purchaser had seen the notice when he had purchased the whisky, and that the case should go back that the facts may be stated more distinctly as to this. It is found that notices were posted up in all the rooms of the house in conspicuous places, so that customers could not fail to see them. We are clear that under the circumstances there was no real offence against the provisions of the 6th section, and, that being so, it seems to us that we should deal with the case as it stands, and that we ought not to send the case back for the purpose of giving an opportunity of proving that the particular individual who bought the whisky for the purpose of this prosecution had not seen the notice. On the case as it stands, we think that our judgment must be for the respondent.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statement of the facts is not very distinct as to whether the purchaser had an intimation by means of the notice that he was purchasing a mixture. It is left to us to draw the inference whether that was so or not, and, from the facts stated, I should rather infer that, though the purchaser may not have seen the notice at the exact moment when he asked for the whisky, yet that he might well have seen it directly afterwards, and before the transaction was completed by the payment of the money and his receipt of the article. With regard to the construction of the statute, I agree with my Lord that no offence was committed under the 6th section.

BEW (app.) v. HARSTON (resp.) (a)

Gaming—Play for money's worth—Licensed premises—35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 17.

The appellant, a licensed person, bought some rabbits as prizes for a game called puff and dart, in which the players attempted to hit a target by blowing a dart through a tube. Each player subscribed for the value of the rabbits and the winner was the person who made the best hits. The appellant was convicted under sect. 17 of the Licensing Act 1872 of suffering gaming or an unlawful game to be carried on on his premises. Held, upon a case stated (Cockburn, C.J. doubting), that the conviction was right.

THIS was a case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the district of the borough of Stoke-on-Trent, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The appellant was convicted upon the hearing of an information preferred by the respondent, the superintendent of police at Tunstall, in the county of Stafford, under sect. 17 of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), "that on the 1st March 1878, at the parish of Wolverstan in the said county, the appellant did unlawfully suffer gaming to be carried on on his licensed premises contrary to the statute."

The following facts were proved and admitted:

That on the said 1st March 1878, a policeman entered the licensed premises of the appellant at Tunstall in the evening, and there found a number of men, one of whom, named Joseph Simpson, was in the act of loading an instrument used in playing at a game called "puff and dart," Simpson at the same time saying, "It takes so many to win." The constable saw Simpson blow twice, and the latter then said, "I have won;" the appellant thereupon handed him a dead rabbit from behind the counter, which Simpson put into his pocket. The appellant said he had bought two rabbits, and nine had entered for each rabbit upon paying an entrance fee of 2d. each, and it had never been considered gambling. He also then and there produced a paper containing the names of the parties who had entered for the contest, the object in the game being to hit a mark on a target with a small dart blown through a tube.

The question for the court was, whether the appellant was rightly convicted.

J. F. Clerk argued for the appellant. — The "gaming" which is forbidden in the Licensing Act 1872 is not defined in that or any of the other Licensing Acts. This appears to be a game of skill as much as billiards or pool; and, not being dependant upon chance, is no more forbidden to be played for money than either of those games. The previous statutes are pointed only at games of chance, and if it were intended to render licensed victuallers liable to conviction for anything beyond the earlier legislation, the Licensing Acts should more particularly describe the forbidden games. 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 11, relates only to a "common house, alley, or place of dicing table or carding, or any other manner of game prohibited by any estatute heretofore made, or any unlawful new game hereafter to be invented, found, had, or made;" and the subsequent enactments do not touch games of skill: (16 Car. 2, c. 7; 9 Anne, c. 14; 13 Geo. 2, c. 34; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109.) Foot v. Baker (5 M. & G. 335) leaves this question undecided with respect to skittles. And the game of dominoes was held to be not unlawful in Reg. v. Ashton (1 E. & B. 286).

The respondent did not appear.

July 2.—MELLOR, J.—The statute makes it a penal offence if any licensed person suffers gaming to be carried on on the licensed premises, and the question for us is, whether the appellant was guilty of this offence. I think myself that he was rightly convicted. It seems to me that the case falls within the authority of Reg. v. Ashton (1 E. & B. 286). Lord Campbell there says: "The object of the statute was to prevent the contracting of bad habits by the practice of games where money was staked in public-houses. If money were staked, that would be gaming; and then there might be a lawful conviction for allowing gaming in the house." Here money was not in one sense staked on the game, but each man paid his 2d. for the chance of winning the rabbit. It comes to the same thing in principle. I think it was gaming within the meaning of the Act, which seems to me to have been intended to prevent the contracting of bad habits by the practice of such games in public-houses.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I entertain serious doubts whether the view taken by the magistrate, and with which my learned brother Mellor agrees, is correct. The Act speaks of gaming and unlawful games. Now this game does not come within the expression "unlawful games," for the expression refers to the games from time to time made unlawful by statute, of which this is not one. I am inclined to think that the term "gaming" implies something which in its nature depends on chance, or in which chance is an element. This game does not appear to be one of chance, but of skill, though the skill may not be of a very lofty character. The result of my differing from the conclusion of my brother Mellor would be that the conviction would stand. I do not wish to be taken as expressing a very decided opinion as to whether a game of this description comes within the term "gaming." All I desire to say is, that I very much doubt whether it does. I do not regret the result, for I think that the game was within the mischief the statute meant to guard against. In the result, therefore, the conviction must stand.

Conviction affirmed.

Re TURMINE, (a)

School board—Six months' absence—Disqualification—Re-election—33 & 34 Vict. c. 75, 2nd schedule, 1st part, ss. 12 and 14.

A member of a school board absented himself during six successive months from all meetings of the board, and the cause assigned by him was not approved by the board. He ceased, therefore, to be a member of the board, in pursuance of the Elementary Education Act 1870, second schedule, first part, s. 14. He was, however, re-elected a member at the next election of the whole board.

Held, upon a rule for quo warranto, that he was not, by having so ceased to be a member of the previous board, disqualified from sitting in the new board, under sect. 12 of the said schedule.

ON the 8th June a rule nisi was obtained on behalf of Mr. Henry Jacobs, calling upon Mr. Edward Charles Turmine to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be exhibited against him to show by what authority he claimed to exercise the office of a member of the school board for the parish of Minster, in the Isle of Sheppy, in the county of Kent, upon the grounds that he was on the 29th Dec. 1877, and ever since had been and then was, disqualified for election to the said office, and was not eligible for election thereto by reason of his having, therefore, ceased to be a member of the said school board in consequence of having absented himself during six successive months from all meetings of the said school board, he not being prevented by temporary illness, nor any other lawful cause approved by the said board.

It appeared from the affidavits that in Dec. 1874, by the authority of the Education Department, nine persons—one of whom was the defendant Edward Charles Turmine—were duly elected members of the first school board for the said parish of Minster.

After attending the first three meetings, the last of which was on the 24th Feb. 1875, the defendant absented himself for some time because he considered that the majority of the board had appointed a clerk in contravention of the law on the subject. He however announced his intention of being present at a meeting once in six months, for the purpose of retaining his seat; and he attended at the board-room on the 7th July of that year, in order to take part in the meeting of which notice had been given for that day. He was, however, detained about some other business outside the door until the meeting in his absence was adjourned until the 1st Sept. following.

At the meeting on the 1st Sept. attention was called to the defendant's absence for six months from the board meetings; and on the 15th Sept. it was resolved by the board (pursuant to notice) that the reasons assigned by him for his absence, viz., his being accidentally shut out on the 7th

Q.B. Div.] GUARDIANS OF WOODSTOCK UNION v. CHURCHWARDENS OF ST. PANCRAZ. [Q.B. Div.]

July, and (as he alleged) the improper adjournment without a meeting during August, be not approved by the board.

No steps were taken by the defendant to reverse this decision of the board; and on the 3rd Jan. 1877 the board proceeded to elect, and did elect, another member to fill the position which they considered the defendant's absence had rendered him disqualified to hold.

On the election of a new board in Dec. 1877, the first board having completed its term of three years, the defendant was returned as a member at the top of the poll of all the candidates. Since that time he had attended all the meetings of the board.

It was resolved, however, by a majority of the board to take these proceedings in order to test the validity of the defendant's election to the second board in Dec. 1877.

By the Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), 2nd schedule, part 1, Clause 12. Any person who ceases to be a member of the school board shall, unless disqualified as hereinafter mentioned, be re-eligible.

Clause 14. If a member of the school board absent himself during six successive months from all meetings of the board, except from temporary illness or other cause to be approved by the board, or is punished with imprisonment for any crime, or is adjudged bankrupt, or enters into a composition or arrangement with his creditors, such person shall cease to be a member of the school board, and his office shall thereupon be vacant.

Provision is made in clause 15 for an election to any casual vacancy in office occurring "by death, resignation, disqualification, or otherwise."

Clause 17. The member chosen to fill up a casual vacancy shall retain his office so long only as the vacating member would have retained the same if no vacancy had occurred.

By the 3rd schedule, clause 1 (b),

Not less than one ordinary meeting shall be held in each month; one meeting shall be held as soon as possible after every triennial election of members.

By the Elementary Education Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 86) 3rd schedule,

The following regulations shall be construed as part of the conditions mentioned in rule 1 in the 3rd schedule to the principal Act, that is to say, (b) Not less than one ordinary meeting shall be held in each month; but where the board ordinarily meet more than once in every month, they may by resolution passed by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members present, and voting on the question, resolve not to have an ordinary meeting in the months of August and September, or one of such months.

Winch, for defendant, showed cause against the rule.—As there is nothing in the affidavits to show that the adjournment over August, without a meeting in that month, was by a two-thirds majority, nor that the board had ordinarily met more than once a month, it must be taken that the board had disobeyed the rules by not holding a meeting in August. The defendant's absence, therefore, cannot be properly ascribed to any fault of his, and is not sufficient to establish a breach of the 14th clause, even if the cause thereof were not approved by the board. Moreover, it never could have been intended to disqualify a person for ever from sitting at a school board, notwithstanding re-election, because he once absented himself for six months. The words of clauses 12 and 14 do not bear out any such construction: the exception "unless disqualified as hereinafter mentioned" seems to apply to nothing there mentioned, but certainly not to the mere creation of a vacancy. Clause 17 seems to point to the possible ineligibility of a person being re-appointed to his own vacancy; but there is nothing which can be interpreted to annul a subsequent election on the ground of the elected person having vacated his office in a previous board.

Kemp, Q.C. and Scott supported the rule.—The words "unless disqualified as hereinafter mentioned" in clause 12 must have some meaning, and they can only apply to the various grounds in clause 14 for vacating an office. All other persons are re-eligible; and it must follow that those who are thus disqualified cannot be subsequently elected. The remedy provided for this disqualification is an approval of the cause of absence by the board: the hardship thereupon is not so great as if the disqualification were absolute, which is the case with the other matters mentioned in clause 14.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this rule must be discharged. The language of these clauses is ambiguous, but the applicants here are on the horns of a dilemma. Clause 12 intends to allude to some disqualification, or there is none to which it can allude. Even if some disqualification exist, it cannot possibly be one of those matters which merely create a vacancy. It cannot be that six months' absence from board meetings, even without acceptance of the excuse by the board, should disqualify a man for life from being re-elected. It may be, as suggested, that a man cannot be immediately re-appointed to the vacancy he himself has made. But the fact of a vacancy having been so made cannot interfere with the future proceedings of the electors after the termination of that board's existence. This seems to me the true and rational construction. If it be not the right one, the alternative is that the exception to clause 12 is a defective piece of legislation without any meaning or effect at all.

MELLOR, J.—I also think upon the whole that there can be no other conclusion. The suggested remedy by approval of the board is cumbersome, and we ought to hesitate before disqualifying a man for life because he fails to obtain it. The words in clause 12, "Any person who ceases to be a member," are exactly satisfied by the words in clause 14, and may imply that the person must so cease for the residue of his elected term: unless disqualified, such a person is re-eligible. Whether the disqualification may be found elsewhere or not, the words of clause 14 are not sufficient to create one. I have felt some hesitation about the matter, but I agree with my Lord.

settlement of her own, has himself only a derivative settlement, the pauper has a settlement at her own and not her father's birthplace.

E. T., a pauper, who had acquired no settlement of her own after attaining the age of sixteen, was adjudged to be settled in the respondents' parish, in which she was born. Her father had a derivative settlement at M., but was born at D.

Held, that, in accordance with sect. 35 of the Divided Parishes Act 1876, the pauper's settlement was rightly adjudged to be in respondents' parish.

THIS was an appeal against the following order of Quarter Sessions :

'At the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, holden in and for the county of Middlesex, on the 19th Jan. 1878, an appeal against an order, dated the 12th June 1877, under the hands and seals of two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county of Middlesex, adjudging the last legal settlement of Emily Taylor, aged eighteen, to be in the parish of Deddington, in the Woodstock Poor Law Union, in the county of Oxford, and ordering the removal of the said Emily Taylor from the parish of St. Pancras to the said union, came on to be heard. . . . And the said Court of Quarter Sessions allowed the said appeal, and quashed the said order of justices subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

The question now came before the court on the following

SPECIAL CASE.

1. Emily Taylor, the pauper, became chargeable to the said parish of St. Pancras, and was, on the 12th June 1877, by an order of removal in due form, adjudged to be legally settled in the parish of Deddington, in the Woodstock Poor Law Union.

2. The said Emily Taylor, the pauper, was born in the said parish of St. Pancras on the 16th April 1859, and has acquired no settlement in her own right.

3. The said Emily Taylor, the pauper, is the lawful daughter of George Taylor, and Temperance, his wife.

4. The pauper's father, George Taylor, was born in the said parish of Deddington on the 1st Jan. 1815, and acquired no settlement in his own right.

5. The pauper's father, the said George Taylor, was the lawful son of William and Martha Taylor, both deceased.

6. In the year 1829 the said William Taylor, the pauper's grandfather, acquired a settlement by serving the office of parish constable in the parish of Melton, a parish comprised in the Banbury Poor Law Union, the said George Taylor being then under the age of sixteen and unemancipated.

7. The appellants, on the hearing of the appeal, contended that this case came within the last part of sect. 35 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61; that the pauper's settlement could not be ascertained without inquiring into her father's derivative settlement, and that she must, therefore, be deemed to be settled in the parish of St. Pancras, where she was born.

8. The respondents, on the other hand, contended that the pauper derived a settlement from her father, and that, as he was born in the said parish of Deddington, that was her settlement; and that it could therefore be shown that the said parish of Deddington was her settlement, without inquiring into the derivative settlement of her parent.

9. The court of quarter sessions was of opinion that the appellants' contention was correct, and therefore quashed the said order of removal.

10. The question for the opinion of this honourable court is, therefore, whether the settlement of the pauper is in the parish of Deddington.

11. If this court shall answer the question in the affirmative, the order of sessions is to be quashed and the order of removal confirmed; but if in the negative, the said order of sessions is to be confirmed.

P. H. EDLIN.

It is enacted by sect. 35 of the Divided Parishes Act 1876, that

No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother as the case may be up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another. . . . If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or, being a female, shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born.

Bealey for the appellants.—Up to the passing of the Act of 1876 birth settlement was only a presumptive one. If it was possible to discover any other settlement, that presumption was at once destroyed. Here the father had no settlement in his own right, but he derived one from his father who was settled in Melton. If this Act had not been passed Emily Taylor would have had a settlement in Melton. When we inquire into her father's settlement we find it a derivative one, the exact state of things contemplated by sect. 35. The order of sessions was therefore right.

Poland and Lumley for the respondents.—The Legislature has now for the first time given a child a different settlement to her father; it is conceded that the child is not settled in Melton—she must be settled either at her own or her father's birthplace. The object of the section was to prevent going back more than one generation. Here the father has a prima facie settlement in Deddington; to negative that it would be necessary to inquire into the father's derivative settlement, the difficulty the Legislature has sought to avoid; true, a man cannot have two settlements, but a birth-settlement always exists potentially:

Reg. v. All Saints, Derby, 14 Q.B. 207; 14 L. T. Rep. O. S. 152.

The pauper's settlement is therefore in Deddington where her father was born.

MELLOR, J.—As the case is stated, Mr. Poland and Mr. Lumley cannot get a decision in their favour unless we are of opinion that the pauper's settlement was in Deddington. But we cannot say that she was settled in Deddington. Her father, it is true, had a prima facie birth settlement there; but the case finds that he had an actual settlement in Melton derived from his father, and when I look at the words of this section of the Act of Parliament, I am clearly of opinion that the pauper's settlement is not in EARL MANVERS AND ANOTHER v. BARTHOLOMEW.

Deddington, but is in St. Pancras. The object of the statute probably was to do as little violence as possible to the ties of relationship by separating father from child; but though that may be so, I think there can be no doubt in this case, and under the circumstances here stated, that the pauper's settlement is at the place of her birth.

FIELD, J.—The judgment of the court of quarter sessions is right, and must be affirmed. The object of the statute was to get rid of derivative settlements altogether. The words are, "No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise." But to that general rule it makes two exceptions, "except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father . . . and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another." Therefore, if the statute had stopped there, the pauper in this case would have taken her father's settlement. In ascertaining that, you find that his birth settlement would be in Deddington, but a birth settlement is only a prima facie one, and he may have acquired a settlement elsewhere, and how is that settlement to be ascertained except by making inquiries? and if, in making such inquiries, "it cannot be shown what settlement such child derived from her parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent," then it is enacted, not that she is to take her father's birth settlement, which might have been more in accordance with the policy of the Act, but she is to be "deemed to be settled in the parish in which she was born." The contention of the respondents cannot hold good against the plain words of the statute, so we are bound to hold that the sessions were right.

Order of sessions affirmed.

EARL MANVERS AND ANOTHER v. BARTHOLOMEW. (a)

Highways—Surveyor—Repairs—Licence to get materials from private property—Duration of licence—Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), ss. 53 and 54.

The licence granted by justices to the surveyor to get materials from inclosed lands for the repair of the highways, in accordance with sect. 54 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, is limited to the necessities of that particular occasion in respect of which the application for the licence is made.

Justices in special sessions, under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 54, granted in 1866 to the then surveyor of highways a licence to take materials for the repairs of the highways from certain lands in the parish of which plaintiffs were the owner and occupier respectively. Materials had been got under that licence down to 1877, when the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendant, the present surveyor, not to get any more. The defendant continued to do so nevertheless, and plaintiffs now brought an action of trespass against him.

(a) Reported by A. H. POTTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that defendant had no right to enter upon plaintiffs' land, inasmuch as the licence granted by the justices only extended to the necessities of the particular occasion in respect of which it was granted.

THIS was a special case stated pursuant to the provisions of Order XXXIV., r. 1, as follows:

1. The plaintiff Browne was, at the times hereinafter referred to, and is, a farmer, possessed of and occupying a farm in the parish of Langton-by-Wragby, in the county of Lincoln, as tenant thereof to the plaintiff Lord Manvers, who then was and is the owner thereof; and the defendant was, during the year 1877, and now is, the surveyor of highways for the said parish.

2. In 1866, materials being required for the repair of the highways in the said parish, the then surveyor of highways (not the defendant), pursuant to the provisions of the General Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 53, gave notice to the plaintiffs, as the owner and occupier respectively of the said farm, requiring them to appear before justices at special sessions to show cause why materials for the repair of the said highways should not be had from a field forming part of the said farm, and which field was then and is inclosed land within the meaning of the said Act and of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 51.

3. No opposition being offered to the application made in pursuance of such notice, the justices in special sessions assembled granted their licence, under sect. 54 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, to the said surveyor, authorising him to dig, get, take, and carry from the said field materials for the purposes aforesaid, making satisfaction for the same and for damage done to such field in the manner directed by the said Act, and this licence was never appealed against, pursuant to the power in that behalf conferred by the 105th section of the Act. A copy of the said licence, marked "A," accompanies and forms part of this case.

4. The said surveyor accordingly dug in and carried away from the said field such materials as aforesaid, and with them repaired the highways in the said parish. The amount of satisfaction payable in respect thereof was not settled or ascertained by the justices, but the surveyor paid the plaintiffs a sum which was agreed upon between them as the amount to be paid for such materials as aforesaid.

5. In subsequent years the different surveyors of highways appointed each year for the said parish got materials for the repair of the highways in the said parish from the said field, and paid the plaintiffs from time to time sums agreed upon as the price of such materials.

6. During the years 1876-7 the plaintiff Browne was the surveyor of highways for the said parish, and he then got all the gravel which was required for the repair of the highways from the plaintiffs' field, and paid himself compensation at the same rate which had been allowed in previous years, and in fact gravel for the repair of the highways of the parish has been continuously got from the plaintiffs' land and paid for by successive surveyors since the date of the said licence up to the present time, without any objection by the plaintiffs until the year 1877, when the plaintiffs objected to any more gravel being got or taken from the said lands. The defendant contends that the said gravel has been rightly got in exercise of the powers given by the said licence; but the plaintiffs deny that the said licence had any force after the year in which it was granted.

EARL MANVERS AND ANOTHER v. BARTHOLOMEW.

7. In 1877, in consequence of the said objections raised by the plaintiffs, the defendant applied to the justices in special sessions to grant him a new licence to get materials from the said field, and the plaintiffs subsequently applied to the justices to revoke the licence hereinbefore referred to in paragraph 3. The justices declined to entertain either application—the former one on the ground that the said licence was still in force, and the latter on the ground that, as the plaintiffs had not appealed, the said licence was irrevocable.

8. Notice was therefore served by the plaintiffs upon the defendant requiring him not to trespass on or dig or carry away materials from the said field, notwithstanding which the defendant, claiming to act under the licence hereinbefore referred to, has during the year 1877 entered upon the said field, and has dug and carried away stone and other materials therefrom for the repair of the said highways, and has thereby injured the reversion of the plaintiff Earl Manvers.

9. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the licence granted to the surveyor in 1866 did not confer upon the defendant any right to enter upon the lands in question in 1877, and it is contended on behalf of the defendant that it did.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether, under the circumstances above stated, the defendant was justified in entering upon and digging and carrying away from the said land of the plaintiffs stone and other materials for the repair of the highways of the said parish.

If the court shall answer the question in the negative, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for 40s. damages.

If the court shall answer the said question in the affirmative, judgment is to be entered for the defendant.

In either case judgment is to be entered for such costs as the court shall direct, including the costs of and incidental to settling this case.

The licence referred to in paragraph 3 was in the form given in the schedule of the Act, and was signed by two justices. It recited that, whereas by the Highway Act the surveyor "is authorised to dig, get, take, and carry away materials lying upon any lands or grounds within the parish for which he is appointed, for the use and benefit of the highways . . . and whereas it appears to us that the said materials are necessary, and ought to be got, dug, taken, and carried away for the purposes aforesaid, therefore we do hereby give our licence to the said surveyor to dig, take, and carry away the same accordingly, the said surveyor making satisfaction for the same, and also for the damage done to such lands, in the manner directed by the said Act."

Sections 53 and 54 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, are as follows:

53. And be it further enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any surveyor, or any other person acting under the authority of this Act, to dig, gather, get, take, or carry away any materials for making or repairing any highway out of or from any inclosed land or ground, until one calendar month's notice in writing, signed by the surveyor, shall have been given to the owner of the premises from which such materials are intended to be taken . . . and to the occupier . . . to appear before the justices at a special sessions for the highways, to show cause why such materials should not be had therefrom; and, in case such owner, agent, or occupier shall attend pursuant to such notice, but shall not show sufficient cause to the contrary, such justices shall, if they think proper, authorise such surveyor or other person to dig, get, gather, take, and carry away such materials, at such time or times as to such justices shall seem proper; and, if such owner, agent, or occupier shall neglect or refuse to appear . . . the said justices shall and may . . . make such order therein as they shall think fit, as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes as if such owner, agent, or occupier had attended.

54. And be it further enacted, that it shall be lawful for every such surveyor, for the use aforesaid, by licence in writing from the justices at a special sessions for the highways, to search for, dig, and get materials, if sufficient cannot be had conveniently within such waste lands, common grounds, rivers, or brooks in or through any of the several or inclosed lands or grounds of any person whomsoever . . . in the parish where the same shall be wanted . . . and to take and carry away so much of the said materials as, by the discretion of the said surveyor, shall be thought necessary to be employed in the amendment of the said highways, the said surveyor making such satisfaction for the materials which may be got or taken away, and also for the damage done to such lands or grounds by the getting and carrying away the same, as shall be settled and ascertained by order of the justices at a special sessions for the highways.

Graham for plaintiffs.—The question here really is, whether a licence granted by justices under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, to the surveyor of a parish to get materials from inclosed lands is perpetual or not. The justices say they have no power to revoke such a licence; but a reasonable construction must be put upon the Act. The justices may authorise the surveyor to take materials "at such time or times as to them shall seem proper." [He was stopped by the Court.]

Lumley for defendant.—The reasonable construction of the Act is, that surveyors should be at liberty to go to one source for materials until that source is exhausted. If the words of the section are ambiguous as they appear to be here, convenience must be looked at. Someone's rights must be invaded each time materials are wanted, and fresh injury done, if my construction is not right. The Act provides compensation for damage done, and this may include prospective damage. The justices might have limited the time during which the licence should be in force, but they have not done so. The licence here is, therefore, indefinite as to time, and is in force as long as the materials upon the land in question are not exhausted.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Our decision must be in favour of Earl Manvers. The authority to get materials given by the Highway Act involves important considerations, for, beyond all question, it sanctions an interference with the rights of the subject. The Act authorises the surveyor to obtain stone, but that stone is not to be obtained at the expense of the parish, but to the loss and detriment of the individual from whom the stone is obtained. It is necessary therefore to inquire very carefully what the extent of this authority is. By the words of the section I find it is expressly stated that the justices may give the surveyor authority to take and carry away materials "at such time or times as to such justices shall seem proper." But when we turn to the form of licence given in the schedule we find that all mention of time is omitted. The section shows that it is not intended that this authority should be given once and for all, but only for such time or times as to the justices may seem proper; and I think there is abundant reason for saying that that is so. If taking stone from one man's land is a burden cast upon him for the good of the parish, he may rightly say that his neighbours should be common sufferers with himself. Mr. Lumley points out that there are clauses for compensating for damage done to the land; but it appears to me that the proper construction of the Act is that, when materials are necessary for the repair of the highways, the surveyor is to go to the justices and ask for an order authorising him to take materials from such land as he shall think fit for whatever repairs are in contemplation at the time, and the order of the justices is co-extensive with that present necessity. But their order is not applicable to a different time, when a totally different state of things may present themselves. This interpretation of the licence, that it must be pro re nata, is consistent with the full meaning and intention of the statute.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Lumley has ingeniously raised several questions as to the construction of this Act, and he has presented matters of some difficulty, but those difficulties are overcome by the balance of convenience. The words of the 54th section apply not only to streams and waste lands, but they point out the duty of the surveyor as to inclosed lands also; he is "to take and carry away so much of the said materials as by the discretion of the said surveyor shall be thought necessary." Is that clause applicable solely to waste lands and streams? I think not. I think it applies also to private grounds. He is to get the amount of materials he considers necessary for the repair of the highways, and the justices' order is applicable to repairs contemplated at the time it was granted—the order extends to the necessities of the occasion. As soon as the force of that order is spent the surveyor must apply for a further order, and in the case of a private owner the justices should consider whether it is reasonable to get the amount of material required from that particular place. I cannot say it would be necessary to get a new order year by year, but I am of opinion that each order must be limited by the necessities of the repairs in prospect when the order is granted. The particular question submitted to us in the special case must be answered in favour of the plaintiffs.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF OVER DARWEN. (a)

Intoxicating liquors—Certificate for a licence—Sufficient notice—Beer to be consumed off the premises—32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, ss. 7, 8.

An applicant to licensing justices for a certificate under the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, authorising the grant to him of a licence to sell by retail beer to be consumed off his premises, under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, was already the holder of a certificate and additional licence for the same purpose under 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33. In the notice required by sect. 7 of the first-mentioned Act, he had set forth his name and address, and the situation of his shop, but merely stated his intention to apply for a certificate to sell by retail beer to be consumed off the premises.

(a) Reported by M. W. McKellar, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The justices refused a certificate, on the ground that the notice was insufficient.

Held, upon a rule for mandamus, that the applicant under the circumstances was entitled to the certificate he applied for.

Ex parte SLATER.

THIS was a rule calling upon the licensing justices for the Over Darwen division of the hundred of Blackburn, in the county of Lancaster, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, commanding them to hold an adjournment of their general annual licensing meeting, and to hear and determine the matter of an application by Thomas Slater for a certificate authorising him to apply to the Excise for a licence to sell beer by retail not to be consumed on the premises.

It appeared from the affidavit of Slater, the applicant, that he applied to the licensing justices on the 29th Aug. last, at their general annual meeting, for a certificate under the 5th and 6th sections of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27).

The notice, which had been duly served and published under the 7th section, was a printed form, with the name, address, and date filled in, as follows:

To the Overseers of the poor of the township of Over Darwen, in the county of Lancaster, the Superintendent of Police for the district, and to all whom it may concern.

I, _____, shopkeeper, now residing at _____, do hereby give notice that it is my intention to apply at the general annual licensing meeting, to be holden at the police court, Over Darwen, in the Over Darwen division of the hundred of Blackburn, in the said county, on the _____ day of _____ inst., for a certificate to sell by retail beer to be consumed off the premises, at my said house and premises, situate at _____ Given, &c.

No objection was made to the grant of this certificate to the applicant; but the justices considered that this notice did not sufficiently fulfil the requirements of the Act, and on that ground refused the application.

By sect. 8, previous licensing provisions are incorporated into the Act, "subject to this qualification, that no application for a certificate under this Act in respect of a licence to sell by retail beer, cider, or wine, not to be consumed on the premises, shall be refused, except upon one or more of the following grounds, viz."

The first three grounds relate to the character of the applicant and the house; and the other, No. 4, is "That the applicant, or the house in respect of which he applies, is not duly qualified as by law is required."

The rule was moved for and granted for the reason that the certificate was refused on a different ground from those provided by the qualification in this section.

McKellar showed cause on behalf of the justices.—There are two objections to the form of this notice: the first is, that there can be no "certificate to sell by retail beer to be consumed off the premises," as is mentioned therein. The applicant should have given notice, in the words of the rule,

Q.B. Div.]

BARTON REGIS UNION v. BERKSHIRE CLERK OF THE PEACE.

"for a certificate authorising him to apply to the Excise for a licence to sell beer by retail not to be consumed on the premises." A certificate and a licence are distinctly provided for in the Act, and the notice ought not to confound the two. The second objection is less technical and more important, viz., the omission to state the statute granting the licence for which this certificate is required. In this case probably the licence required is that under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61; but a licence enabling the holder to sell beer in the same way might be granted under at least one other Act, viz., 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33. Sect. 6 of the Act of 1869 says, "A certificate under this Act shall specify the name and address of the person thereby authorised to receive a licence, the description of licence or licences authorised to be granted to him, and whether such licence or licences is or are to be granted for the sale of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on or off the premises, and the situation of the house or shop in respect of which such grant is authorised. It shall be in force for one year from the date of its being granted, and shall be in the form given in the first schedule hereto, or as near thereto as circumstances admit." The schedule referred to requires to be described "the situation, and the particular Act or Acts under which the licence is to be taken out." Now sect. 7, which relates to the notice, seems to require as much particularity as the certificate; and, considering that the notice is for the information of the general public and not merely for the justices, nor for the Excise (as the certificate is), there is greater cause for certainty in the notice than in any of the other documents required. The only remedy for insufficiency of notice is a refusal of the certificate and the justices must have some discretion in accepting a notice. This court, on mandamus, will not hastily interfere with that discretion.

J. Paterson supported the rule.—The first objection can have no weight in a matter which is not open to special demurrer, and it is quite early enough to mention the particular statute when the certificate is about to be handed to the applicant. No one could be misled by the form of the notice, and it was never intended that justices should refuse a certificate upon a ground so frivolous as this. It has often been held that mandamus is the only remedy when justices allow an excessive effect to a preliminary objection. This really does not amount to an objection, for the justices have distinctly disobeyed the 8th section, and have refused this application for a certificate on other than the authorised grounds.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We think that this notice, although drawn up in a loose and unsatisfactory form, is sufficient to convey to the justices information of what the applicant desired. The words of the 8th section are very definite, and licensing justices must not be too fastidious as to the verbal accuracy of a notice. The rule will be made absolute.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Ex parte GIBSON.

This was a similar rule to the same justices on behalf of John Gibson, who applied for the same certificate as in Slater's case.

The same form of notice had been used, and it had been held insufficient by the justices, not only on the grounds applicable to the previous case, but on the further ground, which was shown upon affidavit, that Gibson had at the same licensing meeting continued his previous certificate for an additional licence, under 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, whereby, having "an Excise licence to sell strong beer in casks containing not less than four and a half gallons, or in not less than two dozen reputed quart bottles at one time, to be drunk or consumed elsewhere than on his premises," he was entitled "to sell beer in any less quantity and in any other manner than as aforesaid, but not to be drunk or consumed on the premises where sold."

Poland showed cause on behalf of the justices.—Here the applicant having already a certificate for a licence such as he required, there was nothing in the notice to show the justices what he was applying for. Moreover, the licensing justices surely cannot be compelled to grant any number of certificates for the same purpose to the same applicant. If these two certificates are to be held by the same person, he will have a facility in defeating the object of the Legislature, requiring a conviction to be indorsed on a certificate, which could never have been intended.

J. Paterson supported the rule.—The applicant might desire to give up his licence to sell strong beer in large quantities during the year, in which case he would require this different kind of certificate for a licence under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, in order to continue his retail trade. [HUDDLESTON, B.—Then why cannot he apply for the new certificate after he has given up the old one? The object of this application now can only be to put himself on velvet for the next licensing day.] Whatever be the ulterior object, there is nothing in the statute to justify the justices' refusal of the certificate.

MELLOR, J.—I have considerable doubt about this rule; for the notice on the face of it certainly does not give any information concerning the applicant's peculiar position and requirement. I cannot, however, hold that he has not put himself in the position which enables him to claim a certificate under the 8th section. There is nothing there to prevent his having one because he already holds something similar; and the defeat of the statute upon a conviction is not likely to occur as suggested. All that the 7th section requires is set out in the notice; and the rule I think must go.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion.

Pauper criminal lunatic—Order of maintenance—Settlement at time of making the order.

In 1862 a female criminal lunatic, after living with her husband, without pauper relief, for more than three years in the appellants' union, was acquitted on the ground of insanity on a charge of attempting to murder her child. Her husband's last legal settlement was then elsewhere, but he continued to live in the appellants' union; and in 1877 an order for her maintenance, under the authority of Reg. v. Stepney Union (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 383), was made upon the appellants.

BARTON REGIS UNION v. BERKSHIRE CLERK OF THE PEACE.

Held, upon a case stated, that the order was rightly made, not on the husband's last legal settlement at the time of her detention, but upon the appellants' union, in which was the husband's then settlement under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34.

This was a special case, stated by consent of the parties, and by order under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45 s. 11.

1. On the 9th July 1867, Mary Coleman, being then charged with the offence of having attempted to murder her child, was removed from the parish of Westbury-upon-Trym in the appellants' union, where she was then residing, to the county gaol at Gloucester. On the 12th of August following she was indicted for the said offence at the Gloucester assizes, and upon the trial being acquitted by the jury on the ground of her insanity, she was ordered to be kept in prison in the county of Gloucester until Her Majesty's pleasure should be known.

2. By a warrant dated the 30th Sept. 1867, under the hand of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the said Mary Coleman was ordered to be removed to the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, and she was thereupon duly removed upon such warrant.

3. By an order dated the 21st Sept. 1867, two justices of the peace for the county of Gloucester ordered the guardians of the poor of the appellants' union to pay out of the common fund of their union weekly, from the time the said Mary Coleman should be received, and during such time as she should be detained in the Asylum for Criminal Lunatics at Broadmoor, the sum of 14s. to the superintendent of the said asylum, for the maintenance of the said Mary Coleman. The above order of the 21st Sept. recited, as the ground upon which it was made, the fact that Samuel Coleman, the husband of the said Mary Coleman, was at the date of her imprisonment as aforesaid residing, and had resided for one year and upwards thence immediately preceding, within the appellants' union, and had continually resided therein from the date of such imprisonment down to the date of the said order, and was irremovable therefrom, and that upon due inquiry he was found to be unable to pay the expense of the maintenance of his said wife in a lunatic asylum. The above order did not recite or in any wise purport to be made on the ground that the said Samuel Coleman was at the date of such order legally settled in the appellants' union.

4. Against this order there was no appeal, and the appellants regularly paid the sum of 14s. per week to the superintendent of the Broadmoor Asylum as ordered down to the month of May 1874, when they discovered that the order was void, there being no provisions in the Acts of Parliament relating to criminal lunatics, empowering justices of the peace to charge the maintenance of a criminal lunatic upon the guardians of the union wherein such lunatic shall have acquired an exemption from removal, but only the guardians of the union wherein such lunatic shall be adjudged to be legally settled. From the date of such discovery the appellants have refused to make any further payments for the maintenance of the said Mary Coleman at the Broadmoor Asylum. The superintendent of the said asylum, however, acting on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, has continued to maintain her in the asylum, and has sent to the appellants quarterly, up to the 29th Sept. 1877, an account, debiting them with the expense of such maintenance.

5. By an order dated the 4th Dec. 1877 two justices of the peace for the county of Berks adjudged the said Mary Coleman to be legally settled in the said parish of Westbury-upon-Trym, in the appellants' union, and directed the appellants to pay thenceforth, from the date thereof, to the superintendent for the time being of the criminal lunatic asylum at Broadmoor, weekly the sum of 14s., for the maintenance of the said Mary Coleman during her confinement therein. This order was obtained by the superintendent when he found that the order of the 21st Sept. 1867 was null and void.

Against this order of the 4th Dec. 1877 notice of appeal was duly given to the respondent, and it is upon the validity of such order that the opinion of this honourable court is now sought.

6. The said Samuel Coleman has continuously resided within the said parish of Westbury-upon-Trym without any break of residence from the year 1862 up to the present time, and during such residence had always supported himself by his labour, and had never received any parochial relief, unless the maintenance of his wife in the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum as aforesaid can be considered in law as parochial relief received by him. From the year 1862 until her arrest on the 9th July 1867 the said Mary Coleman resided with her husband, who maintained her in such parish as part of his family, and, although he was unable to pay 14s. a week for her maintenance in a lunatic asylum, he could have maintained her in his own house as a sane person.

7. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the said Mary Coleman was at the date of the order now appealed against legally settled in right of her husband in the said parish of Westbury-upon-Trym, by reason of her husband, the said Samuel Coleman (to whom she was married in 1860), having resided in the said parish for the term of three years and upwards next before the application for the said order, in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render him irremovable within the enactment of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34; that her maintenance in the said asylum was not relief to him within the meaning of sect. 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66; and that, even if it was, he had resided more than three years after deducting the period during which she was so maintained, so as to gain a settlement in the said parish.

8. It is contended on behalf of the appellants that by reason of the said Mary Coleman having been maintained in the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum during the period and under the circumstances hereinbefore set out, her husband, the said Samuel Coleman, was during the whole period of such maintenance, and still is, a person receiving relief within the meaning of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1.

BARTON REGIS UNION v. BERKSHIRE CLERK OF THE PEACE.

9. It is further contended by the appellants that the 34th section of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, is wholly prospective in its operation, and that the three years' residence specified therein is a three years' residence commencing at a period subsequent to the 15th Aug. 1876, the date of the passing and coming into force of the said Act; and that consequently the said Mary Coleman and her husband had not, at the date of the application for the said order of the 4th Dec. 1877, acquired a settlement in the said parish of Westbury-upon-Trym under or by reason of the provisions of the said section.

10. If the said Mary Coleman had not, by reason of the circumstances hereinbefore set out, acquired at the date of such application as aforesaid a settlement in the said parish of Westbury-upon-Trym, under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34, it is admitted that she was at the date of such application, and still is, legally settled in the parish of Almondsbury, in the Thornbury Union. It is also admitted that she was settled there in Sept. 1867, when the Secretary of State's order was made for her removal to the asylum.

11. The appellants further contend that the settlement of the insane person into which the justices of the peace are directed to inquire under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, s. 7, is the settlement of such insane person at the date of the order for his or her removal to the lunatic asylum, and not the settlement which he or she may have at the date of the application for the order of maintenance.

The question for the opinion of this honourable court is whether the order of 4th Dec. 1877, adjudging the settlement of the said Mary Coleman to be in the said parish of Westbury-upon-Trym, is, upon the facts stated, properly made.

And it is agreed that a judgment in conformity with the decision of this honourable court, and for such costs as this court shall adjudge, shall be entered on motion by either party at the general quarter sessions of the peace to be holden in and for the county of Berks next, or next but one, after such decision shall be given.

Charles, Q.C. (with him Clerk) argued for the appellants. — This order was made upon the authority of Reg. v. Stepney Union, L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 383, by which it was held that, notwithstanding the total repeal of 9 Geo. 4, c. 40, by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 126, s. 1, the effect of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, s. 7, was so far to incorporate the 54th section of the first-named Act as to continue the power of two justices to inquire into and adjudge the settlement of a pauper detained in custody during pleasure, who has been acquitted of felony on the ground of insanity, and to order the overseers or guardians of the parish of settlement to pay such weekly sum for his maintenance as the justices shall from time to time direct. It must be admitted that there is authority for making this inquiry and order of maintenance at any time during the detention in custody; but in all the cases the settlement determined by the justices has been that which existed at the time of the removal under the order of the Secretary of State. Here the settlement at that time was not in the appellants' union, and if the order ought to have been made on the parish or union of that settlement, this appeal must be allowed. In consequence of the decision of this court in Brampton Union v. Carlisle Union (38 L. T. Rep. N.S. 714, L.

Rep. 3 Q. B. Div. 479), it cannot now be contended that the husband's settlement at the time this order of maintenance was made, was anywhere but in the appellants' union. The only question, therefore, for consideration now is whether the settlement at the time of the first detention in custody, or that at the time of the inquiry and order of maintenance is to be determined by the justices. One inquiry only is provided for, and the determination must apply to the whole term of the detention. If a female criminal lunatic can derive a settlement from her husband during the time of her detention, that settlement might vary during her detention; but there is no provision for rescinding an order of maintenance, at the instance of the parish or union upon which the order has been made, when the husband's settlement has become changed.

Mc Kellar (with him Bowen) for the respondent.

— It is admitted that upon the authorities there is no limitation as to the time of this inquiry and order of maintenance; and the provision simply requires the justices to ascertain the place of the last legal settlement. There can be only one such place, namely, that of the last legal settlement at the time of the inquiry. There is nothing in any Act of Parliament which can suggest to the justices that under such circumstances as these it is their duty to ascertain some other settlement than the last, and it might be a very difficult thing to do. The consequences of this clear and definite construction of the Act ought to have no weight in the matter; but if they be considered, in this particular case there can be no hardship upon the appellants. Should the detention of the insane woman cease, as it may do at Her Majesty's pleasure, the same parish would be responsible for maintenance when she is at large as is now liable for her maintenance in Broadmoor. If during her detention her settlement should change in consequence of her husband's removal, there is nothing to prevent the superintendent of the asylum from applying again to two justices, at the appellants' instance, for another order of maintenance upon the husband's new place of settlement.

Charles, Q.C. in reply.

Mellor, J. — I confess myself to have had very considerable doubt upon this point during the argument. It seems, however, to me a greater hardship and a very strange conclusion, if a woman detained during Her Majesty's pleasure should be maintained by a different parish from that which would have to maintain her when she comes out. It is said that the inquiry was intended to be made once for all at the time when the lunatic is first detained, and that if made afterwards it cannot concern a settlement which she could not acquire during detention. There may be hardships upon parishes or unions thus rendered liable, and difficulties in ascertaining the proper liabilities; but the governing principle of a decision upon such a question as this should be the comparative hardship, and I think the respondent's is the more reasonable construction. I answer the question in the respondent's favour, and affirm the order of maintenance.

Manisty, J. — I also am of opinion that our judgment must be for the respondent. To say that the case is free from doubt would be to go beyond any conclusion possible concerning this confused legislation. I agree, however, that if we can construe the Act in accordance with general principles as to the parish which would have to maintain this woman if she were free, we ought to do so; and it seems to me that the respondent's construction is the better one of the two. Looking at the case of Reg. v. Stepney Union, what is meant is clearly that, although the first statute is repealed by the third, you must give effect to the enactment incorporated by the 7th section of the intermediate Act, by excluding from the repeal as much of the first Act as is necessary for that purpose. At p. 392, Cockburn, C.J., puts it: "There is no doubt that sect. 7 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, was introduced, not so much for the purpose of creating a substantive enactment as for the purpose of modifying the previous enactment of sect. 54 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 49." But the conclusion is that we must interpret sect. 7 by reading into it so much of the previous Act as to make it a substantive enactment. Sect. 7 does not say the time at which the settlement is to exist of which the inquiry must be made, nor indeed does the 54th section of 9 Geo. 4, c. 40. But the inquiry must be as to the place of the last legal settlement; the justices are not to ascertain in what place the lunatic seems to have been legally settled at the time of the Secretary of State's order. There is nothing to militate against the ordinary construction of the words, and that construction is reasonable and in accordance with general principles.

Leave to appeal was granted to the appellants.

Parliament—Borough vote—Registration—Rating of owner by agreement with occupier—Omission of occupier's name from the rate-book—Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), ss. 3, 4, 7, 8, and 19.

Sect. 19 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41) enacts that the overseers in making out the poor rate shall in every case, whether the rate is collected from the owner or occupier, or the owner is liable to the payment of the rate instead of the occupier, enter the name of the occupier in the rate-book, and that any occupier whose name has been omitted shall, notwithstanding such omission, and that no claim to be rated has been made by him, be entitled to every franchise and qualification depending upon rating, in the same manner as if his name had not been omitted.

Held, that this includes cases where the occupier's name has been omitted, the liability of the owner to pay the rates being by agreement with the occupier, and not only cases where the owner's liability arises by agreement with the overseers

Smith v. Overseers of Seghill (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 859; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 422) followed.

Cross v. Alsop (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 589; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 315) distinguished, and obiter dicta in that case disapproved of.

THIS was an appeal from the Revising Barrister of the borough of Birmingham, allowing a claim to the franchise.

The following case was stated:

At a court held by me, the barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the borough of Birmingham, William Barton duly objected to the name of Baligan Hackney being inserted in the list of voters for the said borough.

The claim was in the following form: "Hackney, Bernard Baligan, 113, Pershore-road, occupation of offices, 37, Waterloo-road."

The following facts were established by the evidence. Hackney had during the qualifying period resided at 113, Pershore-road, within the borough, and had occupied offices at 37, Waterloo-road, as yearly tenant, for the purpose of his business as a law stationer, at a yearly rent of 34*l.*

The offices consisted of three rooms communicating with each other and having a door leading to the hall common to all occupiers.

Hackney had the exclusive right to the offices, the key, and complete control of the door leading from them to the common hall, and a key to the street door which he used when he pleased. Hackney's name was painted on the door post in the street with others. There were several sets of offices of the same description and let in the same way on the premises. The landlord, who himself occupied part of the premises, but did not sleep there, was rated and had paid all rates for the whole house, and his name appeared on the rate-book as occupier. Hackney had not claimed to be rated or tendered payment of any rates. Hackney's name was not entered on the rate-book. The rent paid by Hackney was more than it otherwise would have been, in consideration of the landlord paying the rates. Twelve other persons whose names are set out in the schedule hereto attached claimed to be inserted in the said list under similar circumstances.

It was contended on behalf of the objector that Hackney's name not appearing in the rate-book, he was thereby disqualified from being placed on the said list.

I found that Hackney was an occupier as tenant of a counting-house or other building, within the meaning of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27, and that he was the occupier of a rateable hereditament within the meaning of sect. 19 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 41, and I decided that, notwithstanding that the overseers had omitted his name from the rate, he was, under the proviso to the said section as interpreted by the case of Smith v. Overseers of Seghill (L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 422), entitled to every qualification and franchise depending upon rating in the same manner as if his name had not been so omitted, and I accordingly inserted his name in the list of voters together with the names of the said twelve other persons.

Due notice of the appeal from my decision was given, and I ordered the appeals in all the before-mentioned cases to be consolidated.

(a) This construction of the Act will, after Feb. 1, 1879, be also required by express statutory enactment (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, s. 14).

If the court be of opinion that my decision was wrong, the register is to be amended by erasing the names of Bernard Baligan Hackney and of the said twelve other persons from the said list.

By sect. 3 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), in case the owner of any hereditament not exceeding a certain rateable value is willing to enter into an agreement in writing with the overseers to become liable to them for the poor rates assessed in respect of such hereditament, for any term not being less than one year from the date of such agreement, and to pay the poor rates whether the hereditament is occupied or not, the overseers may, subject nevertheless to the control of the vestry, agree with the owner to receive the rates from him, and to allow him a commission not exceeding twenty-five per cent. on the amount thereof.

By sect. 4, the vestry of any parish may from time to time "order that the owners of all rateable hereditaments, to which sect. 3 of this Act extends, shall be rated to the poor rate in respect of such rateable hereditaments, instead of the occupiers, on all rates made after the date of such order," allowing the owners so rated a deduction of fifteen per cent.

By sect. 7, every payment of a rate by the owner, "whether he is himself rated instead of the occupier, or has agreed with the occupier or the overseers to pay such rate, and notwithstanding any allowance or deduction which the overseers are empowered to make from the rate," shall be deemed a payment of the full rate by the occupier for the purpose of any qualification or franchise which, as regards rating, depends upon the payment of the poor rate.

By sect. 8, when an owner "who has undertaken, whether by agreement with the occupier or the overseers, to pay the poor rate, or has otherwise become liable to pay the same," omits or neglects to pay any such rate, the occupier may pay the same and deduct the amount from the rent.

By sect. 19 the overseers, in making out the poor rate, "shall in every case, whether the rate is collected from the owner or occupier, or the owner is liable to the payment of the rate instead of the occupier, enter in the occupier's column of the rate-book the name of the occupier of every rateable hereditament, and such occupier shall be deemed to be duly rated for any qualification or franchise as aforesaid; and if any overseer negligently or wilfully, and without reasonable cause, omits the name of the occupier of any rateable hereditament from the rate . . . such overseers shall for every such omission . . . be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding two pounds; provided that any occupier whose name has been omitted shall, notwithstanding such omission, and that no claim to be rated has been made by him, be entitled to every qualification and franchise depending upon rating, in the same manner as if his name had not been so omitted."

Jelf for the appellant.—The claimant's name has been omitted in this case, but he is nevertheless not aided by sect. 19, and his name should not be placed on the register. That section is confined to cases where "the owner is liable to the payment of rates instead of the occupier." "Liable" means liable in one of the two ways prescribed by sects. 3 and 4, i.e., either by agreement with the overseers or by order of the vestry. Cross v. Alsop (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 589; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 315) is expressly in point as to this, and has never been overruled, though in Smith v. Overseers of Seghill (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 859; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 422) the Court of Queen's Bench expressed an opinion opposed to the appellant's contention. This court, however, sitting as a court of final appeal for registration appeals, will follow its own decisions. [COLERIDGE, C.J.—Why should not the word "liable" in sect. 19 include all the three modes of liability spoken of in sects. 7 and 8?] Sect. 19 refers only to such a liability as is created by the Act.

Mellor, Q.C. and Dugdale for the respondent.—The facts in Cross v. Alsop (ubi sup.) are distinguishable from those in the present case, and the dicta on which the appellant relies were not necessary to the decision. Smith v. Overseers of Seghill (ubi sup.) is the later authority, and is expressly in the respondent's favour.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was right and must be affirmed. In so deciding it might seem at first that we are in conflict with the decision of this court in Cross v. Alsop (ubi sup.). But, for a reason which I will give presently, it will be found that we are not overruling nor even differing from that case—scarcely seriously differing from the obiter dicta in that case. This is a case in which the revising barrister has found an agreement—if not in terms, at any rate in facts from which it necessarily follows—between the owner and occupier that the owner should pay the rates; and it is found that the occupier paid more rent in consideration of that agreement than he otherwise would have done. The facts are these: that the occupier pays the rates in the shape of increased rent to the landlord, and we have to deal with the Act in respect of those facts. The material sections of the Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41) are sects. 3, 4, 7, 8, and 19. Sects. 7 and 8 seem to describe the very facts which we find in this case, because sect. 7, omitting that part which refers to deductions from rent, goes on to say that "every payment of a rate by the owner, whether he is himself rated instead of the occupier, or has agreed with the occupier or overseers to pay such rate. . . shall be deemed a payment of the full rate by the occupier." Rating the owner instead of the occupier is the course prescribed under sect. 4, by order of the vestry; agreement with the overseers is the course contemplated by sect. 3; and agreement with the occupier is a third course mentioned by the statute. Then comes sect. 8, which enacts that where an owner who has undertaken, by agreement with the occupier or overseers, to pay the poor rates, or who has otherwise become liable to pay them, omits to do so, the rates may be paid by the occupier, and deducted from the rent. Sects. 3 and 4 are, as I have said, incorporated by reference into sects. 7 and 8. Then we have sect. 19, the first part of which imposes certain duties on the overseers the neglect of which it visits as an offence liable to summary conviction; and the duty is to enter the names of the occupiers in the rate book in every case where the owner is liable to the payment of the rate instead of the occupier. Now how is the owner liable? He may be liable in any one of three ways; by an order of the vestry (sect. 4), by agreement with the overseers (sect. 3), or by agreement with the occupier. The word "liable" is used in sect. 8 as applicable to all those three modes of liability. What is there to show that, when the word "liable" is used in sect. 19, it is to be limited to two of the three modes mentioned in former parts of the Act? Then, if the case is within the first part of the section, it is within the last part; which provides that any occupier whose name has been omitted shall, notwithstanding such omission, and that no claim to be rated has been made by him, be entitled to every qualification and franchise depending upon such rating, in the same manner as if his name had not been omitted. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a case distinctly within the words of the section, and that the claimant's franchise is not lost by the omission of the overseers. It has been said that this decision must conflict with the case of Cross v. Alsop (ubi sup.); but, in the first place, the facts in that case are not these facts. So far from the complainant's name in that case having been omitted, it had been inserted, and wrongly inserted; and the argument in the case raised the point distinctly. On those facts, argued upon that footing, the judges in Cross v. Alsop say that when the complainant has lost his vote, partly in consequence of its having been improperly claimed, the case is not within the statute, his name not having been omitted from the rate book, but inserted in a wrong manner. The judges do, no doubt, go on—and it was necessary for them to go on, in order to show that the proviso in sect. 19 did not apply to the case before them—to deal with the only two questions raised by the facts. There was no order of the vestry, and no agreement between the owner and the overseers; and they say that the complainant is not therefore aided by sect. 19—first, because his name was not omitted from the rate book; and secondly, because the owner had not been made liable to the payment of rates in either of these two ways. It was not suggested that this third mode of liability existed in that case. But in this case the facts raise a question which was not before the court then, and was not decided by the judges at all. We are not therefore conflicting with the decision of this court in that case, though no doubt expressions may be found in the judgments which appear to limit the operation of sect. 19. I do not, however, think that those expressions are to be taken in their full sense, especially as sects. 7 and 8 were not brought before the notice of the court. But there is a case which is directly in point—the case of Smith v. Seghill (ubi sup.). In that case it was necessary to consider the question of the omission of the occupier's name, and the effect of sect. 19 in inflicting a penalty on the overseers; and it therefore became essential to put the true construction upon that section, as part of the ratio decidendi. In that case the Court of Queen's Bench put the same construction upon sect. 19 that we are now putting on it, and, so far as it was necessary for them to express an opinion contrary to the decision of Cross v. Alsop (ubi sup.), they did express it. The expressions to which I have referred in Cross v. Alsop were not necessary to the decision of that case; and our judgment, therefore, not conflicting with that of Cross v. Alsop, and assenting to that of Smith v. Seghill, must be that the decision of the revising barrister be affirmed.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion, and do not wish to add anything to what the Lord Chief Justice has said with regard to sects. 7 and 8, but on the other point I will say a few words. Now, in forming an opinion as to the effect of the judgment of the court, one must look at the real point raised. In Cross v. Alsop (ubi sup.) the question was whether the complainant required to be separately rated, he not being separately rated in fact. Under the Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102) s. 61, separate rating was essential, and the argument was whether that defect was remedied by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 41, so as to entitle this occupier, who was not separately rated, to a vote or not. That being so, the Lord Chief Justice applies himself in his judgment to those sections of this Act—3, 4, and 19—which were supposed to be the only sections which could entitle him to a vote, and then proceeds as follows: "With respect to the proviso at the end of that section, that any occupier whose name has been omitted shall, notwithstanding such omission, be entitled to every franchise and qualification depending upon rating, that is applicable only where the name of the occupier has been omitted from the rate, which is not the present case, for here the names of the several occupiers are inserted in the rate." The real judgment is that the complainant there did not come within sect. 19, because his name was not omitted from the rate, and the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice is explicit on the point. It is true that some of the expressions used by the other judges appear to show that their minds inclined to confine sect. 19 to cases within sects. 3 and 4; but these opinions were not necessary to the judgment; and not only the Lord Chief Justice, but also Brett, J., puts the very ground on which the complainant did not come within sect. 19. Then the case of Smith v. Seghill (ubi sup.), in which the facts are the same as those now before us, arises in the Queen's Bench. In that case the name of the occupier had actually been omitted, and Mellor J. distinctly points out the difference between it and the previous case of Cross v. Alsop: "It was sufficient to have decided Cross v. Alsop that the occupier of part of a house must be separately rated to the relief of the poor, and that a joint rating with other occupiers was not sufficient. Therefore, without interfering with Cross v. Alsop, the construction put upon sect. 19 not being directly necessary for the decision of that case, we are at liberty to consider the construction of that section independently of that authority." (L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 429.) The case is also distinguished by Lush and Quain, JJ. from Cross v. Alsop in the same manner as we are distinguishing the present case, on the ground that there the question was one of separate rating, and that the name was not omitted as it is here. We are not therefore acting in opposition to the decision of this court in Cross v. Alsop, but are distinguishing this from it on the very ground which two of, if not all, the judges indicate as the distinction to be taken. As to how far we should adopt the obiter dicta, that is a question which may arise, because no doubt some expressions are used in the judgments in Cross v.

GREEN (app.) v. MEPHAM (resp.).

[C.P. Div.]

Alsop in the sense for which Mr. Jelf contends. This case is, however, distinguishable on the ground pointed out by the judges in that case itself, and by the judges in the Queen's Bench, and the distinction, to my mind, is a material one.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. But for the case of Cross v. Alsop, I should have thought there was no difficulty in the question. It is, however, impossible not to see that a difficulty has been created by that decision. The facts of Cross v. Alsop are, however, unquestionably distinguishable from those in the present case, as well as from the facts in Smith v. Seghill, as has been pointed out; but still there is no doubt a difficulty in dealing with the judgments. Nevertheless, as the Court of Queen's Bench have had the very same question before them, and came to the conclusion which we all think the more correct, I think we are not bound to follow the dicta in Cross v. Alsop. In this case the question will be found to turn on sects. 7, 8, and 19 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 41. The owner may be liable to the payment of rates in three ways—by agreement between the owner and the overseers, by agreement between the owner and the occupier, or by order of the vestry. It seems to me that sect. 19 must apply to all these liabilities. Then it is said that rating will no longer be a test of the franchise. I do not think so at all. Rating is still the test. The rates must still be paid, whether by the occupier, or by the owner and landlord, under agreement either with the occupier or the overseers.

GREEN (app.) v. MEPHAM (resp.). (a)

Parliament—Registration—Borough vote—Notice of objection, service of—Collector of rates—Office of overseer—6 Vict. c. 18, ss. 16, 101.

The collector of rates for the parishes constituting the borough of B. discharged all the ordinary duties of the overseers, including the duty of making out the lists for revision purposes and of attending at the registration court. It was the uniform practice that all notices of claim and objection should be sent to the collector's office, which was attached to his residence, whether such notices were first delivered to an overseer or not. The parish books were all kept at this office, and there was no other place in the borough where any parish business was transacted. A notice of objection to the appellant's name was left at this office.

Held, that this was a good service on the overseers, on the ground that this office was "an overseer's office or other place for transacting parochial business."

Semble, the collector was an overseer within 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 101.

APPEAL from the revising barrister for the borough of Bedford, who stated the following

CASE.

At a court for the revision of the lists of persons entitled to vote in the election of members to serve in Parliament for the borough of Bedford, holden in Bedford on the 7th Oct. 1878, before the revising barrister duly appointed to revise the said lists, William Mepham objected to the name of Joseph Reynolds Green being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the borough of Bedford, in respect of property occupied within the parish of St. Mary in the said borough.

The notice of objection required to be given to the party objected to was duly given to Joseph Reynolds Green.

The question in this case was whether the notice of objection required to be given to the overseers of the parish who shall have made out the list in which the name of the person objected to shall have been inserted, was duly given (6 Vict. c. 18, ss. 17 and 101).

Thomas Bithery and Thomas Minney are the regularly appointed overseers of the poor for the parish of St. Mary, Bedford, for the year 1878.

St. Mary is one of the five parishes which constitute the borough of Bedford, and for the whole of these five parishes one collector of poor rates is appointed by the guardians under the provisions of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 40, and the list of voters for the said several parishes constitute the register of voters for the borough.

The collector's duties, by the terms of his appointment, are to assist the churchwardens and overseers in making, assessing, levying, and collecting the poor rates, and filling up receipts, keeping books, and making returns relating to poor rates, to obey all lawful orders and directions of the guardians and of the majority of the churchwardens and overseers; but as a fact, and by the consent of the overseers, he has been in the habit of discharging all the ordinary overseers' duties, including that of making out the lists for revision purposes and of attending at the registration court, and there performing the overseer's duties.

The present collector, Mr. Thompson, transacts the whole of the business connected with the poor rates and the preparation of the list of voters, at an office, No. 99, Tavistock-street, in the borough of Bedford (called for the purpose of this case the Rate office), being a portion of his own residence, but having a separate entrance to it distinct from the dwelling-house. No allowance beyond his salary is made to the collector for the use of this office. A similar office in his own dwelling-house for such purposes was kept by Mr. Thompson's predecessor, Mr. Joy. It was proved that all persons going to the dwelling-house on parochial business are always sent to the office door; that at this office all the parish books are kept and produced to any voter requiring to see them; that all notices of claims and objections which have been delivered to any of the overseers are sent there to or collected by Mr. Thompson, who produces them to any voter requiring to see them, and that he also attends to produce them to the revising barrister at his court; that Mr. Thompson also makes out the lists of voters and of claims and objections, which are kept at this office to be produced to any voter requiring to inspect them. There is no other office in the borough of Bedford where any parish business is transacted. Annexed hereto is a copy of the demand note and receipt delivered by Mr. Thompson on calling for and receiving any rate. It was also proved by evidence that when Mr. Joy (the predecessor in office of Mr. Thompson, who held the same appointment Mr. Thompson now holds) was collector of the rates, notices of claims and objections were usually served at the office then occupied by him in a similar manner, and duly published by the overseers without any objection having been made; and that, since Mr. Thompson has held the appointment, notices of claims and objections have been left at the said rate office and duly published by the overseers; but that on one occasion, when notices were handed to Mr. Thompson personally, he informed the person delivering the same that in his opinion such delivery was irregular, but no objection was afterwards made before the revising barrister to the service of such notices. That both Mr. Joy and Mr. Thompson always received the whole of the allowance awarded by the revising barrister in respect of the overseer's duties connected with the registration, and that for many years past the whole of such allowances for the five parishes were included in one certificate, and were charged by the collector to the said parishes according to the rateable value thereof respectively. On the 24th Aug. 1878 Mefham left at the rate office a notice of his objection to Green's qualification, and this notice was received by Mr. Thompson on the same day. The overseers of St. Mary objected to publish the name of Green in the list of persons objected to. On behalf of Green it was objected that notice of the objection had not been duly given to the overseers.

For Mr. Mefham, the objector, it was contended that Mr. Thompson was, within the meaning of 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 101, a person who, by virtue of his office or appointment, executed the duties of the overseers of the poor, and that the said rate office was the office or other place for transacting the parochial business, within the meaning of the said section, and that the notice was duly served.

I decided on the evidence that, in this case, notice of the objection had been duly given to the overseers, and the said Joseph Reynolds Green not having a good qualification, I struck out his name from the list. Against my decision the said Joseph Reynolds Green has given notice of appeal.

At the said court the name of Lawrence Bartholomew Moore, inserted in the list for the parish of St. Paul (another parish in Bedford), was also objected to. The same question as to the service of the notice of the objection upon the overseers occurred in this case as in Green's, the only difference being that Moore's name was included in the lists prepared by Mr. Thompson, and signed and published by the overseers of the parish of St. Paul. I decided this case in the same manner, and struck Moore's name from the list of voters. Against my decision in this case the said Lawrence Bartholomew Moore has also given notice of appeal. The above appeals depend on the same decision, and ought to be consolidated; and also will affect the qualification of five others.

(1) If the court should be of opinion that in the above cases the notices of objection to the overseers were duly served for the parish of St. Mary, the list as signed by me will remain unaltered.

(2) If the court should rule that such notice of objection to the overseers was not duly served, for the parish of St. Mary, the names (the names of certain occupiers here followed) must be inserted in the list, and the claim of Augustus Tilden disallowed.

(3) If the court should be of opinion that the notices to the overseers were duly served for the parish of St. Paul, or that the overseers by publishing Moore's name in the list of persons objected to cured any irregularity in the service, the list will remain unaltered.

(4) If the court should be of opinion that the notices to the overseers for the parish of Saint Paul, were not duly served, and that the overseers by publishing the lists did not cure any irregularity as to service, the names of (two names here followed, with their qualifications) will be reinstated and the lodger claim of Samler, William, will be disallowed.

(5) The lodger claim in the parish of St. John, of Shrimpton, Walter John, will be disallowed, should the court rule that in Saint Paul's parish the notices were not duly served, or that any irregularity in the service thereof was not cured by the publication of the lists.

W. Graham for the appellant.—The question turns upon the proper construction of sects. 17 and 101 of the 6 Vict. c. 18. Sect. 17 gives any voter a right to object to the insertion of any name in the list of voters, and provides that the objector shall, on or before the 25th day of August in each year, give or cause to be given a notice of objection to the overseers who shall have made out the list in which the name of the person so objected to shall have been inserted. Sect. 101 (interpretation clause) provides that "the words 'overseers' or 'overseers of the poor' shall extend to and mean all persons who, by virtue of any office or appointment, shall execute the duties of overseers of the poor, by whatever name or title such persons may be called and in whatever manner they may be appointed; and . . . that whenever any notice is by this Act required to be given or sent to the overseers of any parish or township, it shall be sufficient if such notice shall be delivered to any one of such overseers, or shall be left at his place of abode, or at his office or other place for transacting parochial business." First, it is clear that the collector spoken of in the case, Thompson, is not an "overseer" within the definition here given. He may, by permission of the overseers, execute certain of the overseer's duties, but he does not execute them "by virtue of any office or appointment." The duties of a collector are defined by art. 4 of the Poor Law Board Orders (cited in Archbold's Poor Law, p. 84), made under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 61, and exclude such a contention. [Grove, J.—By sect. 61 of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, the collector is capable of being appointed assistant-overseer. If the overseers have desired him to execute their duties, but not formally appointed him under sect. 61, is not that a mere irregularity in the appointment, cured by sect. 101 of the 6 Vict. c. 18? He holds no office or appointment except that of collector, and, as collector, he does not perform these duties. The effect of sect. 101 of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, was considered in Points v. Atwood (18 L. J. 19, C. P.), where it was held that service of notice of objection upon an assistant-overseer was a good notice;

C.P. Div.]

REG. v. WALTER BROWNLOW.

[CR. CAS. RES.]

but this is a very different case. The offices of collector and assistant-overseer are distinct:

Guardians of Malling Union v. Graham, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 789; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 101.

[Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—That case is decided on the ground that they are not the same offices in such a sense as to bind a surety, who has guaranteed the due performance of the duties of one of them, to both. In favour of sureties, such contracts are always construed strictly.] Secondly, the place where this notice was served was not an overseer's office. The case finds that parochial business was transacted there, but it was not an office belonging to any overseer at all. It was the private room of the collector, where he discharged his business. [GROVE, J.—The case finds that no parochial business was transacted anywhere else.] That does not make it the office of an overseer.

Hugh Shield, for the respondents, was not called on.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was correct, and that the judgment must be affirmed. I think the service of notice of objection in this case was practically good on the first ground, but I do not propose to rest my judgment on that ground, as my brother Grove feels some doubt upon it. At any rate, it was served at the right place. The Act of Parliament (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 101) says that "the words 'overseers' or 'overseers of the poor' shall extend to and mean all persons who by virtue of any office or appointment shall execute the duties of overseer of the poor, by whatever name or title such persons may be called, and in whatsoever manner they may be appointed . . . and that wherever any notice is by this Act required to be given or sent to the overseers of any parish or township, it shall be sufficient if such notice is delivered to any one of such overseers, or shall be left at his place of abode, or at his office or other place for transacting parochial business." The last words clearly include this case. The facts here are that the collector has an office, and that at his office the parish books are kept. All notices of claims and objections which have been delivered to any of the overseers were sent there as a matter of course. The overseers do nothing whatever. It seems to me that it is too clear, I had almost said for argument, that this office is a place for the transaction of parochial business; and it is further found in the case that there is no other office or place in the parish where parochial business is transacted. The notice of objection was served at this office, and the service is therefore good.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is hardly necessary to add anything to the judgment of the Chief Justice, and I will only say a few words. The case finds that this is a place where the overseers send these very notices of objection, if delivered to them; that there is no other office in the parish where any parish business is transacted; and it would be to strike the words of sect. 101 out of the Act of Parliament if we were not to hold that this place comes within them. I am inclined to think it was the office of the overseers; but, at any rate, it was the place where parochial business was transacted. On the other point which has been suggested, that this collector does not come within the word "overseer," if it had been necessary to decide it I should like to have heard what the respondent's counsel has to say.

I do not feel perfectly satisfied that the collector in this case was the overseer within sect. 101 of the Act.

Decision affirmed.

REG. v. WALTER BROWNLOW. (a)

Larceny Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 75—Agent receiving moneys—Direction in writing to apply the same—Embezzlement.

The prisoner was an agent employed to sell goods on commission, and as soon as he received moneys from customers he was to remit them to his employers. During the employment the prosecutor wrote to the prisoner, "We will send H., B., and P. their bills at the end of the month, and the same day that you receive the money from the customers you must remit it to us. We will attend to your order, as our arrangements were to remit as soon as you received it, as you said they would not pay much before the 20th of each month."

Held, that this letter was not a direction in writing as to the application or disposition of moneys received by the prisoner within the meaning of sect. 75 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this court by Fry, J.

The indictment contained three counts:—

The first charged the prisoner with having received 12l. 12s. on the 7th Feb. 1878 from one Edward Wood, and with having converted the same to his own use.

The second count charged the prisoner with having received a sum of 8l. 14s. 9d. on the 2nd March 1878, from one Birkhamshaw, and having in like manner converted the same to his own use.

The third count charged the prisoner with the receipt of a sum of 11l. on the 18th Feb. 1878 from one Hilton, and having converted the same to his own use.

The questions for decision arise under the 75th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96.

It appeared from the evidence that Edward Thorneycroft carried on business in partnership with his brother at Chesterton in Staffordshire, as a brick maker. That he engaged the prisoner to act as an agent in Derby in October 1877. That the duties of the prisoner were to sell goods on commission at 5 per cent. That as he received the moneys from the customers, he was to remit them to his principals.

It appeared further that in the course of business he sent orders to his principals, who accordingly supplied the goods to the customers.

It was proved that the three sums mentioned in the indictment had been received by the prisoner in respect of goods supplied by his principals, and that the same had not been paid or accounted for to his principals, but had been converted by him to his own use.

(a) Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 26th Nov. 1877, Thorneycroft wrote to the prisoner a letter, the material parts of which are as follows:

We will send Mr. Hand, Mr. Blood, and Mr. Pemberton their bills at the end of the month, and the same day that you receive the money from the customers you must remit it to us. We will attend to your order, as our arrangements were to remit as soon as you received it, as you said they would not pay much before the 20th of each month.

Upon this state of facts two questions arose: first, whether the prisoner had been intrusted with the three sums of money mentioned in the indictment or any of them within the meaning of the 75th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96; secondly, whether the letter of the 26th Nov. 1877 was within the meaning of the same section a direction in writing to apply, pay, or deliver the said three sums or any of them.

The prisoner was found guilty subject to this case.

I submit the questions for the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

Fry, J. appended to the case the following memorandum:

"The questions turn upon the construction of the 75th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. It seems to me open to question whether the prisoner can be considered to have been intrusted with the money.

1. The general drift of the 75th section seems to show that it is intended to apply rather to agents to pay than to agents to receive money.

2. The direction in the present case to pay to the principals shows that the principal did not treat himself as having received the money. Can a man who has not been in possession of money trust another with it?

3. If the direction had been to receive from "A." and to pay to "B." the case might have been different, because there the transaction may be deemed to be of a twofold character, viz., first, a constructive receipt of the money by the principal; secondly, an intrusting of the same money to the agent to pay. But here the direction being simply to pay to the principal, the second part of the transaction which would have brought it within the scope of the section is wanting.

4. The language of this section with regard to the agent being intrusted must be contrasted with the language of the 68th section, where money in the position of that now in question is described as having been delivered to or received or taken into possession by the person receiving it.

5. It appears to me doubtful whether the Legislature were minded to make the misapplication of all moneys received by one person to the use of another, in respect of which a written direction had been given, criminal.

See Reg. v. Tailock (2 Q. B. Div. 157), particularly the judgment of Amphlett, B.

Horace Smith for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained. The indictment against the prisoner was not for embezzlement, but for converting moneys which had been intrusted to him with a direction in writing to apply the same, under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75. The learned counsel, having read Fry, J.'s observations on the memorandum to the case, was stopped by the Court.

Vesey Fitzgerald for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. The case finds that the prisoner was an agent to the prosecutors, and the letter of the 26th Nov. 1877 from the prosecutors was a written direction to him as to the application of all moneys he might receive for them. Sect. 75 says: "Whoever having been intrusted," it does not say "by the employer," but leaves it generally, "an agent having been intrusted;" and here the prisoner was intrusted with the money by the prosecutor's customers. Then the letter supplies the direction what he was to do with it, viz., to remit the money the same day that he received it to his employers. [DENMAN, J.—The letter amounts to no more than an intimation that as soon as he has received any moneys he is to remit them the same day.] The direction in this letter is quite as specific as that in Reg. v. Christian (L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 94; 12 Cox C. C. 502). [MELLOR, J.—No; there the prisoner received a specific sum of 336*l.* to apply in payment of certain shares. This was embezzlement if a criminal offence at all.]

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that this conviction must be affirmed. In the cases cited the prisoners were intrusted by the prosecutor with moneys, with specific directions how to apply them; but in the present case there was no written direction at all which specifically applies to the moneys mentioned in this indictment.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is not a case within the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75. The reasons given by Fry, J. show very satisfactorily that the prisoner ought to have been acquitted.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question is whether the letter was a direction in writing within the meaning of sect. 75 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96? I think it is very doubtful whether the letter was ever intended to apply to any other than the three persons' accounts named. At all events it is ambiguous, and, in the absence of any finding by the jury to that effect, I do not feel justified in holding that it did so apply. The arrangements referred to in the latter part of the letter may have been parol for all we know.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. Two questions are reserved for us: (1) Whether the prisoner had been intrusted with any of the sums of money mentioned in the indictment within the meaning of the 75th section. Upon that question I am of opinion that he was not. (2) Whether the letter was a direction in writing to apply, pay, or deliver any of them within sect. 75. I think it was not; it is too ambiguous, and I am disposed to think that it referred to the three customers previously mentioned in the letter.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The letter is ambiguous in its terms, but, assuming that it does apply to all sums of money received by the prisoner on the prosecutor's account, the case is not within sect. 75, which only applies in my judgment where the agent has been intrusted by his employer with money accompanied by a direction in writing how to apply it, and not where the agent receives the money from a third person on behalf of his master as in this case.

Conviction quashed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, Nov. 26, 1878.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns), Lords PENZANCE and O'HAGAN.)

OVERSEERS OF THE POOR OF WALSALL v. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Practice — Court of Appeal — Jurisdiction — Case stated by quarter sessions — Rule or order — Judicature Act 1873, s. 19.By sect. 19 of the Judicature Act 1873, the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order (with certain exceptions) of the High Court of Justice, or of any judges or judge thereof.By the interpretation clause (sect. 100) of the Act "order" includes "rule."Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that under this section the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division upon a rule for quashing an order of quarter sessions as to the validity of a rate.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported in 3 Q. B. Div. 457, and 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 665.

A poor rate had been made upon the respondent company, and they appealed against the rate to the court of quarter sessions for the borough of Walsall. That court made an order in their favour, subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division upon a special case.

The case having been removed by certiorari into the High Court of Justice, the Queen's Bench Division gave judgment discharging the rule which had been obtained to show cause why the order of the court of quarter sessions should not be quashed.

The overseers appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Upon the case coming on for argument a preliminary objection was raised that the court had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, the decision of the Queen's Bench Division being in such cases final.

The Court was equally divided, Cockburn, C.J. and Brett, L.J. holding that there was no jurisdiction, Bramwell and Cotton, L.J.J. being of the contrary opinion.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed, and the overseers appealed to the House of Lords.

Herschell, Q.C. and Anstie, for the appellants, contended that the appeal lay by virtue of the express words of sect. 19 of the Judicature Act of 1873, as interpreted by sect. 100: see also sect. 45. The contention of the Lord Chief Justice in the court below that the case was never removed from the court of quarter sessions, and that the function of the Queen's Bench was only consultative, is untenable, as is shown by the whole form and practice and history of the growth of proceedings of this kind. They referred to the following cases in support of their argument:

Bosanquet and N. Neville, for the respondents, argued that it was not the intention of the Judicature Acts to affect the practice of the Crown side of the Queen's Bench: see Order LXII, which must be read with the Act (Garnett v. Bradley, 3 App. Cas. 944; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261); and, as no right of appeal had previously existed, no right of appeal had been conferred in such cases. They cited Herschell, Q.C. in reply.—We rely on sect. 19: see also rule 11 of Dec. 1876.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, I think that no doubt exists in the minds of any of your Lordships as to the conclusion at which you ought to arrive in this case. The London and North-Western Railway Company were fixed by a decision of a court of quarter sessions with the payment of a certain rate for sanitary purposes, but the overseers of the township of the foreign of Walsall, as the sanitary authority, being anxious to have a larger rate made, obtained in the usual way in the Queen's Bench Division an order for a writ of certiorari to bring up the proceedings under which that rate was fixed, for the purpose of having it quashed. I will refer presently to the form of the proceedings. When that was argued before the Court of Queen's Bench the order of the court of quarter sessions was confirmed; and thereupon the overseers moved in the Court of Appeal to reverse the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. The objection was taken before the Court of Appeal that there was no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, on the ground that the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, having regard to the nature of subject, was final. The Court of Appeal was divided upon that point, and under those circumstances the decision of the Queen's Bench Division prevailed. Your Lordships have now had the matter brought before this House, and have heard it argued upon the question of jurisdiction only. That which is complained of is what is technically called "a rule of the Court of Queen's Bench discharging the rule nisi which was obtained to show cause why the order of the court of quarter sessions fixing the rate should not be quashed." By the interpretation clause affixed to the Judicature Act of 1873 the word "order" in the body of the Act is held to include "rule;" and therefore when in the body of the Act we read the word "order" we read it as if the word "rule" was also contained there. Now sect. 19 of the Judicature Act of 1873 provides that "the Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order, save as hereinafter mentioned, of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, or of any judges or judge thereof." The words "save as hereinafter mentioned" refer to particular exceptions which, it is agreed, do not apply to the present case, and therefore, for the present purpose, the section may be read as if those words were omitted; and, as I have said, it is to be read as if the word "order" included the word "rule." Reading it in that way your Lordships find that it is enacted that the Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from any rule of the Queen's Bench Division. If the matter rests there, I own I do not think it is open to doubt that these clear and definite words of the Legislature must have their full effect given to them. Your Lordships have here, on the one hand, a rule of the Queen's Bench Division, and you have, on the other hand, an enactment that every rule of the Queen's Bench Division is to be open to appeal. That being so, unless there is something more which has not been brought forward yet, those clear words must have effect given to them, and it lies upon those who wish to cut down their effect to show how it is to be done. Now, the way in which it is attempted to be done is this: It is said that in the particular matter which here came before the Queen's Bench Division the Court of Queen's Bench, when it existed as a separate court, did not act by virtue of its ordinary jurisdiction, and did not indeed act by analogy to its contentious jurisdiction in the ordinary sense of the term, but acted in a "consultative" manner, to use the expression of the Lord Chief Justice; that it was, as it were, consulted by the court of quarter sessions, and the court of quarter sessions, it is suggested, never parted with a case upon which it was consulting the Court of Queen's Bench, but in some way kept seisin of the case until it had obtained the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, and then, when it had obtained that opinion, proceeded to act by virtue of its own jurisdiction as a court of quarter sessions. If that were an accurate representation of the jurisdiction, no doubt an element of difficulty might be interposed. It would then have to be considered whether really what your Lordships have before you was a rule or an order of the Court of Queen's Bench at all. But I apprehend that is an inaccurate view of the jurisdiction exercised by the Court of Queen's Bench. As it seems to me, that jurisdiction may be stated very shortly, and there is really, after hearing all that has been said on both sides, little or no controversy upon the subject. The court of quarter sessions was in the first instance the court of appeal before which objections to rates of this kind were to be brought. When the court of quarter sessions had determined a rate, that determination was, as a general rule, final upon the merits. There was no court of appeal in the ordinary sense of the term before which the facts upon which the court of quarter sessions had proceeded could be brought by way of review. But the court of quarter sessions, like every other inferior court in the kingdom, was open to this proceeding: if there was upon the face of the order of the court of quarter sessions anything which showed that the order was erroneous, the Court of Queen's Bench might be asked to have the order brought into it, and to look at the order, and upon the face of it to put an end to its existence by quashing it—not to substitute another order in its place, but to remove that order out of the way as one which should not be used to the detriment of any of the subjects of Her Majesty. That jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench was found in many cases in reference to the quarter sessions a useful jurisdiction. It appears further, if we go back to the ancient history of quarter sessions, that a court of quarter sessions had a power, if they were in difficulty, of applying to the judge of assize, and asking his advice and assistance in making an order. An appeal of that kind to the judge of assize was not a parting with its jurisdiction by the court of quarter sessions, but was really that which is spoken of by the Lord Chief Justice as a "consultative" act on the part of the court of quarter sessions, that court still retaining and exercising its jurisdiction after the consultation had taken place. But supposing that the court of quarter sessions did not adopt that course, there was still another mode by which any question of law which appeared to them doubtful might be left open for the exercise of the judgment of a higher tribunal. All that was necessary was that the court of quarter sessions, in making its order, should in some way state upon the face of it the elements which had led to their decision. If the court of quarter sessions stated upon the face of the order, by way of recital, that the facts were so and so, and the grounds of its decision were such as were so stated, then, if that which was stated upon the face of the order, in the opinion of any party, was not such as to warrant the order, that party might go to the Court of Queen's Bench, and point to the order as one which told its own story, and ask the Court of Queen's Bench to remove it by certiorari, and when so removed to pass judgment upon it, whether it should or should not be quashed. In that case, as I said just now, the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench was merely a jurisdiction to leave the order standing, or to remove it out of the way. It was not a jurisdiction to substitute for it another or a different order; that would be making the Court of Queen's Bench a court of rehearing or of appeal, in the ordinary sense of the term. Now, if that is the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench, it cannot in any respect be called "consultative;" it is a jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench, as a higher court than the court of quarter sessions, to overthrow and destroy an act of that court, and to remove it out of the way. But then that being, as I think is clear from the cases which have been cited, the origin of the jurisdiction, and the form in which it was exercised during the greater part, if not the whole, of the last century, it is obvious from the more modern cases which have been cited, that, although that jurisdiction has not changed in substance, there has been some change in the form in which it has been appealed to. In modern times the practice has grown up of obtaining opinions from the courts upon special cases. And whereas in the earlier times the orders of courts of quarter sessions did nothing more than state by way of recital the facts which the court had found, and then add the order which the court had made, the more modern cases seem to have assumed rather the form of special cases, as to which, in language loose but not altogether inaccurate, it has been said that the court of quarter sessions asks for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench. In the very case before your Lordships, although in form you find that the dissatisfied party first applied for a certiorari, and then obtained a rule nisi to quash the rate, and on the certiorari the order of the court of quarter sessions was brought up, and the case appended to the order, still when you look at the case itself you find that the parties who stated that case were obviously under the impression that they could induce the Court of Queen's Bench, if it did not simply confirm the order of the court of quarter sessions, to answer a series of questions, after which the case might be sent back, supposing the rate not to be confirmed, to the court of quarter sessions, so that the rate might be amended or modified according to the answers so obtained from the Court of Queen's Bench. Now, it is quite true that this form of the case has given a certain colour to the argument that the Queen's Bench Division was applied to for the purpose of advice, and not for the purpose of making an order. But that is simply upon the form of the special case. The form of the proceedings before the Queen's Bench Division is clear and unmistakable. In the old original form which indicates the foundation and the ground of the jurisdiction the dissatisfied party simply called upon the Court of Queen's Bench to quash the order made by the court of quarter sessions. When this application was made to the Queen's Bench Division it might, as it seems to me, very well demur to answer the various forms of question which I find put in the special case, but whether it did or did not so demur, the party who objected to the rate and to the order of the court of quarter sessions had a right, if that order was an invalid one, to have it quashed and removed out of the way, and the circumstance that there were appended to the special case the questions to which I have referred could not in any way destroy that right of the suitor, if he was otherwise entitled to an order of the court of quarter sessions. That is all that I have to observe upon the form of the special case. It has given rise to a little difficulty, but to no difficulty which is serious when the whole of the circumstances are looked at. I will only add that I have proceeded upon the view of sect. 19 of the Judicature Act of 1873. I am not persuaded that sect. 45 has anything to say to the question. It seems to me that it is quite sufficient to look upon this as what it was, namely, a "rule;" that is to say, an "order" of the Queen's Bench Division, to see that it was the subject of appeal under sect. 19, and to see that if leave were necessary to appeal, which at present I am not convinced of, leave was given in the present case. I shall therefore recommend your Lordships to declare that the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to hear and to determine this appeal upon the merits, and to remit the case to the Court of Appeal with that declaration. But looking to the fact that the Court of Appeal was equally divided, and that, therefore, it was necessary to bring this case to your Lordships' House, and looking still more to the fact that the difficulty or doubt in the case appears to have been pressed upon the respondents by the Court of Appeal, I think I should ask your Lordships to say at the same time that there should be no costs on either side in respect of this appeal.

LORD PENZANCE.—My Lords, I entirely agree with what has fallen from my noble and learned friend. I confess that I feel inclined to base my judgment in this matter entirely upon the simple proposition that the Judicature Act says that there shall be an appeal from all judgments and orders of the High Court of Justice, and that the interpretation clause of the Act says that a "rule" is an "order," and consequently sect. 19 is to be read as if it included the word "rule." If there is to be an appeal from all rules and orders, according to the words of the statute, it seems to me that it would require an overwhelmingly strong case to make out that any particular proceeding which is of the character of the present does not fall within that enactment. The ground on which the supposed exception is placed is shortly this, that this is not a rule or order of the court within the purview of the Act, because the function of the Court of Queen's Bench in these matters is a purely consultative one, that it is the giving of an opinion, and not the making of a judicial order in the exercise of the ordinary jurisdiction of the court. The cases which have been brought before the House appear to me to establish conclusively that that is not a true view of the function which the Court of Queen's Bench before the Judicature Act discharged in respect of these cases. The cases are abundant to show that the Court of Queen's Bench was in the habit of dealing with and reviewing these orders of an inferior court upon the face of them, and if upon the face of them they were found insufficient, of quashing them; if they were not found insufficient they would not be quashed; that is to say, they would be affirmed. That was the function which the court discharged, at a time when the court of quarter sessions were still in the habit of consulting the judges of assize. The practice was for the court of quarter sessions, when they were in doubt upon a question of law, to consult the judge of assize, but notwithstanding that, the Court of Queen's Bench at that time exercised the same jurisdiction which it did up to the time that the Judicature Act passed, of quashing any order of a court of quarter sessions for any insufficiency which appeared upon the face of it. Of course, until the court of quarter sessions set out some facts upon the face of their order, the Court of Queen's Bench could not interfere with it, except upon matters of form; but whenever they did set out facts—and it is shown that for centuries the practice was to set them out whenever they had doubts—the Court of Queen's Bench dealt with the facts as they appeared upon the face of the order, pronounced the order insufficient and quashed it, if they saw reason to do so. Now the action of the Court of Queen's Bench in this matter cannot be considered consultative merely, if the result of what they did was to make an order which dealt with the proceeding itself, and put an end to the order of the court of quarter sessions. If their action in the matter was purely consultative it would follow that they would remit in some form the result of that advice and consultation to the court of quarter sessions, and that that court should act upon it. But the certiorari itself bringing up the proceedings, independently of the order subsequently made upon it, put an end to all further jurisdiction in the court of quarter sessions to deal with the matter. Therefore the Court of Queen's Bench then had the proceeding before them, and could either quash it or let it stand; but the magistrates in quarter sessions were then functi officio, they could no longer deal with the matter either by way of affirming or quashing the order. It seems to me, therefore, that it is abundantly made out that, according to the old practice of the court, the function of the Court of Queen's Bench was that which has been argued for—namely, to consider an order of a court of quarter sessions upon the face of it, and, if the facts were stated upon the face of the order, to deal with them as they appeared upon these proceedings, and to apply the law to those facts, and then either to affirm the order or to quash it. That being so, the question arises whether any change has been effected of late years which ought to lead to a different result as regards this appeal. Now from the case of Reg. v. Kesteven (3 Q. B. 810), it does seem that at first, when attempts were made to vary this mode of proceeding, the Court of Queen's Bench repudiated accepting any function of the kind that they were asked to discharge. They were asked to answer certain questions for the information of the public, but they positively refused to do that, and said that their business was to say whether the order was a good one or a bad one: if it was a good one it was to remain, if it was bad it was to be quashed; but that the court was not justified, according to the practice, in answering questions. Notwithstanding that, it seems that in modern times the practice has grown up of putting before the court something like an ordinary special case in an action, and of asking them, in accordance with their findings on certain questions of fact, to give certain directions, and to remit the case to the court of quarter sessions, and there is no doubt that the special case in this particular case does something of that kind. But although that is so there is in this case, as I suppose there is also in these cases in which this sort of practice has grown up, an order of the court of quarter sessions to begin with. Now, when ordinary special cases are submitted to the opinion of a court of common law, the practice has never been that there is a judgment and then a special case, and that in accordance with the opinion of the court upon that special case that judgment should be affirmed or set aside; but the parties always agree, after stating the facts, that if the court are of opinion one way judgment shall be entered one way, and if the court are of opinion another way judgment shall be entered otherwise. That is the form it assumes when the function is purely consultative. But here the case starts with an order by the court of quarter sessions. At the same time it is evidently upon the face of it intended by the court to travel beyond their proper legal jurisdiction, and to give answers upon certain questions. Now I agree with my noble and learned friend that when that case was brought up upon certiorari, and when one of the parties had moved for and obtained a rule to show cause why the order of the court of quarter sessions should not be quashed, it would be quite competent to the court, if they thought upon the face of the special case and upon the facts therein stated that the order was a bad one, to quash it, and they might do that although the parties may have asked them to give certain directions to the court of quarter sessions as to the way in which they should deal with their order, instead of quashing it. Having before them the order made by the court of quarter sessions, and the facts upon which that order was made, and coming to a legal conclusion that upon those facts the order was one which was contrary to law, it would have been competent to the court to do what those who applied to the court for a rule asked that they should do, namely, to quash the order. Under these circumstances therefore, although some little difficulty has, I think, been introduced into the discussion of the case, by reason of the form in which the parties have endeavoured to obtain the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, nevertheless I think, looking at the form of the proceeding, which is what this House has to deal with, that it is a proceeding in which the Court of Queen's Bench is asked to exercise its original function of quashing an order which is not legally made, and consequently there is no more reason why the order in this rule should not be made the subject matter of appeal than any other order or rule which the court may make; therefore I entirely agree with what my noble and learned friend has proposed.

Lord O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I quite concur with my noble and learned friends. I wish to be understood as basing my opinion upon the plain meaning of sect. 19 of the Judicature Act of 1873, as applied to the very plain facts which are before the House in this case. We have here a "rule" of court, which, according to the interpretation clause of that Act, is to be held an "order" of court. We have a section of the Act giving jurisdiction to the Court of Appeal to review the "orders" of the court, and I fail to ascertain any reason for thinking that the rule of court, which was an order of the court in this case, was not a legitimate subject of appeal under sect. 19. I wish to say that, because I am not convinced that sect. 45 can be safely relied on for the purpose of founding our judgment upon it. Upon the case generally I have only a word or two to say. As has been observed, the whole foundation of the judgment of two of the learned judges in the court below has been based upon the ground of the consultative character of this jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench. Now at common law the Court of Queen's Bench has, as we know, a supreme control over inferior jurisdictions, and its general relation to inferior jurisdictions is not of a consultative, but of a controlling and dictating character. In the particular case before us, no doubt, originally, according to the operation of certain statutes, the court of quarter sessions had a jurisdiction which was not controlled in any way by appeal, and I am not prepared to go with the argument that there has been such a change introduced through the Judicature Acts that we can fairly say that there is to this House an appeal against the decisions of the court of quarter sessions in cases such as we have to deal with here. But there has been undoubtedly an established practice, so long existing as to render it impossible now to call it in question, that the court of quarter sessions may put itself in relation with the Court of Queen's Bench for the purpose of being guided, directed, and controlled as to its own action. That is what has been done in this case. The court of quarter sessions here did state a case, and, that case being stated, it appears to me, for the reason I gave just this moment, that the subsequent proceedings took the matter wholly out of the operation of the special case, and left the court perfectly at large to act according to its practice, and according to what it considered the justice of the case. I observe that, in one of the judgments of the learned judges of the court below, observations are made as to the necessity of avoiding an excessive number of appeals, and as to the necessity of cheap and speedy justice. I go with those observations very strongly, but I cannot shut out from my consideration that this Judicature Act was manifestly intended not to limit appeals, but to extend the power of appeal; and we are bound to assume that there were very good reasons for that on the part of the Legislature. We see that that was the policy of the Act, for we see that a jurisdiction is given to the Court of Appeal, which did not belong to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in most important particulars. With regard to ecclesiastical procedure, with reference to the New Trial Paper, and so on, matters which could not be dealt with by the Court of Exchequer Chamber are dealt with every day by the Court of Appeal. And I am of opinion that we are not at liberty to attempt to limit the policy of the Act which is so clearly presented to us, and to confine the operation of words which appear to me to bear, in common sense and common understanding, but one meaning. That being so, what is there in this case to countervail the plain meaning of the words of this section? I confess that I have failed to see any argument to sustain the statement that the proceeding here was of a consultative character. The distinction between what is consultative, and what is magisterial or commanding, is very fairly and properly exhibited in the cases showing the old practice of the courts of quarter sessions consulting the judges. When a court of quarter sessions had a desire for information, that practice enabled them to go to the judge and consult him, as the foreman of a grand jury now consults the judge every day at the assizes, in order to get from him information. But it was after the information was given by the judge and received by the court of quarter sessions that the decision was made which bound the court of quarter sessions. I may illustrate it in this way: In Ireland, where the judges are applied to by courts of quarter sessions with reference to civil bills and many other things, the judge decides magisterially and decides conclusively; but he is not consulted, he does not advise the people who come before him. Just in the same way, it seems to me, in this case, when the Court of Queen's Bench was approached under the circumstances before us, it was in no sense a consulting for the purpose of receiving from the court the authoritative decision which it gave, and, as it appears to me, could not help giving, according to the settled practice of that court as established in many cases. But if there were nothing but the documents in the case, is it possible to say, upon the face of this certiorari and these orders, that the proceeding was wholly consultative? The certiorari concludes in these words: after requiring the production of all the deeds and documents and so forth, the object is stated to be "that we may cause further to be done thereon what of right and according to the law and custom of England we shall see fit to be done." Not for the purpose of answering a consultation, but of doing that which according to right and justice the Queen's Bench Division thought ought to be done. Then when you come to the forms of the orders you find that, "It is ordered" that a certain day shall be peremptorily given to show cause why the proceedings "should not be quashed for the insufficiency thereof." And then the final order is, "Upon hearing counsel, it is ordered," it is not advised, the case is not sent down, as it was supposed to have been in the judgment of one of the learned judges, with advice given to the court of quarter sessions nothing of the kind; there is an absolute order which everybody is bound to obey. We find it stated by the Lord Chief Justice that these orders of the Court of Queen's Bench had never in any single case been disobeyed within the memory of man. Therefore it seems to me impossible to maintain the supposition of the consultative character of the proceeding. I was struck by the terms of the special case, and certainly some difficulty and some confusion arose from that. The special case, if it were to be taken as a consensual affair, certainly did ask advice, and did not ask decision, and in that respect there might perhaps have been some difficulty. But I ventured to suggest in the course of the argument that that difficulty might fairly be considered to be got over by the fact that after the special case had been framed, and after it had been, I suppose, put before the Court of Queen's Bench, we have here, "by consent of counsel on both sides," an order that a writ of certiorari should issue "to remove into this divisional court the orders" relating to the rate. Now it appears to me that, as soon as the parties by consent obtained that certiorari, there was an end to the operation of the antecedent affair, even if it was consensual. The moment the certiorari was granted and came into active operation all the proceedings were transferred from the one court to the other; and with those proceedings all the jurisdiction of the one court was transferred to the other, and from that moment it became the right of the Court of Queen's Bench to act according to its own established practice, and to do what, according to the terms of the certiorari, it considered "just and fitting to be done;" and from that moment it became, in my opinion, quite immaterial what were the terms of the special case, and how the parties by these terms might, but for the subsequent certiorari, have limited the operation of their demand upon the court. I think, therefore, upon that point there is really no difficulty in the matter. I only wish to repeat that in giving my judgment I proceed upon sect. 19 of the Judicature Act of 1873, applying, as I think it does, to the plain facts of this case.

Order of the Court of Appeal reversed. Declared that the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. Cause remitted with this declaration. No costs of this appeal on either side.

ROSSITER (app.) v. PIKE (resp.). (a)

Salmon fishery — Fishing milldam since 1861 — Obstruction to fish—24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, s. 20.

The appellant, a miller, was convicted by justices under sect. 20 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861 for not causing to be removed and carried away from the waters within his fisheries all obstructions to the free passage of fish in or through his cruives, cribs, and boxes during the annual close time. It was proved that, although there were now at the appellant's milldam no appliances for taking fish, the place was used until 1862, after the passing of the Act, for that purpose, and that there remained still a broken box with fenders over openings of the required size, the bars and cribs having been removed from the weir at that time. When the fenders were down, or partially down, as upon the occasion charged against the appellant, it was now impossible for the fish to ascend to the higher waters; but the appellant's mill would be ruinously injured by lifting the fenders during the whole of the annual close time.

Held (upon a case stated), that there was no ground for the appellant's milldam being now a fishing milldam because it had continued to be so after the passing of the Act of 1861: that sect. 20 did not apply, and that the justices were wrong in convicting the appellant.

Pike (app.) v. Rossiter (resp.) (37 L. T. Rep. 635) discussed and followed.

THIS was a case stated by five of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Devon under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

1. At a petty sessions held at the Guildhall in Totnes, in and for the division of Stanborough and Coleridge, in the county of Devon, on the 8th Oct. 1877, an information preferred by Anthony Pike (hereinafter called the respondent), against John Reap Rossiter (hereinafter called the appellant), charging "for that he the said appellant on the 5th Sept. 1877, then being the occupier of fisheries at the Totnes weir in the parish of Darlington, and the fulling mills in the parish of Totnes, both in the said county of Devon, did not within thirty-six hours after the commencement of the close season for the river Dart cause to be removed and carried away from the waters within his fisheries all obstructions to the free passage of fish in or through his cruives, cribs, and boxes within his fisheries contrary to sect. 20 of the Salmon Fisheries Act 1861," was heard and determined, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted of the said offence, and the justices adjudged him to forfeit all obstructions to the fisheries, to pay the respondent on behalf of the board of conservators of the river Dart by way of penalty the sum of 10s., and also to pay to the respondent the sum of 4l. 2s. 6d. for his costs in that behalf, and also to pay the sum of 10s. for every day he suffered any engines or other obstruction to the free passage of fish to remain unremoved beyond the period prescribed by the Salmon Fishery Act 1861, being 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, s. 20.

2. Upon the defendant's application, a special case was stated, of which the following is the material part:

3. Upon the hearing of the information it was proved on behalf of the respondent by a surveyor of twenty years' standing, that the various parts of the said fisheries were correctly represented by certain plans and models produced. [These fisheries are sufficiently described in the report of the case of Pike (app.) v. Rossiter (resp.) (37 L. T. Rep. 635), which was an appeal against a refusal to convict the same person for breach at the same place of the provisions concerning the weekly close time contained in sect. 22 of the same Act.] This witness also stated that there was a box at the weir, but it was not a perfect box, and that the iron works at the trips, and also the iron work in front of the fenders, had been removed, and that the wooden framework in which the fenders slide could not be removed without damaging the masonry, and that the gratings, &c., might have been removed, from what the witness knew, forty years since.

4. It was proved by another witness who formerly rented the fisheries at the Totnes weir, and at the fulling or tucking mill, that the box was still at the Totnes weir, and fenders were attached to the higher end of it, but the trips had been removed; that there used to be four wooden fenders at the weir, but there were now three iron ones instead, and that the sill pieces were level with the paving; that this witness had rented the fisheries in question for four years, from 1856 to 1859, both inclusive; that the box at each fishery was then used for catching fish; that the gates were now removed, and that there used to be gratings behind them; that the gratings at the back of the fenders were not there now, nor were the gates at the foot, but that the sill pieces still existed; that the keeping the fenders down would prevent fish from ascending to the higher waters of the river unless there was a flood over the weir: that during the years 1856 to 1859 the fenders were opened at twelve o'clock on Saturday nights, and that they were closed on the following night at twelve.

5. It was proved by the complainant that he was clerk to the Dart Board of Conservators, and he laid the information pursuant to a resolution passed by the board. That the weir was built right across the river Dart, and that the box was on the Dartington side. That the dam turned the water into the mill leat for milling purposes, and if the gates and bars in the box were replaced, the effect would be that fish could be caught as they formerly were. That when the fenders were down it was impossible for fish to ascend to the higher waters except there was a flood over the weir. That on the 5th Sept. 1877 the fenders at the weir were only partly open, but neither of them was clear of the water, and that they were in such a condition as to prevent any fish from passing through, and that they were then lifted about a foot or eighteen inches, and that the effect of this partial lifting would be that the weight of water behind would be so great that no fish could ascend, but in all cases the fish would fall back into the pool. That the fenders at the fulling or tucking mill were on the said 5th Sept. 1877 quite closed, and that witness did not know who rented the fulling mill, but that appellant had possession of the fenders, and lifted them when he required it.

6. It was proved by another witness that he had seen fish trying to pass up the box at the weir, but he had always seen them fail in the attempt, and that when the fenders were only partially opened the effect would be to prevent fish passing up.

7. Another witness who worked the weir and tucking mill fisheries for a company for three years, and up to 1862, stated that he fished the trips up to 1862. That when he had charge of the fisheries the fenders were opened at twelve o'clock on Saturday night and closed at twelve o'clock on Sunday night, until the new law came into operation, and afterwards they were opened at twelve o'clock at noon on Saturdays, and closed at six o'clock the following Monday morning, and that during these hours there was a free passage for fish. That the fenders used to be raised by means of a bar at first, and afterwards by means of a handle.

8. A witness who rented the Duke of Cleveland's fishery (not the before-mentioned fisheries, but the next fishery below the weir) from 1863 to 1870 stated that the bars at the bottom and the gates outside were removed in the year 1862; that the fenders used to be lifted up and down by witness as required; that the appellant then kept the keys, and that this witness used to apply to him or at his mills for them, whether the water was plentiful or not. That the appellant used to lend the keys that the fenders might be unlocked, as more fish were then caught by witness in the Cleveland fishery, but this was only done when the water was not required for milling purposes. That the custom used to be to open the fenders at twelve o'clock at noon on Saturdays and close them on the following Monday morning at six o'clock. That in 1870 this witness had a dispute with the appellant because he had not opened the fenders for a whole month, and at this time fish were very scarce; that previous to this time the appellant had received many fish for obliging witness with the keys; that after the 10th July 1878 the fenders at the fishery at the fulling mills were raised, but not at the weir. That witness had nothing to do with the fenders at the fulling mill, it was only the fenders at the weir he had to deal with.

9. It was proved by the clerk to the Endowed Schools Governors for Totnes, who had succeeded to the property formerly held by the Totnes Charity Trustees, that the governors had the management and administration amongst other properties of the Totnes mill, the fulling mill, and weir, a portion of which property was the weir milldam. He produced a certificate from the Special Commissioners of English Fisheries, dated the 13th Dec. 1871, showing the legality of the fishing milldam at the Totnes weir. He also produced another certificate as to the fishery at the fulling mill, and this witness, so far as he knew, considered the fisheries the same now as when they were examined by the special commissioners. That the appellant was then and still was the occupier of the town mills; that the fenders at the weir conducted the waters to the town mills. This witness produced a minute-book of the Charity Trustees, in which, under the date of the 28th Oct. 1862, occurred the following: "The clerk reported that he had met Mr. Eden, the Government Inspector of Fisheries, and with him had viewed the weir trips, and that Mr. Eden had consented to waive the order of the Secretary of State with regard to the ladder in the weir, but the trips at the weir should be removed so that all attempts to make the weir a trip available for fishing should be destroyed;" and that at the time of the inquiry held by the special commissioners on the 13th Dec. 1871, the following occurred in the judgment which he produced, videlicet, "Evidence had been given by the same witness that these (the trips) have been as far back as living memory goes and up to the year 1861."

10. Another witness proved that he was surveyor to the Endowed Schools Governors, and looked after their property, and collected the rents of the mills. He stated that the tucking mill was now and had been for many years used only as a store by Mr. Bowden, and he did not know that appellant occupied it at all. That the bars, cribs, &c. at the weir, and also at the fulling mill, had been removed about sixteen years since; that there were not now appliances there for taking fish. That the sills of the sluices were level with the pavement, and were so placed that they could not be removed without damage to the freehold; that one piece of the sill still remained which was composed of wood; that there was nothing at present there like a box for taking fish, and that the stonework could not be removed without damaging the freehold.

11. It was contended by the solicitor for the appellant that the fulling mill was in the occupation of Mr. John Bowden, and not of appellant, as had been proved by one of the witnesses for the respondent; and that, as the fisheries were reserved in the lease under which the appellant held, he could not be regarded as the occupier of the fisheries, and could not be convicted under the present information. In support of the appellant's case a witness was called who produced a lease from Mr. John Bowden (the original lessee) to the appellant as sub-lessee. It was a lease of the Totnes town mills. In that lease the fisheries and right of fishing (if any) were reserved, and the lease contained a covenant that the trustees should keep the weir in repair. The lease to appellant was dated the 31st July 1877. The witness stated that the original lease for twenty-one years from the trustees to Mr. Bowden was dated the 6th May 1863; that the lease to the appellant contained a recital of the lease to Mr. Bowden. Witness also stated he gave evidence before the special commissioners, and that they decided that the fisheries then at Totnes were legal. That the lease to appellant had been executed so recently as the 31st July 1877, owing to a dispute having arisen between Mr. Bowden and the appellant respecting the use of the water. That this witness had instructions to prepare the lease of 31st July 1877 as far back as 1870, but that owing to the dispute the business had been delayed. This witness stated that the fenders were a part of the apparatus of the mill, and if the fenders were taken away the mill would be of little value.

The justices convicted the appellant because they considered: first, that there were fisheries within the meaning of the statute, with an old fishing milldam belonging thereto; secondly, that the fenders with locks and keys belonging thereto were part of an apparatus for taking fish up to the year 1862, and that recently the old wooden fenders had been replaced by new iron ones; thirdly, that no evidence had been given that the fenders might not be used again as part of an apparatus for catching fish; fourthly, that the appellant is the occupier of the town mills and the Totnes weir or milldam and the fenders attached thereto, and he has the use and control of the fenders at the fulling mill, but by the lease produced under which the appellant holds the fisheries and right of fishing (if any) were reserved; fifthly, that when the fenders at the weir are down, no fish can pass through the box within that fishery and get up the river, and that when the fenders at the fulling mill are down no fish can pass through the box and fenders within that fishery and get up the river; sixthly, that although the mill would be ruinously injured by lifting the fenders during the whole of the annual close time, and partially in the weekly close time, yet it having been proved that the fenders or sliding doors were kept down by the appellant during a prohibited time, although previously to and for some time after the alteration in the law as to close time they had been opened during a weekly close time, the justices considered that the removal of all obstructions to the free passage of fish through the cruives, cribs, boxes, &c., of the fisheries had not been complied with by the appellant as required by the statute.

The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court, therefore are: 1. Whether all the obstructions to the free passage of fish in or through the cruives, cribs, boxes, &c., within the fisheries at the Totnes weir, in the parish of Dartington, in the county of Devon, and the fulling mill in the parish of Totnes, in the same county, had been removed and carried away from the waters within the fisheries within thirty-six hours after the commencement of the close season for the river Dart in accordance with the provisions of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 109), s. 20. 2. Whether under the circumstances before stated the appellant, as the occupier of the Totnes town mills, and having the use and control of the two sets of fenders, is also the occupier of the fisheries at the Totnes weir and the fulling mill, as alleged in the information, and as such occupier of the fisheries is responsible for the removal of all such obstructions as aforesaid, and is properly convicted for not having removed them.

Whereupon the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench was asked upon the said questions of law: Whether or not the said justices were correct in convicting the appellant as aforesaid, and if so the said conviction was to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise then the said information was to be dismissed. And the court was humbly solicited, according to the power vested in the court by the said statute (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), to remit the case to the said justices with the opinion of the court thereon, or to make such further order as to the court might seem fit.

The case was sent back to the justices to restate the questions raised for the opinion of the court; and, in obedience thereto, the justices returned that they intended to raise for the opinion of the said High Court of Justice the following questions, videlicet: Whether, upon the evidence before them as stated in the case they were justified in holding, 1. That there was a fishery within the meaning of the Act. 2. That the fenders as used were obstructions within the definition and meaning of the Act. 3. That the appellant was the occupier of such fishery within the meaning of the Act.

By sect. 20 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 109):

The proprietor or occupier of every fishery for salmon shall, within thirty-six hours after the commencement of the close season, cause to be removed and carried away, from the waters within his fishery, the inscales, hecks, tops, and rails of all cruives, boxes, or cribs, and all planks and temporary fixtures used for taking or killing salmon, and all other obstructions to the free passage of fish in or through the cruives, cribs, and boxes within his fishery; and if any proprietor or occupier omits to remove and carry away in manner aforesaid any things hereby required to be removed and carried away he shall incur the following penalties (that is to say): (1.) He shall forfeit all the engines or other things that are not removed and carried away in compliance with this section. (2.) He shall, for every day during which he suffers such things to remain unremoved beyond the period prescribed by this Act, pay a sum not exceeding ten pounds.

By sect. 25:

Every person who, after the passing of this Act, in waters where salmon are found, constructs a new dam, or raises or alters, so as to create increased obstruction to fish, a dam already constructed, shall attach and maintain attached thereto in an efficient state a fish pass of such form and dimensions as may be determined by the Home-office; and if he do not, such person shall incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

O. Russell, Q.C. (with him Pitt Lewis) argued for the appellant.

J. Paterson (with him Bompas, Q.C.) for the respondent.

The authorities referred to in the argument of Pike (app.) v. Rossiter (resp.) (37 L. T. Rep. 635) were elaborately considered and discussed.

MELLOR J.—I entirely abide by the decision of the former case concerning this weir, under sect. 22 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861. The facts are so nearly the same that the cases, although under different sections, may be said to be identical, with the exception that it is here found that the alteration in the construction of the milldam was made after the passing of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861, instead of before that time, as was supposed at the hearing of the former case. The only question therefore is whether, under the circumstances here stated of the abandonment of the dam for all fishing purposes, the impress of a fishing milldam, which had existed after the passing of the Act, must so remain, notwithstanding the abandonment, as to constitute the place a fishing milldam for all time. I can see nothing in the Act to make me think so; but, on the contrary, in my opinion it cannot be that the Legislature could have intended to make a milldam, because it was once a fishing milldam, always to continue so. It is found in the case that the mill would be ruinously injured by lifting the fenders during the whole of the annual close time, and partially so in the weekly close time. We must take it that the appellant has intentionally abandoned this dam for all purposes of fishing during the last sixteen years; and I think we must hold that he has no longer a fishery in his occupation. I see no great public damage likely to be caused by our so holding, for sect. 25 of the Act provides that the appellant shall be liable in a penalty for not having a fish pass at this dam if he has so altered the dam as to increase the obstruction to the fish. Taking into consideration the state of things before the Act passed, the short continuance of that state of things afterwards and the subsequent abandonment of the fishery, I think our necessary conclusion is that the fishing milldam has long before this been converted and restored to the character of a milldam simpliciter. Being justified, as I think we are, in holding that this is no longer a fishing milldam, it follows that the appellant is free from the obligation which the Act would impose upon him if it were otherwise, and the conviction must be quashed.

MANISTY, J.—I also am of opinion that our judgment must be for the appellant. We are of course bound by the decision of this Division in Pike (app.) v. Rossiter (resp.); and the only further question for us is, whether there is any difference between the facts found now and those there stated, which requires us to hold that the conviction which then failed under sect. 22 ought now to be sustained under sect. 20. It is said that, by reason of the use of this weir and dam as a fishing milldam after the passing of the Act of 1861, the case of Hodgson v. Little, on its second hearing (16 C. B. N. S. 198; 33 L. J. 329, M. C.), is conclusive that this conviction was right; but it seems to me that we are precluded from holding that case to be applicable by the decision in Pike (app.) v. Rossiter (resp.), that this place is not now a fishery. The 25th section of the Act of 1861 seems to contemplate this very case, for there is nothing that I can find to prevent a man from giving up his fishing milldam at any time and using it as a milldam only. If he makes substantial alterations so as to increase the obstruction to the fish, he will be liable to a penalty under that section. He is not here convicted of that offence.

MOYCE v. NEWINGTON. (a)

Sale—Fraud—False pretences—Innocent purchaser—Passing of property—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100.

The plaintiff purchased some sheep in an open market, recently established under a local Act, paid a fair price for them, and removed them to his farm. The person from whom he purchased them had obtained them just before from the defendant for a cheque upon a bank which had no account in his name; but the plaintiff knew nothing of this. When the cheque was dishonoured, the defendant took criminal proceedings against the drawer, and afterwards got him convicted for obtaining the sheep under false pretences. On the day before this conviction, the defendant with a policeman removed the sheep from the plaintiff's to his own farm, and the plaintiff now brought this action to recover them.

Held, that, the property in the sheep having passed to the plaintiff before the defendant had avoided the contract, which he had been induced to enter into by fraud, the provision for restitution upon conviction in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100, had no application, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

THE following considered and written judgment of the court fully describes the facts and arguments as they were adduced at the hearing.

Nov. 7 and 8.—Willoughby, for the plaintiff, moved for judgment.

Grantham, Q.C. and Arbuthnot showed cause for the defendant.

Our. adv. vult.

Dec. 20.—COCKBURN, C.J. (the Court consisted of Cockburn, C.J., Mellor and Field, JJ.)—This was a case tried before me at the last assizes for the county of Kent, in which the action had been brought by the plaintiff to recover a lot of forty-nine sheep under the following circumstances: On the 30th Oct. 1877 the plaintiff, who is a butcher, and who is in the habit of attending cattle and sheep markets, being at Maidstone market, bought of a man named Wale, through a salesman of the market, this flock of forty-nine sheep. The purchase was made in the open market; the price was a fair one, and was paid. The transaction was a regular one, and no blame attached to the plaintiff in respect of it. It turned out, however, that the sheep had been obtained from the defendant, who is a farmer, by Wale, under colour of a purchase, but in reality by false pretences. Proposing to buy the sheep at the price of 48s. a head, Wale gave in payment a cheque on a bank at which he had no funds, and kept no account. The cheque was of course dishonoured. A warrant was taken out against Wale by the defendant on the 25th Oct., and he was afterwards convicted of having obtained the sheep by false pretences, and it must be taken for the present purpose that they were so obtained. It is to be observed that, though the sale from Wale to the plaintiff took place in open market, it was admitted before us that the market having been recently established by the corporation of Maidstone under a local Act, was not one in respect of which the protection arising from a sale in market overt would attach. The sheep were taken to the plaintiff's premises at Seale, which is some distance from Maidstone, and arrived there on the 31st, the ensuing day. On the 6th Nov. the defendant, having in the meantime set the police to work, and having learned what had become of the sheep, went with a police officer to the plaintiff's premises, and there took possession of the sheep, which were afterwards removed to his own farm. On the 7th Nov. Wale was convicted of obtaining the sheep by false pretences. The sheep being already in the plaintiff's possession, no order of restitution was asked for. The question under the circumstances is which of the two, the plaintiff or defendant, is entitled to the sheep. Although, if the matter rested on abstract principle, it might be open to be contended that, inasmuch as to make a valid contract both parties must intend to be bound by it, consequently, where in an apparent contract of sale the buyer intends to get the goods but not to pay for them, but to defraud the seller, the contract fails to take effect and though the seller intended the property to pass, yet that the contract failing to take effect the property still remains unaltered, yet the question is now so concluded by authority as to be no longer open to discussion. We must now take it to be settled—it is unnecessary to go through the cases which are set out in Mr. Benjamin's work—that, though a seller is induced to sell by the fraud and false pretences of the buyer, and though it is competent to the seller by reason of such fraud to avoid the contract, yet till he does some act so to avoid it, the property remains in the buyer, and that if he in the meantime has parted with the thing sold to an innocent purchaser, the title of the latter cannot be defeated by the original seller. The reasoning on which this conclusion is based may not appear altogether consistent with principle, and agreeing in the result we should prefer to accept the view of the American Courts as stated in the case Root v. French (11 Wendell, 570), a case decided in the Supreme Court of Judicature of the State of New York, according to which the preference thus given to the right of the innocent purchaser is treated as an exception to the general law, and is rested on the principle of equity that, where one of two innocent parties must suffer from the fraud of a third, the loss should fall on him who enabled such third party to commit the fraud. But on whatever ground it may be said to rest, the law must be taken to be now definitely settled. The question, which in some cases might be a very material one, as well as one of some nicety, namely, what on the part of the defrauded seller, short of retaking possession of the thing sold, will amount to an avoidance of the contract, does not arise in the present instance. The defendant, not knowing what had become of his sheep, or where to find Wale, his buyer, had done and could do nothing beyond giving notice to the police up to the time when the sheep were bought by the plaintiff. We must take it, therefore, as incontestable that, but for the subsequent conviction of Wale for having obtained these sheep by false pretences, no question could be raised as to the title of the plaintiff. But it is contended that by reason of such conviction the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the provision of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100, which enacts that where property has been obtained (inter alia) by false pretences, on conviction of the party so obtaining them, restitution shall be made to the party by whom they have been so obtained. But we are clearly of opinion that this enactment, which is in these terms, "If any person guilty of any felony or misdemeanor in stealing, taking, obtaining, extorting, embezzling, converting, or disposing of, or in knowingly receiving any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, shall be indicted for such offence, by or on behalf of the owner of the property, or his executor or administrator, and convicted thereof, in such case the property shall be restored to the owner," has no application to such a case as the present. The language applies, and is obviously intended to apply, to cases, and to those only, in which possession has been obtained without the property passing. This was the construction put on the statute by the court in Lindsay v. Cundy (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 348), and, though the view there taken by the court on the primary question as to whether a contract had been made by the seller with the person obtaining the goods was reversed on appeal, the second ground of the judgment, which is the one immediately applicable to the present case, remains unshaken, and we have no hesitation in adhering to it. And it is strongly confirmed by the case of Horwood v. Smith (2 T. R. 750), which was a case of sheep stolen, and sold by the thief in market overt, and in which, subsequently to the sale, the thief was convicted of the larceny; yet it was held that, as the conviction did not take place till after the sale, the owner was not entitled to restitution under the 21 Hen. 8, c. 11. In the present case, as in the foregoing, there was no property in the prosecutor at the time of the conviction. It had been parted with by a contract, which, though under the circumstances voidable, ceased on the sale before it had been avoided to be any longer voidable, and as to which therefore the right of the plaintiff had become indefeasible. It cannot have been the intention of the statute to defeat it nevertheless, and by the mere conviction of the fraudulent purchaser to deprive the innocent buyer of the right which, according to the decisions in the series of cases already referred to, had become absolute in him. Our judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff. Judgment for the plaintiff.

REG. v. HOLBROOK. (a)

Libel—Newspaper—Authority to editor—Protection of proprietor—6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 7.

Upon a criminal information for libel it was proved that the three defendants, the proprietors of the newspaper in which the libel appeared, took an active part in the management of the paper, but had given a general authority to a competent editor to publish whatever he thought proper in the literary part of it, which contained the libel. It was also proved that at the time of the publication of the libel, one of the defendants was absent from home on account of ill health, and that neither of them had given any authority for, or consent to, or had any knowledge of the publication of the libel. The jury found that the defendants had not brought themselves within the protection provided by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 7, and convicted them all.

Held by Cockburn, C.J. and Lush, J. (dissentientes Mellor, J.), that the direction at the trial was defective, in not explaining that a general authority to an editor to conduct the business of a newspaper, in the absence of anything to give it a different character, must be taken to mean an authority to conduct it according to law; and that the verdict—at least as to the absent defendant—being inconsistent with that principle, there must be a new trial.

This was a rule nisi for a third new trial on the ground of misdirection in a criminal information for libel, which had been twice tried at the Winchester Assizes. Upon both occasions the jury had convicted the defendants.

A similar rule was argued on the 30th Nov. 1877, after the first trial, and is reported at length L. Rep. 3 Q. B. Div. 60; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 530. The rule was then made absolute by Cockburn, C.J. and Lush, J. (Mellor, J. dissenting.) In consequence, the second trial took place at the spring assizes 1878, before Grove, J.

June 20.—Charles, Q.C. and A. L. Smith, showed cause on behalf of the prosecution.

Cole, Q.C. and Folkard supported the rule.

The facts, the direction of the learned judge, and the arguments are fully described in the several judgments of the court.

Our. adv. vult.

Dec. 20.—LUSH, J.—The question presented for our decision on this rule is substantially that which arose upon the former motion for a new trial, and which was argued in November of the last year. Upon the first trial it was proved that the literary department of the newspaper in question had been intrusted to an editor, who inserted in it what he thought fit in the way of articles, correspondence, &c.; that of the three defendants who were proprietors of the paper, each took the management of a particular department of the business other than the literary department; that at the time of publication of the libel, one of them was absent from home on account of ill health, and that neither of them had given any authority for or consent to the publication complained of, or had any knowledge of the libellous article until his attention was called to it, after the paper was in circulation. My brother Lindley on that occasion ruled, as a matter of law, that as an authority had been given to the editor to edit the paper, and to insert what he thought fit without supervision or control, the libel could not be said to have been published without the authority of the defendants within the meaning of the Act, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 7. The Lord Chief Justice and myself took a different view of the meaning of that section, and for reasons we then gave, we held that the "authority" mentioned in the 7th section was an authority to publish the libel, and that the general authority given to the editor to use his discretion in admitting or rejecting articles or correspondence, was not of itself sufficient under the circumstances to make the proprietor criminally responsible. Upon the second trial, the ruling in which is now in question, the evidence of authority was carried no further than on the former occasion; but instead of holding as a matter of law that the 7th section of the Act did not protect the defendant, the learned judge left the question of authority to the jury, but without such an explanation of the meaning of the section as appeared to the majority of the court on the previous occasion to be required in order to enable the jury properly to apply it to the facts. Other grounds, such as want of due care and caution, the omission to stop the sale of papers outstanding in the hands of retail sellers when the attention of the two defendants who were in Portsmouth was called to the objectionable article, and the inadvertent sale in the shop afterwards of another copy of the paper were also put forward; but the jury must have found their verdict on the question of authority, inasmuch as they implicated the absent defendant, against whom, these which I may call, minor matters of complaint were not and could not have been made. As my brother Mellor, after a second argument, retains the opinion which he expressed before, and as my brother Grove, as I infer from his summing-up, rather inclines to the same opinion, I have carefully reviewed the authorities and the argument; and after the best consideration which I can give to the case, I am constrained to hold that the construction of the Act which the Lord Chief Justice and myself adopted on the former occasion, is the true construction. It must be admitted that the 7th section upon which the question turns is not so precise and clear as it might have been. In order to ascertain the intentions of the Legislature, we must have recourse to the well-known rule of construction laid down by Coke, C.J. in Heydon's case (3 Rep. 7a.): "For the wure and true construction of all statutes in general," he says, "(be they penal, or beneficial, restrictive or enlarging of the common law), four things are to be discerned and considered: First. What was the common law before the making of the Act? Secondly. What was the mischief and defect for which the common law did not provide? Thirdly. What remedy the Parliament hath resolved and appointed. Fourthly. The true reason of the remedy; and then the office of the judges is always to make such construction as shall suppress the mischief, and advance the remedy. "Pursuing this line of reasoning, the first question is: What was the law as regards the criminal liability of the proprietor of a newspaper for libel? Libel on an individual is, and has always been regarded as both a civil injury and a criminal offence. The person libelled may pursue his remedy for damages, or prefer an indictment, or, by leave of the court, a criminal information, or he may both sue for damages, and indict. It is ranked amongst criminal offences because of its supposed tendency to arouse angry passion, provoke revenge, and thus endanger the public peace; but the libeller is not the less bound to make compensation for the pecuniary or other loss or injury which the libel might have occasioned to the person libelled. In this respect libel stands on the same footing as an assault, or any other injury to the person. But the publication of a libel, when prosecuted as a criminal offence, was treated upon an exceptional principle, and with exceptional severity. The maxim Respondet superior, which (with rare exceptions founded on reasons not applicable to libel, which I will presently notice) pertains to civil liability only, was applied to an indictment for libel; and the proprietor of a newspaper in which a libellous article had been inserted, was held to be criminally, as well as civilly responsible for it, though he had never authorised it, or had anything to do with its insertion, and whether the editor had inserted it by negligence or wilfully. It was not so in other cases of personal injury. If a coachman, accustomed to drive, were, while engaged on his master's business, by carelessness or furious driving, to cause the death of another, the master would be liable to an action for damages, but not to a criminal prosecution. The offending servant alone could be charged with the manslaughter; and if the coachman were to be guilty of such an offence while using his master's carriage without his permission and upon his own business, or if while doing his master's work he were wantonly to assault another, the master would not be liable even to an action for damages. Subject to the exceptions already referred to, the criminal law makes no one punishable for an offence but the person who either committed it or incited and procured the other to commit it or who aided in its commission. I need only select two cases from the books to show what the criminal law of libel was. The one is Rex v. Walter (3 Esp. 21). "A criminal information had been filed against the proprietor of the Times for a libel on a lady. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and proved at the trial that although he was the proprietor of the paper, he had nothing to do with the conducting of it; that he resided entirely in the country, and that his son was concerned in the conducting of the paper, without any interference on his part. Mr. Erskine, his counsel, contended upon this evidence that though his client might be liable in a civil suit for all acts of his agent, it was otherwise when he had to answer criminally; that though the proving him to be the proprietor of the paper might prima facie subject him criminally, it was otherwise when it was clearly shown that the fact of the publication was not his, nor done with his privity; that actus non facit reum nisi sit mens rea, so that if the act of publication which constituted the crime was proved to be that of another, the jury would be bound to acquit the defendant. Lord Kenyon said he was clearly of opinion that the proprietor of a newspaper was answerable criminally for the acts of his servants or agents for misconduct in the conducting of the paper; that this was not his opinion only, but that of Lord Hale, Justice Powell, and Justice Foster, all high law authorities, to which he subscribed. This was the old and received law for above a century, and was not to be broken in upon by any new doctrine upon libel." This occurred in 1808. I have cited the case in full from the report, because of its exact analogy in all material circumstances to the present case. The other case is that of Colburn v. Patmore, tried in 1834, and reported in 1 C. M. & R. 73. A criminal information had been filed against Mr. Colburn, as the proprietor of the Court Journal, for a libel on a lady. He pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to pay a fine of 100*l.* and to be imprisoned till the fine was paid. He paid the 100*l.*, and then brought an action against his editor for breach of duty in inserting the libellous paragraph alleging that it was done without his authority or knowledge, and in violation of the contract between them. This allegation was fully proved, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff for a sum by way of damages, which included the 100*l.* penalty. A motion was then made to arrest the judgment on the ground that the plaintiff was in contemplation of law a party to the offence, and one wrongdoer cannot have in a court of law contribution or redress against another who was his accomplice. The judgment was ultimately arrested because of a defect in the pleadings, it not being alleged that the plaintiff did not sanction the circulation of the journal after he knew of the libel, and so became actual "publisher" of the libel. But the case is important for the uncertainty which evidently prevailed, both on the bench and between the counsel on both sides as to the state of the law. The late Mr. Justice Maule was counsel for the defendant, the editor, and it never occurred to his acute and well-informed mind to suggest that Mr. Colburn brought the mischief upon himself by pleading guilty, and that he might have defended himself by proving the real facts. This would have been an obvious ground of defence for his client. On the contrary, he admits in his argument "the law has made the proprietor of a newspaper criminally answerable for the publication of a libel in its columns, whether the libel was inserted with or without his knowledge;" and his only argument was that though the plaintiff was actually innocent, the two parties were in the eye of the law equally guilty. Sir Wm. Follett, on the part of Mr. Colburn, contended that as his client was, in fact, innocent, the rule of law which prohibited a claim for redress by one wrongdoer against another ought not to be held applicable. Baron Alderson remarked, in the course of the argument, "Is it not more correct to say that the plaintiff was actually ignorant, but 'legally ignorant'?" He afterwards remarks: "A master is presumed to authorise the insertion of a libel; in other cases he is not presumed to authorise the wilful act of his servant either in civil or criminal proceedings. Does the proprietor of a newspaper give authority to the editor to publish everything libellous or not?" This then was the state of the law before the Act was passed. The proprietor of a newspaper which contained a personal libel was treated as a criminal, though he had not himself committed the criminal act, or procured or incited another to commit it, nor aided in its commission, nor knew that it was about to be committed. I think it cannot be doubted from the tenor of the Act itself, apart from its historical origin, that the intention of the Legislature was, amongst other things, to mitigate the rigour of the common law in this particular, and to place the proprietor of a newspaper in the same position as any other employer, whose servant had in the course of his employment committed an offence against, and to the injury of a third person. The Act is entitled "An Act to amend the law of libel," and its declared objects are—first, the better protection of private character; secondly, the more effectually securing the liberty of the press; and thirdly, the better preventing abuses in exercising the said liberty." The second object forms the subject of several sections, and by them the defendant in an action for libel is allowed to give in evidence in mitigation of damages (under certain conditions) an apology; and to pay money into court; and the defendant in an indictment or information is permitted to plead the truth as a justification provided he shows that the publication was for the public benefit; and to be entitled to costs upon a verdict of not guilty. Between these latter provisions comes the 7th section, the true meaning of which is the question now before us. The words are: "Whosoever upon the trial of any indictment or information for the publication of a libel, under the plea of not guilty, evidence shall have been given which shall establish a presumptive case of publication against the defendant by the act of

REG. v. HOLBROOK.

REG. v. HOLBROOK.

any other person by his authority, it shall be competent to such defendant to prove that such publication was made without his authority, consent, or knowledge, and that the said publication did not arise from want of due care and caution on his part." Although the section is wanting in precision, it seems clear that the word "publication," wherever it occurs in the section, points to the libel and not to the newspaper. The section says nothing about newspapers. It applies to any printed or written slander whether contained in a newspaper, book, pamphlet, handbill, or letter. What it deals with is the libel, and nothing more. Again, the clause does not say what is to be the effect of proving the negative; but there can be as little doubt that it means it to be an entire defence entitling the defendant to a verdict and not merely to a mitigation of punishment. The effect of it, read by the light of previous decisions, and read so as to make it remedial, must be, that an authority from the proprietor of a newspaper to the editor to publish what is libellous is no longer to be as it formerly was, a presumption of law, but a question of fact. Before the Act the only question of fact was whether the defendant authorised the publication of the paper; now it is whether he authorised the publication of the libel. It is true that the production of the paper which contained the libel, coupled with proof that the defendant is the proprietor, is prima facie evidence that he caused the publication of the libel, and the onus is on him to prove the negative. But when he has proved that the literary department was entrusted entirely to an editor, the question what was the extent of the authority which that employment involved, is to be tried upon the principle which is applicable to all other questions of authority; and I think the jury ought to be told, in this as in every other case, that criminal intention is not to be presumed, but is to be proved; and that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, a person who employs another to do a lawful act, is to be taken to authorise him to do it in a lawful and not in an unlawful manner. This is the doctrine which is applied to other cases of wrong done by servants when it is sought to fix with criminal liability the employer; and the statute intended to place libel upon the same footing in this respect as other torts. Although the employer is liable civilly for such a wrong, this is not upon the presumption of authority, but by virtue of the maxim Respondent superior, which, on grounds of policy and general convenience, puts the master in the same position as if he had done the wrong himself—a maxim which, as I before observed, pertains to civil, and not, except in rare instances, to criminal liability. I am far from saying that the mere appointment of an editor without supervision or control, may not, in some cases, involve an authority to publish libels. If the paper was a calumnious paper, its general character would negative the ordinary presumption of innocent intention and fairly lead to the inference that the proprietor authorised the insertion of slanderous articles. But that cannot be said of a respectable paper, as the one in question is admitted to be. The exceptionable class of cases to which I have referred are public nuisances. In these cases the wrong is done to the public, and not to any particular individual; and in that case no one can sue for damages unless he happens to have sustained some exceptional injury. Of such a class the case of Reg. v. Stephens (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 702) is an illustration. The workmen of the owner of a colliery quarry had stacked the refuse of the quarry by the side of a navigable river in such a manner that it fell into the stream and obstructed the navigation; and although the owner proved that he lived at a distance and did not know what was being done, and although he had given directions to the contrary, he was held criminally liable for the nuisance. Here the wrong was common to all the public, and the remedy by indictment was the only remedy. This was the ground of the decision. Libel, as I have already observed, does not belong to this class, but to the ordinary class of offences against the person. I am therefore of opinion that the direction to the jury was imperfect, and the verdict wrong, and consequently that the verdict ought to be set aside.

MELLOR, J.—The question for consideration in this case arose upon the trial before Grove, J., of a criminal information against the defendants, who are the proprietors and publishers of the Portsmouth Times and National Gazette, for a libel on a Mr. Howard contained in that newspaper. On the trial the verdict passed against all the defendants, who were all found guilty of the offence. There had been a former trial of the case, in which the judge had directed a verdict to be entered against all the defendants on the ground that they did not, upon the evidence then given, come within the true intent and meaning of the 7th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96. A rule for a new trial was thereupon obtained by Mr. Cole, and afterwards made absolute, on the ground that the judge ought not to have withdrawn the question from the jury, but should have left it to them, upon that evidence, with a suitable direction. The only respect in which my present judgment differs from that I gave in the former case is that I think that I was wrong in holding that the judge was right in withdrawing the evidence from the consideration of the jury and deciding it himself. On the last trial Grove, J. left the question to the jury, with a careful and elaborate summing up, and they thereupon found a verdict of guilty against all the defendants. Upon the hearing of the present rule Mr. Cole, for the defendants, made several objections to the verdict, viz., on the ground that it was against the weight of the evidence, and on the ground of misdirection by the judge. On the argument against that rule, the only substantial question turned upon the construction of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, entitled, "An Act to amend the law respecting defamatory words and libel." The recital to the first section shows the object of the Act to have been for the better "protection of private" character, and for more "effectually securing the liberty of the press," and for better preventing "abuses in exercising the said liberty." The section upon which the matter more particularly depends is the 7th, which enacts "that whensoever upon the trial of an indictment or information for the publication of a libel, under the plea of not guilty, evidence shall have been given which shall establish a presumption of publication, against the defendant by the act of any other person, by his authority it shall be competent to such defendant to prove that such publication was made without his authority, consent, or knowledge, and that the said publication did not arise from want of due care and caution on his part." I regret that there exists a difference of opinion amongst the judges who heard the argument as to the true construction of this statute. I have read the very able arguments of my Lord Chief Justice and my brother Lush with care, and regret that I am not able to come to the same conclusion with them. I admit the force of their reasoning, but it does not satisfy all the difficulties in the construction which press upon my mind. I am of opinion therefore that the rule should be discharged, and that the verdict should stand. The several defendants were joint proprietors of the newspaper in question, and each contributed his assistance in various departments to the management and publication of the same, but neither of them took part in the editorial management of it; but that department was by the defendants devolved upon a manager named Green, who, it appeared on the evidence, had procured the article in question to be written, and had caused it to be inserted in the newspaper. The defendants were not any of them aware of the insertion of the offensive article in the newspaper until after the publication thereof, when their attention was called to it. I do not stop to refer to the subsequent sale of a single paper, or to the steps taken on the part of the defendants to stop the further circulation of the newspaper, when they became aware of the libel. I consider that the evidence of Mr. Green, the manager appointed by the defendants, raises the real question in the case, and it is upon that evidence that I base my opinion. Mr. Green being called as a witness on the part of the defendants said that, "they (the defendants) leave it entirely to my discretion what I shall put in the paper; they appointed me with general authority to conduct the paper, they have never taken notice of my articles one way or the other, they have never found fault with the articles." It is difficult to conceive of an authority more complete or unfettered; and it appears to me that by so constituting Mr. Green the editor, with such authority, the defendants must be taken to have authorised the insertion of all matter appearing in the newspaper in question. The recital in the statute defines one main object of it to have been "the better protection of private character," as well as the "more effectually securing the liberty of the press," which I concede to be a perfectly reasonable object. The words are, "Whenever, upon the trial of any indictment or information for the publication of a libel, under the plea of not guilty, evidence shall have been given which shall establish a presumptive case of publication against the defendant by the act of any other person by his authority, it shall be competent to such defendant to prove that such publication was made without his authority, consent, or knowledge." Now, I think that these words may well be satisfied by permitting the defendant to negative in point of fact the presumption which before arbitrarily prevailed, and could not be controverted on the trial by giving in evidence the real facts. For instance, as proprietors they might have expressly forbidden the insertion of some specific libel in the paper, and have ordered it to be destroyed; nevertheless, by accident, or by design, or misunderstanding, it might have got into the newspaper against their order and without their consent. Again, they may have expressly forbidden the editor to insert any article of a defamatory character without their express authority, but the editor may nevertheless have inserted it in the newspaper without their knowledge. Other circumstances may be imagined in which, libels may have been inserted in the newspaper, and for which but for this section, the defendants would have been liable as upon an actual authority. But to apply it to a case like the present, where the fullest authority was given to insert any article at the discretion of the editor without restriction as to their character and nature, seems strangely at variance with the recited object of the statute—viz., "for the better preventing abuses in the exercise of such liberty;" but it was contended that the statute did protect proprietors of newspapers in all cases in which they had not specially known or authorised the manner of the specific libel. I fear that if such a construction of this section should prevail, the other objects recited in the statute—viz., "the better protection of private character" and preventing abuses in exercising the said "liberty of the press" would be utterly lost sight of, and it would become more properly speaking, a statute for the greater protection of newspaper proprietors, and for the more effectual encouragement of the sale of newspapers containing libellous articles. Another main consideration which influences my opinion, is the increased difficulty which it introduces, and imposes upon a party seeking redress in a case of a scandalous libel, in which the obtaining of damages can afford no adequate satisfaction. It is true that the cases of Reg. v. Walter and of Colburn v. Patmore, which established the criminal liability of a newspaper proprietor for the acts of his servants, were supposed to have inflicted a great hardship upon the defendant, which cases were doubtless in the mind of the framer of the statute in question; yet it by no means follows that he contemplated the giving of an entire immunity from liability on the part of the newspaper proprietors; and it appears to me, from the recitals in the statute and the nature of its provisions, that it was not intended absolutely to reverse the rule laid down by Lord Kenyon in Reg. v. Walter. I cannot help thinking that clearer and simpler language and different recitals would have been adopted had such been the case. It is argued however that unless such be the meaning of the section it will be entirely nugatory. I cannot bring myself to that view of the statute; but, as I have already said, I think that many cases may be suggested in which the objects of the statute may be satisfied, without so construing the words used. Should, however, such construction prevail, it will throw the greatest obstacles in the way of a prosecutor desiring to proceed by indictment or information for a serious and scandalous libel; how is the person defamed to proceed to punish the libeller? If he attacks the proprietor as the person who profits by the libel, and therefore apparently the right person to proceed against, he may be met by evidence on the trial, that such proprietor had nothing to do with the actual management of the newspaper, but merely provided the capital necessary for its establishment, and his only interference the receiving of the profits arising from the sale. How is the prosecutor to find out the actual libeller, whether proprietor, editor, or correspondent, and how is he to prove his identity? Surely if the wide construction contended for had been intended by the framer of the Act, provision would have been made for the registering of the editor or author who was responsible for the libel and for enabling the prosecutor to discover who he was. Even then it might be that the editor was a man of straw, without the means of satisfying any fine or the costs of any prosecution which on conviction might be imposed upon him; he might be a person alike destitute of character and principles, hired only for his skill in defamation, and his capacity to create a wretched craving to read the scandalous and libellous contents of the paper which he was hired to conduct. This is a consideration which much influences my opinion seeing that no means are provided in a criminal case by discovery by interrogatories or otherwise for ascertaining the real author or contributor. In fact, the result must be, that however scandalous the libel, the person defamed can have no real redress criminally against the actual libeller as he, being upon the hypothesis a man of straw, can pay neither fine nor costs. It may, however, be asked what is then the provision "for more effectually securing" the "liberty of the press," if the meaning of the section be limited, as suggested by me? I find a ready answer in the provisions of the 2nd and 6th sections which enable a person charged criminally with libel, to plead that the substance of the libel is true; and in case of action that it was inserted without malice, and that before action he had tendered an apology, which provisions form a most material alteration in the law heretofore in force with regard to the law of libel. On the trial of the present information, no doubt could be suggested that a presumptive case of publication by authority of the defendants had been established, and the only question which then remained was whether the evidence given on behalf of the defendant negatived the presumption that the libel in question had been published without their authority, consent or knowledge, and that the said publication did not arise from want of due care or caution on their part. I am of opinion that the evidence given on the part of the defendants wholly failed to establish such a defence under the statute, but on the contrary warranted the jury in finding them guilty on both divisions of the proposition which were essential to their defence. An unlimited discretion and authority had been, in fact, conferred on Mr. Green, the editor, to insert articles of whatever nature and character he might deem expedient to insert, and their consent was involved in the same authority; and therefore unless it can be successfully contended, that the authority, consent, or knowledge, mentioned in the exempting clause of the section, requires the prosecutor to prove that the particular specific libel must have been actually authorised, known, and approved, in each case, I cannot but think that the evidence sufficed to warrant the conclusion at which the jury arrived. It was observed during the argument, that as a general rule, an authority to an agent to conduct a commercial business, does not extend to enable such agent by implication to make his principal liable for a crime committed by such agent. Now this may be true as a general proposition, where a crime is committed by an agent, beyond the scope of his authority, without the consent of his principal, but it has no application to a business or commercial speculation of this description, where, in the very nature of things, it is essential to the prosperity of the paper that articles of very various character and description should be inserted. Indeed the cases of Rex v. Walter and Colbourn v. Patmore show that this must be so, as the decisions in those cases proceeded upon the principle that in such a case the liability of the proprietor and superior resulted from the act of the servant. In fact Mr. Green, in the management of the editorial department, was the alter ego of each of the defendants, and was in fact authorised to insert in every issue of the newspaper, whatever matter he considered suitable and likely to increase its circulation, and the insertion of the libel in question in the newspaper was clearly within the scope of his authority. As I cannot believe that the object of the statute was to require prosecutors, in such cases, to prove an actual authority or consent to the specific libel, I cannot do other than express my opinion that the jury were justified in finding the defendants guilty. I am further of opinion, although it is not necessary in order to discharge this rule to decide it, that there was a question upon the evidence fit for the consideration of the jury, whether the publication in question arose from want of due care or caution on the part of the defendants, and I think that the jury might well think that the defendants failed to show that it did not so arise. It appears to me that for proprietors of a newspaper to devolve upon an editor the entire control and unfettered discretion as to what articles he shall insert without requiring him to abstain from the insertion of all defamatory matter, or without making some provision for supervision by the defendants, who are the parties interested in the speculation, does exhibit a want of due care or caution on their part. The object of an editor is generally to make the paper sell and to become a profitable speculation to his employers, and unhappily the insertion of sensational or defamatory articles, has too often a great tendency to bring about so profitable a result. I think, therefore, there was evidence that the defendants did not use due care and caution in entrusting Mr. Green with unfettered authority, in the management of the editorial department of their newspaper, and I am of opinion, therefore, that on all grounds the rule should be discharged.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The question in this case is one of considerable importance as regards the law of libel, inasmuch as it involves the construction which is to be put on the 7th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96; an enactment passed to relieve the proprietors of public journals from the heavy responsibility, so far as the criminal law was concerned, which rested on them before in respect of libellous matters published in such journals, without their authority, knowledge, or consent. The state of the law which this enactment was intended to remedy, was in my opinion inconsistent with the first and common principles of justice, and one which was discreditable to the legislation of this country. It had been laid down authoritatively, at a time when perhaps less liberal views as to the liberty of the press prevailed, that the proprietor of a public journal though absent, and wholly ignorant of matters inserted in the journal by his editor, was nevertheless responsible, not only civilly, but also criminally, if the matter so inserted were libellous—in direct contravention, I cannot but think, of the fundamental principle that, to constitute guilt there must be a mens rea—an intention to violate the law. It was to remedy this state of the law that the statutory enactment, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 7, was passed with which we have here to deal. It provides that when “evidence shall have been given which shall establish a presumptive case of publication against the defendant by the act of any other person by his authority, it shall be competent to such defendant to prove that such publication was made without his authority, consent, or knowledge, and that the said publication did not arise from want of due care and caution on his part.” The question is as to what will satisfy the exigency of the terms by which immunity is thus given to the proprietor on the condition of his showing that he has not given authority for the publication of the libel. In the first place, would it be enough for the defendant to show that he had not specifically authorised the insertion of the article or matter complained of, if it should appear that he had given authority to insert matter, whether libellous or innocent, at the discretion of the editor? I answer unhesitatingly in the negative. But it appears to me equally untenable to say that, because a proprietor intrusts the conduct of a public journal to the plenary discretion of an editor, he thereby gives authority to the editor to commit a breach of the law by the insertion of libellous matter. In the first place, let me ask if the principal in appointing and giving authority to his editor were expressly to prohibit the insertion of any libellous matter in the paper, would not, so far as the question of authority is concerned, such express prohibition be sufficient to satisfy the statute? I think the answer must be in the affirmative; for what, unless he himself superintends the insertion of every article, in which case the statute would be useless, can the proprietor do more? But surely the prohibition not to violate the law is impliedly involved in every service in which an agent is employed, and in which the law may possibly be broken by such agent. Take the case of an agent employed to buy goods on which a duty is payable, and who, to benefit his employer, buys smuggled goods unknown to the employer. The agent would be criminally liable, the employer would not. As it seems to me, the proprietor of a public journal, who gives general authority to the editor he employs is entitled to assume that the editor, knowing the law as well as himself, will take care for his own sake as well as for the sake of his employer to keep within the law by inserting nothing which would bring himself within the reach of the law, either criminally or civilly, or make his principal liable in damages which he again would be liable to make good to his employer. I am at a loss to see to what cases the statutory provision in question would be applicable if not to this. It is notorious that in many, perhaps in the majority of instances, public journals are carried on for the benefit of proprietors, who find the necessary capital, by editors employed by them and to whom the conduct of the paper is committed without any immediate control or interference of the principal. In my opinion it was intended to exempt principals so circumstanced, if able to satisfy a jury that they had not authorised, directly or indirectly, the insertion of libellous matter, from being held criminally liable. It is to be observed that in both the striking cases referred to by my brother Lush, those of Rees v. Walter and Colburn v. Patmore, as also in the case of Rees v. Gutch (Moo. & Mal. 433), the conduct of the journal had been left by the proprietor, as in this case, to the management of an editor while the proprietor, absent at a distance, had been ignorant of the fact of the libellous matter having been published. It was to meet such cases I cannot doubt that this section of Lord Campbell's Act was directed. It was a remedial Act, and one which as bringing the law into harmony with general principles, should receive a liberal interpretation. I think we should be defeating what was intended to be its operation if we were to hold that a general authority given to an editor to manage a public journal involved an authority to publish libellous matter, and that a proprietor giving such authority still remained criminally liable for a libel, without specific authority expressed or implied, for publishing such libel or any consent or knowledge thereto on his part. It is true that the terms in which the authority was given to the editor in the present case at first sight seem large. According to the evidence of the editor, the defendants “left it entirely to his discretion what he should put into the paper. They gave him general authority to conduct the paper, they never took notice of his articles, one way or the other.” But what is this beyond what is implied in the general authority given to an editor by every proprietor? What is this more than in extenso what would be implied in a general authority to conduct the paper? In my opinion it would be to put much too strained and unwarranted a construction on such a general authority to treat it as giving a license to the editor to publish libels in a paper he was employed to conduct. I have no hesitation in saying where a general authority is given to an editor to publish libellous matter at his discretion, it will avail a proprietor nothing to show that he had not authorised the publication of the libel complained of. It is equally clear that though in the authority originally given to the editor no license to publish libellous matter may have been contained, still such an authority may be inferred from the conduct of the parties, as for instance from the fact that other libels have been published in the paper which have come to the knowledge of the proprietor, and without his remonstrance or interference, or the removal of the editor, from which the assent of the proprietor might well be inferred. I do not, therefore, feel the apprehension which has been expressed of the mischief which would result from the immunity which newspaper proprietors would derive from holding them free from criminal responsibility when they employ an editor with general authority to conduct the paper. The immunity would quickly cease if they suffered the paper to become the vehicle of calumny. There are journals as to which no jury would hesitate to say that the editors were authorised by the proprietors to invent or give currency to libel. Protection is further afforded to individuals and the public by the immunity afforded by the statute being conditioned on the exercise of due care and caution on the part of the proprietor. Many circumstances might be held by a jury to amount to the absence of the care and caution thus required. The employment of an incompetent or untrustworthy editor, or one who has before been proceeded against for libel, total omission ever to look at the paper to see in what manner it was conducted, or, as in this very case, the omission, though taking part in the publication of the paper, to insist on having articles of a doubtful tendency submitted for approval, might be deemed by a jury sufficient to disentitle a proprietor to the protection of the statute. It must always be borne in mind also that it is only on the penal responsibility of the proprietor that a limit is thus placed. His liability to damages in a civil action remains as before. No hardship is therefore imposed on the individual prosecutor, who, in the eye of the law, prosecuted not on his own behalf but on that of the public, and who may still hold the proprietor liable in damages, and if he pleases, prosecute the editor as the publisher of the libel. This being the view I take of the statute, it seems to me that the direction of the learned judge at the late trial was defective in not explaining to the jury that a general authority to an editor to conduct the business of a newspaper, in the absence of anything to give it a different character, must be taken to mean an authority to conduct it according to law. I agree that, as regards two of the three defendants, there may have been evidence to go to the jury of knowledge and consent on their parts, as it appears that they became aware of the article in question before the sale of the paper had come to an end, and took no steps to stop the issue of the remaining numbers of the paper, and therefore might be held to have known of and consented to the publication of the libel in such later papers. The jury might also possibly have held that, as regards the two defendants who were on the spot, and who might therefore have looked at the articles before the paper was published, there was a want of due care and caution, as required by the statute. But I agree with my brother Lush that the verdict must have proceeded on the ground of authority, as the jury have included in their finding the third partner, who was absent at a distance on account of illness, and to whom none of the other circumstances can at all apply, and as to whom, taking the view of the case which I do on the subject of authority, I think there was no case to go to the jury. I concur with my brother Lush therefore in holding that the rule for a new trial must be made absolute.

REG. v. HOLBROOK.

PAUL AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. SUMMERHAYES (resp.). (a)

Trespass — Foxhunting — Assault — Justification —
1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, ss. 2, 31, 35.

A huntsman in fresh pursuit of a fox is not justified in forcing an entry upon land against the will of the owner.

The appellants, while in fresh pursuit of a fox, came to land managed by the respondent for his father. The respondent warned them off, and endeavoured to prevent their going upon the land.

The appellants thereupon attempted to force an entry, and, in so doing, committed an assault, for which they were convicted and fined.

Held that the conviction was right, as foxhunting was no justification of a trespass, which the respondent therefore lawfully resisted.

This was a case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

On the 28th. Dec. 1877 the information of Thomas Summerhayes, the above-named respondent, against Henry Paul and Charles George Elers, the appellants, charging them together in the same summons with assaulting and beating the said respondent at Curry Mallett, in the county of Somerset, on the 2nd Nov. 1877, was heard at a petty sessions holden at Ilminster, in the said county.

It was proved that the respondent lived with his father and attended to his business for him (the father being afflicted), and that a portion of the farm occupied by the father consisted of a field called "The Nineteen Acres," in the parish of Curry Mallett aforesaid. That, on the 2nd Nov. 1877, about midday, the respondent was alone at work in that field when the appellants, who were out with the Taunton Vale foxhounds, were on horseback and riding slowly across an adjoining field, in the occupation of Thomas Zouch, towards "The Nineteen Acres." That "The Nineteen Acres" is east of that adjoining field, and separated from it by a hedge, a bank about two feet high, and a shallow ditch outside the bank, all which belong to "The Nineteen Acres." That the hounds crossed Thomas Zouch's field as far as the said bank, and then turned into a covert which skirts "The Nineteen Acres" and Thomas Zouch's field on the north side. That the respondent got on the bank of "The Nineteen Acres" at a gap near the covert, and, when the appellants were within ten yards of him, said, "Gentlemen, I forbid you to come on this land." The appellant Henry Paul said, "Come on, gentlemen, it is the Prince of Wales's land," and tried to ride up the bank, and the respondent put his hand against the horse, and turned the horse back. That a second time the said Henry Paul tried to ride up the bank, and again the respondent pushed the horse back. That the said Henry Paul upon that struck the respondent on his head with a riding whip more than once. That the respondent then took up a stone, and the said Henry Paul got off his horse, and went into "The Nineteen Acres," and caught hold of the respondent, and a struggle ensued. That during the struggle the appellant Charles George Elers rode into "The Nineteen Acres" and up to and against the respondent, and said, "If you throw that stone I will knock you down." That the respondent then caught hold of the bridle of the said Charles George Elers's horse (to protect himself), and Elers struck at respondent with his hunting whip, and the respondent let go the bridle, and thus avoided the blow. There was no evidence to satisfy the justices that a fox had been seen on the day in question in "The Nineteen Acres."

It was contended on behalf of the said appellants (inter alia), that the defendants were, with others, in fresh pursuit of a fox started on other land, and were entitled, under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 35, to ride over "The Nineteen Acres" without interruption, and that the respondent, therefore, committed the first assault.

Q.B. Div.]

PAUL AND ANOTHER (app.) v. SUMMERHAYES (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

That the appellants were in the exercise of a bona fide claim of right or interest to enter "The Nineteen Acres" as Prince of Wales's land, and also by force of the aforesaid statute, and that consequently jurisdiction of the justices was ousted.

And that, under the circumstances of the case, the respondent was not justified in using force to prevent the appellants entering "The Nineteen Acres."

The justices were of opinion that the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 35, does not make a forcible entry on land lawful, but merely declares that under certain circumstances a person shall not be liable to be summoned under that Act for trespass in pursuit of game. That there was no colour of title or interest in the appellants to oust their jurisdiction, and that an occupier of land is justified in using such force as may be necessary to remove a person from such land after he has been forbidden to enter; and they convicted the appellant Henry Paul in the penalty of twenty shillings and costs, and the appellant Charles George Elers in the penalty of ten shillings and costs.

The questions of law submitted by the justices for the opinion of the court were:

Whether the 35th section of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, prevents an occupier resisting an entry on his land of persons hunting after they have been forbidden by him.

Whether the appellants had such a reasonable claim of title or interest as would oust the jurisdiction of the justices.

Whether the respondent was, under the circumstances, justified in resisting the entry on "The Nineteen Acres" after he had forbidden the entry and it was persisted in.

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the said appellants are liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information is to be dismissed.

The 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, contains provisions against trespassing in pursuit of game. By sect. 2 "game" is defined for the purposes of the Act to include hares, pheasants, partridges, grouse, heath or moor game, black game, and bustards; and by sect. 31 are added woodcocks, snipe, quails, land-rails or conies. Then the following exception is made by sect. 35:

Provided always, and be it enacted, that the aforesaid provisions against trespassers and persons found on any land shall not extend to any person hunting or coursing upon any lands with hounds or greyhounds, and being in fresh pursuit of any deer, hare, or fox already started upon any other land, nor to any person bona fide claiming and exercising any right or reputed right of free warren or free chase.

Cole, Q.C. for the appellants.—There was ample evidence here that appellants were in fresh pursuit of a fox. That being so, they had a perfect right to go upon anyone's land. Gundry v. Feltham (1 T. R. 334) is an authority directly in point. Possibly the decision in that case was founded on the idea that a fox was a noxious animal, but that does not alter the law. If it was lawful, then it has not ceased to be so because those who now join in the pursuit of a fox do so in order to obtain the pleasures of the chase. This is damnum absque injuria: (Mitten v. Fandrye, Popp. 161.) This view is supported by the dictum of Brooke, J. in Year Book, 12 Hen. 8. pl. 9; and by 21 Hen. 7, pl. 28. The right existing at common law has been protected by 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, sect. 35.

A. Charles, Q.C. for the respondent. — The provisions of the Game Act do not apply to this case at all, as foxes are not included in the definition of game. The real point for the decision of the court is whether a foxhunter, hunting for his own diversion, has the right to go across the land of another after being warned off by the owner. The principle governing such a case is so obvious that it could not have possibly been contested except for the decision in Gundry v. Feltham (ubi sup.). But that case was only decided upon demurrer, and by the pleadings it was admitted that a fox was a noxious animal, and that the course pursued was the only way of killing the fox; but that is a very different thing from hunting merely for the sake of diversion, and this distinction was clearly drawn by Lord Ellenborough in the Earl of Essex v. Capel (Locke on the Game Laws, p. 45), a case tried at Hertford Assizes in 1809. There he says, "These pleasures are to be taken only when there is the consent of those who are likely to be injured by them; but they must necessarily be subservient to the consent of others." The dictum of Brooke, J., alluded to on the other side, does not support the decision in the case which was before him. Baker v. Berkeley (3 C. & P. 32) is an authority distinctly in my favour. If, as is admitted, the appellants were hunting for diversion, the conviction must be upheld, and it may be so upheld without reversing the decision in Gundry v. Feltham (ubi sup.), where the facts before the court were of a different nature.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is an appeal against a conviction upon a summons for beating and assaulting the respondent at Curry Mallett. It appears that the respondent managed his father's business of a farmer, and on the day in question he was managing his father's business in a field called "The Nineteen Acres." On that day the neighbouring foxhounds were hunting close by "The Nineteen Acres," over which the two appellants, in company with other gentlemen, proposed to ride while in pursuit of the fox. The respondent tried to prevent this, whereupon one of the appellants struck him upon the head with a riding whip more than once; a struggle then took place, and the other appellant came up. The respondent seized hold of the second appellant's horse, in order to prevent being knocked down, when the second appellant struck at him with his hunting whip, but did not hit him. Upon these facts the magistrates convicted both the appellants, and inflicted fines upon them. The question for us to decide is whether, under the circumstances, such conviction was right. Now, one of the first points raised is as to the effect of the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32; but I must confess I do not quite understand the meaning of the question, for it seems to me that statute has really no application to this case. The 35th section merely provides that certain of the foregoing provisions shall not extend to persons in fresh pursuit of a fox; but, as the exception is limited to the previous provisions of the Act, and as those provisions contain nothing about foxes, but relate only to game, and as sect. 31 has no application here, the point supposed to arise under sect. 35 cannot arise at all. It is not argued now that the appellants had any reasonable claim of interest in the land such as would oust the magistrates' jurisdiction, so we come to what is the real question in this case—viz., whether the respondent was, under the circumstances, justified in resisting the entry on "The Nineteen Acres" after he had forbidden the entry and it was persisted in. It has been popularly supposed that foxhunting may be exercised over the lands of any person without his consent, and even against his will, and, in support of this argument, the case of Gundry v. Feltham (ubi sup.) has been cited. I am of opinion that no such right exists. Foxhunting is, no doubt, a most valuable and interesting sport, but it must be carried on in subordination to the general rights of mankind and the ordinary and well-established laws of property, according to which you cannot go on to a man's land without his leave and against his will. Questions of this kind do not often arise, because in the great majority of cases reasonable terms are made with those upon whose land it is necessary to go, and compensation is provided for any damage done; but when such questions do arise they must be treated according to the ordinary rules of law. As far as I am aware, there is no law which allows a whole field of foxhunters to ride over a man's grounds or fields against his will. Such a supposition arises from a misunderstanding of Gundry v. Feltham (ubi sup.); but that case is different to the present one, for there the plaintiff admitted upon the pleadings that what was done was "the only way and means" of killing and destroying the fox, and, indeed, Buller, J. bases his judgment upon that very ground; and that is the only point which Gundry v. Feltham decides, and, no doubt, where it is admitted that no other means exist for destroying the fox, such a defence may prevail. But that decision afterwards came under the consideration of a very great authority in the case of the Earl of Essex v. Capel (ubi sup.), decided by Lord Ellenborough when sitting at Nisi Prius, but he had had his attention called to the case previously, and so had had an opportunity of looking into the authorities upon the subject. In the case of the Earl of Essex v. Capel the evidence showed clearly that foxhunting was pursued for the excitement and accompaniments of the chase, although incidentally a fox might be killed; and Lord Ellenborough, during the course of the case, pointed out that there was a very great distinction between foxhunting pursued as a pleasure and foxhunting pursued for the good of the common weal and in order merely to destroy a noxious animal; and he goes on to say that there is very considerable doubt whether that even would justify a trespass, as it was a doctrine that was probably based on a mere obiter dictum of Brooke, J. (Year Book 12 Hen. 8, pl. 9), which was supposed to decide a point upon which it had no bearing whatever. The dictum of Lord Ellenborough appears to me to be perfectly correct, but it is not necessary for me to decide now whether the pursuit of a fox for the sole purpose of killing a noxious animal would justify a trespass; it is enough for me to show that the supposed authority of the case in the Year Books and of Gundry v. Feltham (ubi sup.) does not conflict with the decision of Lord Ellenborough. For these reasons, I am of opinion that a man has a perfect right to forbid a field of foxhunters entering upon his land in pursuit of pleasure, and if they persist in doing so he is justified in endeavouring to prevent their entry. In this case the conviction was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

MELLOE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I was unaware that the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, had defined game for the purposes of that Act. If the word "game" had included foxes the application of sect. 31 might have had unpleasant consequences, from which foxhunters could only have been extricated by the terms of sect. 35; but, under any circumstances, sect. 35 could only apply to the previous provisions of the Act, and could not justify a trespass in the course of hunting a fox. That question has been fully discussed by Lord Coleridge, and with his observations I entirely agree. Mr. Cole did not argue that the sole object, or the main object, of foxhunting was to destroy a noxious animal, and no one can suppose that ladies and gentlemen of position go down to Melton to kill vermin. I entirely concur with Lord Coleridge, that the authority of Lord Ellenborough is not only consistent with law, but with all experience and common sense. We are justified, therefore, in saying the conviction must stand.

BENT V. THE WAKEFIELD AND BARNSELY UNION BANK. (a)

Reward for information leading to apprehension of criminal—Surrender of criminal—Information of surrender and confession sent by constable—Communication of material facts for first time—Public policy.

A reward was offered to any person giving such information to the superintendent of police at D. as should lead to the apprehension of G. G. gave himself up to the chief constable at E. who, after searching the Police Gazette, and satisfying himself as to G.'s identity, telegraphed to the superintendent at D., "Do you hold warrant for the apprehension of G. for forgery?" and received a telegram in return, "I still hold warrant for G., and should like him to be apprehended." Upon that the chief constable at E. apprehended and charged him, and he was ultimately convicted.

Held, that the chief constable at E. was not entitled to the reward, G. having himself given the information leading to his apprehension.

THIS was an action tried before Grove J., at the last summer assizes, at Bristol, and reserved by him for further consideration. It was an action brought by the plaintiff, who was the chief constable for Exeter, to recover a reward offered by the defendants for any information that should lead to the apprehension of one William Glover.

The facts proved at the trial are fully set out in the judgment.

an authority in favour of the plaintiff. There are numerous examples of these actions being maintained by constables.

H. T. Cole, Q.C. and Templer for the defendant.—Such an action as this is against public policy. The case of England v. Davidson, cited on the other side, is really in our favour. Lord Denman C.J. says there: "I think there may be services which the constable is not bound to render, and which he may therefore make the ground of a contract. We should not hold a contract to be against the policy of the law unless the grounds for so deciding were very clear." This was clearly a case within his duty; he was bound to apprehend Glover. [GROVE J.—I should like some authority for that; he is entitled to do it, but is he bound to?] Upon the undisputed facts of this case, the plaintiff did nothing to earn the reward; nobody can be entitled to it. [GROVE J.—Bent was a carrier of information to Airton which led to Glover's apprehension.] The criminal gave the information himself. In Comyn's Digest it is laid down that a constable may arrest on suspicion. The result showed that he ought to have arrested Glover, and if he did not, he can take no advantage by not having done so. In Cowles v. Dunbar (2 C. & B. 565) Abbott C.J. says, "A constable is obliged to act if there is a reasonable charge of felony." They cited also

Thatcher v. England, 3 C. B. 254;

Lancaster v. Walsh, 4 M. & W. 16;

Snowdon upon Constables, p. 152.

A. Charles, Q.C. in reply.—The result of Thatcher v. England and the other cases cited is that the first person other than the criminal who gives the information is the person entitled to the reward. The head-note to Thatcher v. England is: "The defendant, who had been robbed of jewellery, published an advertisement, headed "30*l.* reward," describing the articles stolen, and concluding thus: "The above sum will be paid by the adjutant of the 41st Regiment, on recovery of the property and conviction of the offender, or in proportion to the amount recovered." A., a soldier, on the 10th June, informed his sergeant that B. had admitted to him that he was the party who had committed the robbery, and the sergeant gave information at the police station. On the 14th the plaintiff, a police constable, learning from one C. that B. was to be met with at a certain place, went there and apprehended him. The plaintiff, by his activity and perseverance, afterwards succeeded in tracing and recovering nearly the whole of the property, and in procuring evidence to convict B.: Held, that the plaintiff was not, but (per Tindal, C.J., and Cresswell, J.) that A. was, the party entitled to the reward." [GROVE J.—The distinction is between information given to the authorities or the person offering the reward, and mere conversation with casual persons.] In Smith v. Moore (ubi sup.) the prisoner was in custody; here the fact whether he was in custody or not is in dispute; but eliminate that, and the two cases are on all fours. It is admitted that Airton could not claim the reward; but that Bent could is clear, if he had not been a constable, and that makes no difference. Referring to the advertisement, which constitutes the terms of the contract here, Bent was the "person or persons giving such information to Mr. W. Airton, superintendent of police, Dewsbury, or to Mr. W. Halls, superintendent of police, Wakefield, as" led "to the apprehension of the said William Glover." [GROVE J.—Suppose one Jones had given information to Bent, and then Bent had written to Airton, would not Jones have been entitled to the reward?] Probably in that case Bent would be the agent of Jones. A police constable is protected in arresting a criminal on suspicion—a layman is not protected. [GROVE J.—Here the man yields himself up to the law.]

Our. adv. vult.

Nov. 25.—GROVE, J.—This case was tried before me at Bristol, at the last summer assize. It was an action for a reward of 200*l.*, offered in a published handbill by the defendants in the following terms:—"200*l.* Whereas, on the 26th June last, William Glover, shoddy and mungo dealer, of Ossett, absconded from Ossett, after committing various forgeries on several manufacturing firms in the West Riding of Yorkshire: Notice is hereby given that the above reward will be paid to any person or persons giving such information to Mr. W. Airton, superintendent of police, Dewsbury, or to Mr. W. Halls, superintendent of police, Wakefield, as will lead to the apprehension of the said William Glover.—West Riding Police Office, Wakefield, 27th July 1877." The plaintiff's case, on which my judgment must be founded, was shortly stated as follows:—On the 30th Nov. 1877 a person presented himself at the police office, Exeter, and on the plaintiff, the chief constable for Exeter, being sent for, the man, who was in fact Glover, said, according to the plaintiff's evidence, "You hold a warrant for me: I am wanted for forgery." The plaintiff asked his name, and who he was. He said, "You know already, and hold the warrant." Some further conversation took place. The plaintiff said he appeared out of his mind, and told him he had been drinking, and recommended him to go to an hotel. The plaintiff left him in a private room, searched the Police Gazette, and found the name "William Glover wanted for forgery." He got him to take off his hat, and said, "I satisfied myself, after reading the Police Gazette, when he took his hat off." The plaintiff then telegraphed to Mr. Airton, superintendent, at Dewsbury, "Do you hold warrant for the apprehension of William Glover for forgery? Wire back. Answer paid;" and received a telegram in return, "I still hold warrant for Glover, and should like him to be apprehended." Upon that the plaintiff apprehended and charged him, and he was ultimately convicted. For the defendants evidence was given to prove that Glover gave his name before the telegram was sent; and also that he was taken into custody before it was sent. I left these two questions to the jury, and they found that Glover was not in custody before the telegrams; but could not agree, and, after being locked up, were discharged as to the first question—counsel agreeing that they would accept the finding on the second for the purposes of the case. The point reserved and argued before me on further consideration was, whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to the reward. For the plaintiff it was argued that he was the person to be taken to have given the information leading to the apprehension, within the meaning of the handbill. For the defendants, that the criminal, Glover, had given the information himself; and, secondly, that, on grounds of public policy, the plaintiff was not entitled to the reward. I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment. It was not contended that the mere fact of being the person who first communicated with Airton would be sufficient alone to entitle the plaintiff to succeed, supposing the information to have been given to the plaintiff by other than the criminal himself; indeed, the very able and learned counsel for the plaintiff said, in answer to me, though I do not wish and ought not to tie him to his admission, that, if Glover had given information to Airton, Airton would have been entitled to the reward. I think he could hardly have avoided such admission. Airton and Halls, it seems to me, are persons mentioned as proper to be communicated with, but if the information had been given direct to those offering the reward, and had led to the apprehension, I should consider that sufficient. The criminal himself, and not the constable, was, I think, here the person who gave the information which led to the apprehension. In Lancaster v. Walsh (4 M. & W. 16), where no person was named to receive the information, but the reward was to be given "on application to the defendant," Parke, B., says: "It seems to me that any communication to the constable whose duty it was to search for the offender was within the terms of the handbill, although there was no proof of a communication to the defendant himself." In the same case it is held by the same learned judge that "the party who first gave the information, and he alone, is to have the benefit." And Alderson, B., says: "Information means the communication of material facts for the first time." It appears to me that in the present case the first information given to a person authorised to act was that given by the criminal himself; and although he, on grounds of public policy, might not be entitled to the reward, still, where a constable, who may apprehend a criminal, is the mere channel of communication, and only makes inquiries for the purpose of satisfying himself, he is not the person giving the information within the true meaning of the advertisement: the apprehension is not the consequence of the constable's information, but of the criminal surrendering himself to justice. To use the words of Tindal, C.J. in Thatcher v. England (3 C. B. 254, 263), "the clue once found, the plaintiff in apprehending Walker did no more than his ordinary duty." It was argued that, in the case of Thatcher v. England (ubi sup.), the first information was given by the criminal, and yet the person who communicated that information was held to be the party entitled. But there the communication by the criminal was not to any one authorised to act in apprehending or procuring his apprehension, but to a person whom seemingly he considered a friend, for the purpose of borrowing money to enable him to go to London to dispose of the property stolen. The communication by the criminal there was not in the nature of information to be acted upon for the purpose of his apprehension, and, had the person to whom it was made kept the secret, would not have led to the conviction. In that case it was also held that, though the first police constable to whom the communication was made by his activity and perseverance succeeded in tracing and recovering nearly the whole of the property, and in procuring evidence to convict the thief, he was not entitled to the reward. The cases mainly relied on for the plaintiff were England v. Davidson (11

Ad. & E. 856), and Smith v. Moore (1 C. B. 438). The first of these cases bears more on the question of public policy than on the point to which I have hitherto adverted. It was there held, on demurrer, that the fact of the person giving the information being a constable did not necessarily disentitle him on the ground of want of consideration, it being his duty to discover and apprehend felons, or on grounds of public policy. In that case, the averments in the declaration were more general, viz., that the plaintiff did give such information as led to the conviction, and in the plea that the plaintiff was and is a constable of the district, and that it was his duty to give every information which might lead to the conviction, and to apprehend him. The short judgment of the court, delivered by Lord Denman, is as follows: "I think there may be services which the constable is not bound to render, and which he may therefore make the ground of a contract. We should not hold a contract to be against the policy of the law, unless the grounds for so deciding were very clear." All that that case decides is that a constable, as such, is not disentitled to a reward of this description, or necessarily disentitled as against public policy. In Smith v. Moore (ubi sup.) the plaintiff, a police constable then temporarily suspended, apprehended a burglar, who, after his apprehension, voluntarily confessed; the constable was held entitled to the reward. There is in that case the obvious distinction from the present, that the confession was made after apprehension effected by the person claiming the reward, and who by his suspicions, and apprehending on the strength of them, had already done much, and in the judgment of the court enough to earn it. On the question of public policy I am bound by the case of England v. Davidson (ubi sup.) so far as the judgment in that case extends; and although there may be some distinction as to this point between that case and the present, yet, in deciding a case on the ground of public policy, the decision should be based on some broad principle, and one capable of general application. I am unable to see any general principle other than that argued in England v. Davidson (ubi sup.), viz., that a constable is bound by his duty, the duty of his office, to seek for criminals, and to use his utmost efforts to bring them to justice. There are strong arguments of expediency, touching the administration of justice and the interests of the State, why constables should not be allowed to receive rewards. The expectation of rewards would offer great temptation to delay an active search, by which delay the criminal might escape, or, in a case like the present, to delay taking into custody a criminal who gives himself up, so that the constable might appear to use exertions to procure complete information and for that to claim the reward. There would also be a temptation, particularly to those constables in the detective service, to look to bribes or to seek promises of reward from persons anxious to recover their property, and unless such were offered to be inert in their efforts. But, although the judgment in England v. Davidson (ubi sup.) does not enter upon these questions, I must assume they were present to the minds of the judges who decided that case. Whatever my own opinion may be, it seems to me that I cannot without over-subtle refinement apply to this case any general principle of public policy which is not involved in that case, and that

BLAKELEY v. BAKER AND ANOTHER. (a)

Negligence — Insufficiency of fence — Excavation adjoining a highway — General Highways Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 70.

The defendant, a contractor for the construction of a railway line, made an excavation within five yards of, and fenced it off from, a highway. Plaintiff's horse, attached to a cart containing a load of a ton weight, came into contact with the fence, which gave way, and the horse was killed by the fall into the excavation.

Held, that the fence was sufficient within the requirements of sect. 70 of the General Highways Act 1835, and that there was no legal duty imposed upon the defendant to construct a fence of such strength as to withstand such a shock as that described.

CASE stated by J. W. de L. Giffard, Esq., judge of the Dewsbury County Court.

1. This was an action to recover 50*l.* damages for the loss of a horse killed through the alleged negligence of the defendants, and was tried at the County Court of Yorkshire, holden at Dewsbury on the 11th July 1878.

2. The defendants, in the month of March 1878 were engaged in constructing a branch line belonging to the Great Northern Railway which was through a portion of the borough of Dewsbury. In the necessary course of constructing the railway the defendants had made an excavation about twenty feet deep near to a public highway called Crackenedge-lane.

3. The defendants had erected a wooden fence between the excavation and the said highway. The fence was made of uprights three or four inches thick and about eight inches wide placed at irregular distances varying from five to nine feet. The cross pieces were inch floor boards (some of the materials were produced in court and shown to the jury). There was no curbing on the fence side of the road. Fourteen feet intervened between the said fence and the edge of the said excavation.

4. The said highway is on an incline; the inclination at the point opposite the excavation and for some distance further up the hill being one foot in ten, and the inclination from the fence down to the excavation is one foot in twelve.

5. On the 14th March last, two carts belonging to the plaintiff, drawn by one horse in each, and in charge of only one man, were proceeding up the hill along the said highway. The carts contained each a ton of coal, and were fastened one to the other by a chain from the back of the leading cart to the head of the horse drawing the second cart.

6. The carts had completely passed the point where the excavation had been made, and the carter and leading cart had safely proceeded about ten yards beyond it up the hill when the leading horse stumbled. In trying to recover itself it fell. The jerk of the fall caused the leading cart to strike the horse immediately following it in the mouth, and the connecting chain broke. The second horse began at once to back down the hill. The carter, who at the moment was endeavouring to raise the first horse, ran back to catch hold of the second horse by the rein, but he was unable to do so, and when about two yards from the fence he touched it with his whip. The horse swerved across the road, bringing the cart to which it was attached with its back pointing towards the fence, and as the horse was unable to resist the weight the cart came into contact with and broke through the fence, and both the horse and cart were precipitated to the bottom of the excavation. The horse was killed by the fall.

7. It was admitted that the accident would not have happened if the leading horse had not slipped and fallen.

8. It was alleged by the plaintiff's witnesses that the fence was improperly constructed, being insufficiently strong, and this was the ground upon which the defendants were sought to be made responsible.

9. At the close of the plaintiff's case it was submitted on the part of the defendants that there was no case to go to the jury, for even admitting that the fence was insufficiently strong, that fact was not the cause of the accident, the carts having safely passed the fence, and proceeded for some distance beyond it, and that further the plaintiff by his own evidence had shown that he had been guilty of contributory negligence.

10. The County Court judge refused to withdraw the case from the jury, and left the following points for their consideration: (1) If you are of opinion that the fence erected by the defendants was sufficiently strong to afford protection to the public against what, having regard to the situation and character of the ground, might reasonably be expected to happen, your verdict must be for the defendants. (2) If you are of opinion that the fence was not sufficiently strong to prevent danger, but should also be of opinion that the plaintiff in any way contributed to the accident either by not having with the carts a sufficient number of men or horses, or otherwise, then your verdict must be for the defendants. (3) If you should be of opinion that the fence was not strong enough to protect the public from danger, and that the plaintiff in no way contributed to the accident, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff, in which case it is admitted the amount must be 50*l.*

11. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 50*l.* damages.

The question for the decision of the court was whether or not there was a case to go to the jury on behalf of the plaintiff. If there was a case, the verdict to stand; if there was no case, the verdict to be for the defendants.

A copy of the notes of the County Court judge were annexed to and formed part of the case. The evidence went to show that the fence was totally inadequate to meet such a shock as that to which it was subjected, and the nature of which is described in the case.

Cave, Q.C. (with him Bigham) for the appellants.—The facts are simple. All that was incumbent upon us was to intimate to the public a line of demarcation. The right to excavate where we did is undoubted. The excavation was some distance from the highway, and that being so, there was no legal necessity to erect a fence at all; and if the court is against us on this point there was no obligation on our part to erect such a fence as to withstand such an attack as this. [CLEASBY, B.—Did the excavation under the circumstances constitute a public nuisance?] If the excavation were so near the highway that a horse naturally swerving would fall into it, this would constitute it a public nuisance. [KELLY, C.B.—If your argument is correct, it goes to show that no fence was necessary at all.] At all events, no fence of such a character to withstand such a shock as the fence in question was subjected to was necessary. Assuming that there was an obligation to fence, is it necessary to fence in such a way as not only to mark the proper line of path, but also to prevent the intrusion of a thing, such as a loaded cart impelled by a horse? The respondent, moreover, was guilty of contributory negligence; the primary cause of the accident was the fall of the leading horse, and the subsequent acts of the respondent's servant hastened the catastrophe. He cited

Binks v. The South Yorkshire Railway and River Dun Company, 32 L. J. N. S. 26, Q. B.; 3 B. & S. 244;

Forbes for the respondent.—This is a special case, and the finding of the jury at the trial on questions of fact must be accepted, and no fresh point can now be imported by the appellants. The question of contributory negligence was distinctly and pointedly left to them by the learned County Court judge, and the verdict has distinctly negatived any suggestion on this head. By the General Highways Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 70, it is enacted "that from and after the commencement of this Act it shall not be lawful for any person to sink any pit or shaft . . . within the distance of twenty-five yards . . . from any part of any carriageway or cartway, unless such pit or shaft . . . shall be . . . behind some wall or fence sufficient to conceal or screen the same from the said carriageway or cartway, so that the same may not be dangerous to passengers, horses, or cattle, &c." [CLEASBY, B.—This is not a pit or shaft."] Surely this excavation is in the nature of "a pit," and if so, being sunk within five yards of the highway, the appellants were clearly liable (Add. on Torts, 3rd ed., pp. 163-6). Besides, this contention was never raised before the County Court judge. The Legislature could never have intended to confine the term to "coal pits" and such like shafts. My opponents are placed on the horns of an awkward dilemma. If they had intended to raise a point of law, they omitted to raise the point when before the County Court judge; and if there had been any mistake in regard to the facts they are out of court here, for they should then have moved for a new trial. The question here involved is one of fact and not of law, and it is not competent for the court to review the facts. It is submitted by the other side that the question as to the sufficiency of the fence is one of law; but this is really always one of fact, and should be left to the jury. The jury have found their verdict after a view in court of the woodwork of this fence, and we are concluded by that verdict. He cited

Lawrence v. Jenkins, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 406; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 274; 42 L. J. N. S. 147, Q. B.

Cave, Q.C. was not called upon to reply.

KELLY, C.B.—It would be an outrage on all the principles of law and justice if we were to hold in such a case as the foregoing that there was any legal duty imposed upon the appellants to construct a fence of such a degree of solidity and strength as to resist the impact of a horse and loaded cart, as described in the case. The learned judge should have directed the jury to this effect. There can be no doubt that the fence erected by the appellants was a sufficient one within the terms of sect. 70 of the General Highways Act, and some fence was necessary, as the excavation was within the limits prescribed by the section. The question should never have been submitted to the capricious finding of a jury.

CLEASBY, B.—The defendant in the action had sufficiently fenced the locus in quo of the excavation, and no allegation of a want of conforming on his part to the requirements of the General Highways Act of 1835 can be sustained for a moment. The position of the parties ought to have been reversed, and the appellants here should have brought their action against the respondent for the damage done to their fence.

GROVE v. GROVE. (a)

Appeal from decision of magistrates—Alimony—Custody of children—Matrimonial Causes Act 1878 (41 Vict. c. 19), s. 4.

THIS was the first appeal from a magistrates' decision under the 4th section of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1878 (41 Vict. c. 19).

Sect. 4 enacts:

If a husband shall be convicted summarily or otherwise of an aggravated assault within the meaning of the statute twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth of Victoria, chapter one hundred, section forty-three, upon his wife, the court or magistrate before whom he shall be so convicted may, if satisfied that the future safety of the wife is in peril, order that the wife shall be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband; and such order shall have the force and effect in all respects of a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty; and such order may further provide:

- (1.) That the husband shall pay to his wife such weekly sum as the court or magistrate may consider to be in accordance with his means, and with any means which the wife may have for her support, and the payment of any sum of money so ordered shall be enforceable, and enforced against the husband in the same manner as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation; and the court or magistrate by whom any such order for payment of money shall be made, shall have power from time to time to vary the same on the application of either the husband or the wife, upon proof that the means of the husband or wife have been altered in amount since the original order, or any subsequent order varying it shall have been made;

- (2.) That the legal custody of any children of the marriage under the age of ten years shall, in the discretion of the court or magistrate be given to the wife.

Provided always, that no order for payment of money by the husband, or for the custody of children by the wife, shall be made in favour of a wife who shall be proved to have committed adultery, unless such adultery has been condoned; and that any order for payment of money or for the custody of children may be discharged by the court or magistrate by whom such order was made upon proof that the wife has since the making thereof been guilty of adultery; and provided also, that all orders made under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Probate and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice.

James Grove the appellant in the present case was a currier, carrying on business at Leamington, who had been convicted by the local bench on the 11th Sept. last, of an aggravated assault upon his wife, Jane Ann Grove. The magistrates had made an order under the above section of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1878 for alimony at the rate of 3*l.* a week, and giving the wife the legal custody of the only child of the marriage. The order for alimony was based upon evidence given at the hearing as to the defendant's income. The present appeal was brought by the defendant, who sought to set aside the order as to alimony on the ground that the amount awarded to the wife was excessive, that the amount fixed upon by the magistrates as a fair estimate of the defendant's annual income was against the weight of evidence. It was further sought by the appellant's counsel to introduce words into the order limiting the duration of the wife's custody of the child to the age of ten years. The words of the Act being "any children of the marriage under the age of ten years." Further application on behalf of the appellant for time to file further affidavits was refused.

Middleton, for the appellant.

Inderwick, Q.C., for the respondent.

The PRESIDENT (Sir James Hannen).—This is the first occasion on which I have had to review a decision of the magistrates under the Matrimonial Causes Act of the recent session. It would be unfortunate if it were often necessary for me to investigate decisions by magistrates under this Act, especially as it confers upon them a peculiar jurisdiction for the express purpose of cheapening proceedings. The machinery upon which I have to act in the present case is most imperfect, and it appears to me that the proper course would have been to ask the magistrates at the time for an adjournment for the purpose of producing further evidence. Even now, after he has had the opportunity of stating his case in an exact and formal manner, the appellant admits a net annual income of 235*l.*, apart from his business. In calculating the amount of profit derived from his business, it is obviously right to allow a considerable margin for the defendant's conscience, and, after making such deductions as he pleases, the defendant only says that his business does not produce 150*l.* per annum. Taking it at 140*l.*, this sum, added to 235*l.*, would make an annual income of 375*l.* It appears that he has two places of business, and that his books are kept in an irregular manner.

The magistrates (with a knowledge of the local circumstances of the case that I cannot possibly have) have come to the conclusion that his annual income is 100*l.* more than he puts it at. I must, therefore, reject his application. The order for the custody of the children will have the effect given it by the Legislature, and no other. Any change in the property of the wife will be a subject for an application to the magistrates who made the order. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

March 5 and Nov. 30, 1878.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J. and MELLOR, J.)

SMITH (app.) v. JUSTICES OF HEREFORD (resps.). (a)

Alehouse licence—Omission to use licence—Renewal—Discretion of justices—9 Geo. 4, c. 61—32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, ss. 8 and 19—35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 42.

The appellant had for nine years, from a period before the passing of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, held an alehouse licence under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, in respect of his premises, but had not during that period carried on any trade in intoxicating liquors, nor had taken out any licence to do so from the Excise until the last two months of the term of his last year's licence. Upon application for renewal of his certificate, which was objected to by the police under 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 42, the licensing justices refused; and upon appeal the quarter sessions decided that this refusal was right, provided that this was not a renewal of an old licence, or that the justices had power to refuse to renew this alehouse licence upon grounds other than those mentioned in sect. 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869.

Held, upon a case stated, that there was nothing in the circumstances of this case to prevent the appellant from applying for a renewal of his certificate; but that sect. 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 had no application to an alehouse licence, and that the discretion of the justices in refusing a renewal of any such licence was not limited to the grounds specified in sect. 8 of that Act.

This case was stated pursuant to the order of the court of quarter sessions for the county of Hereford, made on the 16th Oct. 1877.

The appellant has for many years owned and occupied, and now owns and occupies, premises known as the Rising Sun, in the parish of Peterstow, in the division of Harewood's End, Herefordshire.

The appellant has for many years previously to 1868 held a full licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail upon the said premises.

The appellant annually (and in accordance with the statutes for the time being in force in that behalf) applied for and obtained from the licensing justices an annual licence authorising him to apply for and hold any of the excise licences which might be held by a publican for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors on the said premises prior

SMITH (app.) v. JUSTICES OF HEREFORD (resps.).

and up to the general annual licensing session, 1877.

The appellant during the nine years from 1868 to 31st Aug. 1877, did not avail himself of the authority so granted, and did not take out any excise licence for the sale of liquor by retail, and did not in fact sell liquors upon the said premises, nor were the said house or premises during such period kept or used as an inn.

Upon the 31st Aug. 1877, the appellant duly took out all the excise licences, and paid the duty thereon rateably for the proportion of the year ending the 11th Oct. 1877, remaining unexpired, and from that time during the following month of September sold exciseable liquors upon the said premises.

The appellant, in the month of Aug. 1877, duly received from the respondents (pursuant to the 9 Geo. 4, c. 6, s. 2) notice that the general annual licensing meeting would be held on the 3rd Sept. 1877; no notice of opposition to the grant or renewal of the appellant's licence was given to or received by the appellant prior to the 3rd Sept. 1877, but formal notice in writing was served on the appellant by the respondents before the 17th Sept. 1877.

On the said 3rd Sept. 1877, at the general annual licensing meeting, when the said justices entered upon the business of granting and renewing licences, the grant or renewal of the appellant's licence for the ensuing year was objected to by the police.

The appellant was present, and was told by the chairman of the justices that his case would be taken at an adjournment of the said meeting on the 17th Sept. 1877.

On the 17th Sept. 1877 the appellant and his solicitor attended the adjourned annual licensing meeting, and applied for a grant or renewal of his licence.

The police opposed the application, and gave evidence on oath in support of all the three grounds of objection stated in the written notice which had been served upon him since the meeting of the justices on the 3rd Sept.

These three objections were (1) that there were other licensed premises near to the appellant's house; (2) that the appellant had not for nine years or thereabouts taken out or held any excise licences, or in any manner used his house and premises as licensed premises, or sold intoxicating liquors thereupon; (3) that the appellant was not a fit and proper person to hold a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors, having been many times convicted of summary offences.

The respondent justices, after hearing the evidence, refused to grant or renew the licence.

Against such refusal of the said justices the appellant appealed to the next ensuing quarter sessions, when the court heard the evidence tendered, which was to the same effect as that given before the general annual licensing meeting, and was in substance as follows, viz.:

That the appellant had omitted up to the 31st Aug. last to take out any excise licence for the premises during the last nine years, though he had during those nine years annually obtained the justices' certificate; and also secondly, that the premises in question during that time had not been kept as an inn; and, thirdly, that there were several other licensed houses within a short distance of the appellant's house, and that the district was a rural one with a small population, and that there were five such public-houses within two miles, of which two were within one mile of the appellant's house.

The said court of quarter sessions was of opinion that the facts did not disclose any grounds for refusing the licence upon the ground of the appellant's character, but considered that the respondent justices in this appeal had the right to refuse the licence, and accordingly dismissed the appeal with costs subject to this case.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, in view of the interval of time above mentioned during which no excise licence had been taken out by the said appellant, and throughout which years the appellant had never served the public with intoxicating liquor, this was in law an application to the magistrates for the renewal of a licence, or an application for the grant of a new licence.

If the court should be of opinion that this was in law an application for a renewal of a licence, then the order of the court of quarter sessions was to be quashed, the licence was to be renewed, and the appeal to be allowed with costs.

If the court should be of opinion that this was in law an application for a new licence then the order of the court of quarter sessions was to be affirmed.

March 5.—T. S. Pritchard argued for the respondents in support of the judgment of the quarter sessions. Although the question asked is whether this was the renewal of an old licence or the grant of a new one, it matters not what may be the answer, because the licensing justices have full discretion to refuse either a new grant or a renewal of an alehouse licence under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. [COCKBURN, C.J.—It does not appear that the refusal to renew this licence, if it be not a new one, would be the result of the justices' discretion.] The case then must go back to the justices, if this be not a new licence; but there are authorities which tend to show that, under the circumstances, the appellant could obtain only a new licence:

Hargreaves v. Dawson, 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420;
Reg. v. Justices of Lancashire, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 97;
Reg. v. Curson, L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 400;
Ex parte Tarbath, 31 L. T. Rep. 513.

A. T. Lawrence for the appellant.—The only question asked is whether this would be a renewal of an old licence if the justices granted the appellant's application. In that case they would have no discretion to refuse, except upon the grounds mentioned in the 8th section of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27). By sect. 19 of that Act, where a licence is in force on the 1st May 1869, with respect to any house or shop for the sale by retail therein of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on the premises, a certificate cannot be refused on any other ground. This licence was in force on that day. [COCKBURN, C.J.—But it was not a mere licence for the sale of beer, cider, and wine.] The appellant was a licensed person under the Act, and had a vested interest, of which he could not be deprived, except upon some ground provided by the statutes. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Sect. 42 of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94) deals with renewals, and concludes, "Subject as aforesaid, licences shall be renewed, and the powers and discretion of justices relative to such renewal shall be exercised as heretofore." Renewals of these alehouse licences were previously in the unlimited direction of the justices, and this section says nothing about them.] That section imports all conditions as to renewals which are contained in the previous Acts; and amongst them we find, in sect. 19 of the Act of 1869, that no old licences are to be discontinued except upon specified grounds. This, although a larger licence than those expressly mentioned in that section, includes liberty to sell by retail, beer, cider, and wine to be consumed on the premises. This 19th section therefore must surely have been meant to apply to an alehouse licence, as well as to more limited licences.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We think that this case is ambiguously stated, and it is difficult to know what is meant to be asked. All we can do is to state what the justices were authorised to do. It is clear from the 42nd section of the Licensing Act 1872, that the justices have the same discretion to refuse the renewal of a licence as they had before that Act. If this had been a certificate for a beer-house, then, according to the 19th section of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, the justices would have had to confine their refusal to certain grounds there specified. But this was the case of the general licence authorised by the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and the qualifications of the Wine and Beerhouse Act do not apply. According to the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, the justices had the same discretion to refuse a renewal as they had to refuse a grant of a new licence. The justices seem therefore to have missed the real point of the case, which was whether they had this discretion, and they need not have troubled this court with the irrelevant questions they seem to have put. All we can do is to remit the case with our opinion that the justices had a discretion in the matter.

MELLOR, J.—I object altogether to this mode of stating a case for the opinion of this court, and would have been disposed to remit the case that it might be restated. I have great difficulty in finding out what was the real question the quarter sessions wanted us to decide. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that our best course is to remit the case with our opinion that the justices had a discretion in dealing with the application, and that they should deal with the case as if no case had been stated.

COCKBURN, C.J.—At the same time we may say that we think that this was the case of an application for a renewal of the licence—not for a new licence.

Nov. 30.—The justices at quarter sessions found, in obedience to the order of the court, that the respondent justices had rightly exercised their discretion in refusing the renewal of the appellant's certificate.

COCKBURN, C.J. and MELLOR, J., upon application of counsel, refused to hear any further argument, and directed judgment for the respondents.

REG. v. LEE. (a)

District church—Metropolis—Incumbent—Dangerous structure—Owner—58 Geo. 3, c. 45, ss. 70 and 71—18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, ss. 3 and 30, and Part II.

The defendant was incumbent of a district church in the metropolis, built under the provisions of the Church Building Act 1818, by which repairs of the churches are to be made by rates in the districts, in like manner as in cases of repairs of churches by parishes. Part of the tower fell upon a passer-by, and the tower was duly repaired by the Metropolitan Board of Works, in pursuance of Part 2 of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 concerning dangerous structures. A stipendiary magistrate refused to grant a warrant of distress for the cost of these repairs upon the incumbent.

Held, upon a rule for mandamus, that the incumbent, not being in the receipt of rent or profits from the church, was not the "owner" within the meaning of the Act; and that he was not therefore liable for these repairs.

THIS was a rule nisi, obtained at the instance of the Metropolitan Board of Works, calling upon the Rev. F. G. Lee, D.D., incumbent of All Saints Church, Lower Marsh, Lambeth, and also calling upon one of the metropolitan police magistrates, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to the said magistrate commanding him to issue a distress warrant against the said F. G. Lee for the recovery of 105*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.* and 2*s.* costs, incurred by the said board in repairing the tower of his church.

This church was built in 1847 under the provisions of the Church Building Act 1818 (58 Geo. 3, c. 45), by sect. 70 of which it is enacted:

That the repairs of all such district churches or chapels shall be made by the districts to which they respectively belong, by rates to be raised within the district, in like manner as in case of repairs of churches by parishes; and every such district shall be deemed in law a separate and distinct parish for that purpose, and the repairs of all chapels not made district churches shall be made by the parish in or for which the chapels shall be built.

By sect. 71,

Each district shall for ever hereafter, i.e., after twenty years from the consecration of the district church, make, raise, levy, collect, and apply separate and distinct rates for the repairs of the church or churches or chapels of the district as if a separate parish.

The defendant had been called upon by the board to repair the tower of his church, a passer-by having, in May 1876, been injured by the fall of part of it. It had been duly certified by the board surveyor to be in a dangerous state. The defendant denied his liability, and the board executed the necessary work themselves.

A stipendiary magistrate had made an order for payment upon the defendant as owner, but another stipendiary magistrate had refused to make the order to levy the expenses of the work which the board applied for, and the court had discharged a rule nisi under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 5 to compel the latter to do so; but, on the 1st Aug. 1878, they granted this rule nisi for a mandamus, in order, if necessary and desirable, to raise the question on appeal.

The defendant had been admitted as incumbent of this district in 1867, before the abolition of church rates by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 109; in him was vested the freehold of the church, and he was entitled, besides his stipend, to surplice fees and pew rents. The pew rents, however, had been foregone by his predecessor, and he had not received any.

By the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122) s. 3:

"Public building" shall mean every building used as a church, chapel, or other place of public worship.

"Owner" shall apply to every person in possession or receipt either of the whole or of any part of the rents or profits of any land or tenement, or in the occupation of such land or tenement, other than as a tenant from year to year or for any less term, or a tenant at will.

By sect. 30:

Every public building shall, throughout this Act be deemed to be included in the term building and be subject to all the provisions of this Act, in the same manner as if it were a building erected for a purpose other than a public purpose.

By sect. 69:

Whenever it is made known to the commissioners hereinafter named that any structure (including in such expression any building, wall, or other structure, and anything affixed to or projecting from any building, wall, or other structure) is in a dangerous state, such commissioners shall require a survey of such structure to be made by the district surveyor, or by some other competent surveyor, and it shall also be the duty of the district surveyor to make known to the said commissioners any information he may receive with respect to any structure being in such state as aforesaid.

By sect. 71:

Upon the completion of his survey, the surveyor employed shall certify to the said commissioners his opinion as to the state of any such structure as aforesaid.

By sect. 72:

If such certificate is to the effect that such structure is not in a dangerous state, no further proceedings shall be had in respect thereof, but if it is to the effect that the same is in a dangerous state, the commissioners shall cause the same to be shored up, or otherwise secured, and a proper board or fence to be put up for the protection of passengers, and shall cause notice in writing to be given to the owner or occupier of such structure, requiring him forthwith to take down, secure, or repair the same, as the case requires.

By sect. 73:

If the owner or occupier, to whom notice is given as last aforesaid, fails to comply, as speedily as the nature of the case permits, with the requisition of such notice, the said commissioners may make complaint thereof before a justice of the peace; and it shall be lawful for such justice to order the owner, or on his default, the occupier, of any such structure to take down, repair, or otherwise secure, to the satisfaction of the surveyor who made such survey as aforesaid, or of such other surveyor as the said commissioners may appoint, such structure or such part thereof as appears to him to be in a dangerous state, within a time to be fixed by such justice; and in case the same is not taken down, repaired, or otherwise secured within the time so limited, the said commissioners may, with all convenient speed, cause all, or so much of such structure as is in a dangerous condition, to be taken down, repaired, or otherwise secured, in such manner as may be requisite; and all expenses incurred by the said commissioners in respect of any dangerous structure, by virtue of the second part of this Act, shall be paid by the owner of such structure, but without prejudice to his right to recover the same from any lessee or other person liable to the expenses of repairs.

By sect. 74:

If such owner cannot be found, or if, on demand, he refuses or neglects to pay the aforesaid expenses, the said commissioners, after giving three months' notice of their intention to do so, by posting a printed or written notice in a conspicuous place on the structure in respect of which, or of part of which, they have incurred expense, or on the land whereon it stands, may sell such structure and they shall, after deducting from the proceeds of such sale the amount of all expenses incurred by them, restore the surplus (if any) to the owner.

The defendant showed cause in person.—Although the interpretation clause of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 applies the words "public building" to a church for some purposes, yet it cannot be contended that the Board of Works can sell a church under sect. 74, and hand over the surplus to the incumbent. It does not follow, therefore, upon the interpretation clause that the second part of the Act concerning dangerous structures in any way applies to churches. And even if it does so apply, the incumbent is not in any sense the owner of a church: in this case he receives no rents nor profits, his stipend (which was said to be very small) does not depend upon it, he had no power without a faculty to interfere with the structure, and, since the abolition of church rates, he has no means of obtaining funds to meet this claim.

F. M. White, Q.C. and Biron supported the rule.—The terms of the Act are explicit, and if this liability does not fall upon the defendant, all churches, whose structure becomes dangerous, must be repaired at the cost of the general rates of the metropolis. Clearly, before the abolition of church rates, the parishioners would have been compelled to make good the cost of these repairs (Gosling v. Veley, 4 H. of L. Cas. 679); and now it rests upon the incumbent to obtain voluntary contributions for the same purposes. He is, within the definition, the owner of the structure; absolute beneficial ownership is not necessary (Bowditch v. Wakefield Local Board, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 567); the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are not the owners (Angell v. Paddington Vestry, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 714); and by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, the freehold of the church is vested in the defendant.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged; not on the ground that a church is not a "building" within the Act, because sect. 3 declares that "public building shall mean every building used as a church, chapel, or other place of public worship;" but on the ground that there is another question, namely, whether the defendant is the "owner" of a building within the meaning of the term owner in the statute; and I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that he is. At the time the statute was passed it was generally believed, not only that the parishioners were liable to be rated for the maintenance of the fabric of the church of the parish, but that there was a machinery by which they might assess themselves. But it turned out that the machinery was ineffectual, and consequently church rates were no longer levied. It cannot be intended that the burden of repairing the fabric of the church, in which the clergyman has only a life interest at most, and in which the parishioners have quite as great an interest as he, should fall on the incumbent and not on the parishioners. If this were intended by the Legislature it would be said in express terms, but it is not said. The Legislature, no doubt, intended to bring churches under the Metropolitan Board of Works in this Act, by classing them among public buildings, for the safety of which the board were enabled to take certain measures in the interests of the public, and they thought there would be no difficulty in carrying this out. But when they come to give further explanation of what is meant by the term "owner," then they make it clear that an incumbent is not such a person as is intended by owner, or made as such liable to defray the costs of repair. An owner is a person who gets the rents of the premises. Tried by this test the defendant is not the owner. Then is he in occupation of the building? Not more so than the parishioners who go to the church. The sections, therefore, of the Act itself, sects. 69 to 74 inclusive, clearly show, in my opinion, that the clergyman cannot be considered as owner or occupier of the church. And then there is this consideration staring one in the face, that to hold this gentleman liable for the repairs of this church would be a flagrant injustice. Such it would be to turn round on the clergyman to fix him with this liability, simply because the old machinery has failed and the parishioners will not assess themselves; and we ought not to strain the terms of the Act to bring him within them, when he is not expressly within them, and when it was never intended that he should be. I do not look at the circumstances of the case dwelt on by the defendant, that it is a poor living; for it might be a rich one, and the question would be just the same; but I decide the case on the ground that it certainly was not in contemplation, when the Act was passed, that the clergyman instead of the parishioners should repair the fabric of the church. I do not find anything in the statute which compels me to hold the defendant liable, and the rule for a mandamus must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I also beg to say that I do not base my opinion on the circumstances stated by the defendant as to his resources and means. But they affect me to this extent, that I must see my way very clearly before I concur in a judgment which would compel a distress to be made upon the defendant's goods. Looking, therefore, to see if the words of the Act are express, I find in sect. 3, "Public building shall mean every building used as a church, chapel, or other place of public worship." Now this prima facie includes all churches no doubt, but then I am not satisfied that the defendant is the "owner" of the church within the definition of owner given in the interpretation section. In that I read that "owner" is to apply to every person in possession or receipt of the whole or of any part of the rents or profits of any land or tenement other than as a tenant from year to year, or for any less term, or as a tenant at will. And it appears to me that the defendant does not satisfy any of those words; while looking at the other clauses as to remedies provided in the case of dangerous structures, especially to sect. 73, I cannot help thinking that it would be a very strong thing to hold that the defendant, who could not obey the directions given in that sect. 73, is yet liable to be proceeded against by distress, and that the case is so clearly made out against him that I am obliged to make this rule absolute. I quite agree that in former times the parishioners could be compelled to repair the fabric by means of excommunication and other spiritual censures which are no longer available. This machinery having failed, and church rates, except as voluntary offerings, having been abolished, it is, I think, an additional reason why, unless absolutely compelled to say that this is within the Act, I should not hold the clergyman to be liable as owner. On all these grounds, thinking that the case is not sufficiently brought within the express meaning of the statute, I decline to be a party to making the rule absolute for a mandamus.

Rule discharged with costs.

Ex parte THE UNITED PATRIOTS' NATIONAL BENEFIT SOCIETY; Re HOLT. (a)

Friendly society—Summary jurisdiction—Disputes to be settled by arbitration—38 & 39 Vict. c. 60, ss. 22, 30.

A friendly society which did not receive contributions by means of collectors at a greater distance than ten miles from its registered office, had provided by its rules for the settlement of disputes by arbitration.

Held, that, notwithstanding sect. 22 of the Friendly Societies Act 1875, the summary jurisdiction created by sect. 30, sub-sect. 10, applied to a disputed claim by the personal representative of a deceased member.

THIS was a motion by way of appeal against a refusal of Field J. to grant a prohibition to restrain further proceedings upon an order made by a stipendiary magistrate of Birmingham.

Alfred Holt, the applicant to the magistrate, was the personal representative of Thomas Holt, a deceased member of a friendly society, called the United Patriots' National Benefit Society. The application was for an order of payment upon the society for 14*l.*, the funeral allowance due upon Thomas Holt's death, according to his contributions, and the society's tables, but the claim for which was resisted by the society.

The 34th of the society's rules provided that all disputes arising between the society and the members or persons claiming through members, should be determined by arbitration in the manner therein described. The society did not receive contributions by means of collectors at a greater distance than ten miles from the registered office of the society.

By sect. 4 of the Friendly Societies Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60):

"Industrial assurance company" means any company as defined by the Life Assurance Companies Act 1870, which grants assurances on any one life for a less sum than 20*l.*, and which receives premiums or contributions in Great Britain or Ireland by means of collectors at less periodical intervals than two months.

By sect. 22:

Every dispute between a member or person claiming through a member, or under the rules of a registered society, and the society or an officer thereof, shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society, and the decision so made shall be binding and conclusive on all parties without appeal, and shall not be removable into any court of law or restrainable by injunction; and application for the enforcement thereof may be made to the County Court.

By sect. 30:

The provisions of the present section apply only to friendly societies, and except as after-mentioned industrial assurance companies receiving contributions by means of collectors at a greater distance than ten miles from the registered office of the society.

Sub-sect. (1) requires a society to deliver copies of rules and policies to members.

Sub-sect. (8) requires a society to keep open for inspection its balance-sheet.

Sub-sect. (9) requires a society to have its annual returns certified by an accountant.

By sub-sect. (10) :

In all disputes between a society and any member of person insured, or any person claiming through a member or person insured, or under the rules, such member or person may, notwithstanding any provisions of the rules of such society to the contrary, apply to the County Court, or to the court of summary jurisdiction for the place where such member or other person resides, and such court may settle such dispute in manner herein provided.

By sub-sect. (13) :

All the provisions of the present section apply to societies existing at the commencement of this Act, and shall be contained in the rules of all future societies to which this section applies ; and any act or omission which by virtue of this and any other section of this Act would be an offence on the part of the registered society shall be an offence on the part of any other society to which this Act applies, and of any officer of such society bound to fulfil the duty (if any), whereof such offence is a breach. The word "society" in the present section shall, except in provisions one, eight, and nine, include all industrial assurance companies, but nothing in the present section contained shall apply to any assurance with any such company, the premiums in respect of which are receivable at greater periodical intervals than two months.

The order applied for having been made, the society took out a summons before Field, J. to prohibit the magistrate, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction. The society now appealed against the dismissal of this summons.

Charles, Q.C. and Austin argued for the society. —This is admittedly a friendly, and not an industrial society ; but the application of sect. 30 is limited only to societies of either kind which receive contributions by means of collectors at a greater distance than ten miles from the registered office of the society. The words of limitation cannot relate only to industrial assurance companies, for such a construction would deprive all friendly societies of the power of enforcing their rules concerning the settlement of disputes. Sect. 22 applies to this claim, and the magistrate has no power to interfere.

Wood Hill for the claimant.—If the 13th sub-section be read with the introductory words of this sect. 30, it will be seen that the limitation of application relates only to industrial and not to friendly societies. Sub-sect. 10 is expressly rendered applicable to industrial assurance companies, wherever they receive contributions ; it never could have been intended to deprive members of friendly societies of the same remedies in disputes as are given to other similar societies. This, too, is the natural interpretation of the words at the beginning of the section.

Charles, Q.C. in reply.

Mellor, J.—I have been very much perplexed by the various provisions of this Act, which are apparently inconsistent with one another ; but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the construction contended for by the person claiming this money is right. I cannot help thinking that sect. 30 intends that all friendly societies should be within sub-sect. 10, and that certain industrial societies, but not all, should also be within it. That being so, the intention was that persons having questions with such societies should have recourse to the summary jurisdiction provided in sub-sect. 10 for their settlement. This seems to have been the view of my brother Field at chambers, and I think this application, to reverse his order, must be dismissed.

Manisty, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the decision of my brother Field should be affirmed. Looking at the interpretation clause in sect. 4, I think it appears that the Legislature had in mind two sets of societies, and it will be observed that part of the definition of an industrial assurance company is, that it is one which receives premiums or contributions by means of collectors, while a friendly society is spoken of in other parts as supported by voluntary subscriptions. Now the word subscription is not found in sect. 30. Then the general provisions which occur throughout the Act must be read subject to any limiting enactments having reference to the particular class of society. The general rule in sect. 22 is thus, as I think, qualified by the words in sect. 30. That sect. 30 was intended to qualify something must be conceded, and the only question really is, to what extent it qualifies sect. 22. If it be read in the ordinary grammatical sense of the word, friendly societies generally seem to be within the section ; had the intention been to convey a different meaning, the draughtsman would, I think, probably have worded it thus : "The provisions of this present section apply only to friendly societies receiving contributions by means of collectors at a greater distance than ten miles from the registered office of the society, and, except as after mentioned, to industrial assurance companies receiving contributions in like manner." Tried, therefore, by this test, the words of the section as it stands are inapt for the construction sought to be placed upon them by the appellants, and I think that the other construction, which accords with the form of the language, is not unreasonable, and expresses the intention in limitation of the general rule to confer on friendly societies and their members the option of resorting to a court of summary jurisdiction for the settlement of disputes. The clause "except as after mentioned," may, I think, be satisfied by the words at the end of sub-sect. 13, but it is not necessary in the present case to decide that point ; for I agree in thinking that there was no ground for prohibiting the magistrate here, as having acted without jurisdiction over this friendly society.

expenses incurred by it when acting in accordance with its statutory powers, as it is merely a select body of the guardians acting for and on behalf of the whole board, and the board alone has power to administer the funds of the union.

In 1871 and 1872 certain appeals had been brought by the plaintiffs against rates made upon the assessment of their works. The assessment committee, in the name of the guardians, appeared as respondents to such appeals. Whilst the appeals were pending it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the assessment committee that the appeals should be respited, and the valuation settled by arbitration. An agreement to this effect was entered into and signed by N., the chairman of the assessment committee, "for and on behalf of the committee," of which S. was the vice-chairman. The costs of the proceedings were left in the discretion of the arbitrator. The award was in favour of the plaintiffs, and the costs were ordered to be paid by "the other party." The plaintiffs had been compelled, in the first instance, to pay the costs in order to take up the award. They now claimed to recover the costs so paid from the respective defendants.

Held, that the defendants were not liable, as they merely acted on behalf of the guardians, who were "the other party" to the reference.

Held, also, that a reference to arbitration did not come within sect. 20 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103.

SPECIAL CASE.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court as follows:—

1. The plaintiffs are a company having powers to supply water to Leicester and other places.

2. In the year 1872 the guardians of Barrow-on-Soar Union, under and in pursuance of the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103, s. 2, duly appointed an assessment committee for that union. Such committee consisted of twelve members. The defendant William Nuttall was a member of such assessment committee so appointed in 1872, and was the chairman of such committee, and the defendant John Sheffield was also a member of such committee in the year 1872.

3. In 1871 and 1872 certain appeals had been brought by the plaintiffs, and were all pending, against rates made upon the assessment of the plaintiffs' works in and passing through several parishes in the Barrow-on-Soar Union. The guardians of the said union duly gave their consent to the assessment committee to appear and defend such appeals, and thereupon the said assessment committee for the year 1872, in pursuance of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 2, appeared in the name of the said guardians as respondents to such appeals.

4. While such appeals were pending the following memorandum was made and signed, namely:

Leicester Waterworks Company's Office.

8th June 1872.

At a meeting of the committee of directors of the Leicester Waterworks Company and the Assessment Committee of the Barrow-upon-Soar Union, comprising Messieurs Ellis, chairman, Harris, vice-chairman, and Hodges on behalf of the directors of the Waterworks Company, and Messieurs William Nuttall, chairman, Sheffield, vice-chairman, Thomas Nuttall, Camm, Matte, Wright, Cuffling, Cocks, on the part of the guardians of such union, it was unanimously agreed that all questions in relation to the rating of the above-named company's works and mains comprised in and passing through the several parishes of the said union be submitted to Mr. Thomas Hawksley on the part of the Waterworks Company, and to Mr. Corbett on behalf of the said guardians, with a view to their adjusting the same, and in case of their failing so to do with power to appoint an umpire, whose decision shall be final. This arrangement is subject to confirmation by the board of directors of the said waterworks company. That pending these negotiations the appeals entered by the waterworks company against the said rating, if necessary, be further respited, and in case it should be ultimately necessary to proceed with such appeals, no further notices thereof shall be required, nor any objection taken for want of form or otherwise, it being understood that the notices of appeal shall be taken as applying to the present assessment.

E. S. ELLIS, on behalf of the directors of the Leicester Waterworks Company.
To Mr. Nuttall, on behalf of the Assessment Committee of the Barrow-on-Soar Union.

5. On this arrangement being confirmed, an agreement of submission was drawn up, and was, with the consent of the said guardians of the Barrow-upon-Soar Union, signed for and on behalf of the assessment committee of the said union by the defendant William Nuttall as chairman for and on behalf of the assessment committee for the year 1872. Such agreement was headed,

Memorandum of an agreement made and entered into this 29th day of June 1872 between the Leicester Waterworks Company of the one part, and the assessment committee of the Barrow-upon-Soar Union in the county of Leicester, for and on behalf of the board of guardians of such union, of the other part.

And after stating the questions at issue, and the powers to be exercised by the umpire, provided that

The costs of all parties connected with the preparation of this agreement and of the reference hereby agreed upon, and of the certificate or award to be made by the said arbitrators or umpire, shall be in the discretion of the said arbitrators or umpire who, shall also decide and give directions as to the making of such alterations (if any) as shall by the decision of the said arbitrators or umpire be rendered necessary to be made in the amount at which the said Leicester Waterworks Company have been or may be assessed in respect of all rates laid by the overseers of any parish within the said union upon the works of the said Leicester Waterworks Company before the making of the certificate or award of the said arbitrators or umpire, and also as to the sum or sums of money (if any) to be repaid or allowed to the said Leicester Waterworks Company by the overseers of any such parish in respect of any rate which has been or may be paid by the said Leicester Waterworks Company, and in which the assessment of the works of the said Leicester Waterworks Company shall be in excess of the amount at which the same shall be severally assessed by the said arbitrators or umpire.

6. No judge's order, or order of sessions, was applied for or obtained by either party ordering or authorising such reference.

7. After determining the question of the assessment the umpire's award continued as follows:—"Now I do hereby further award and determine that the said company be repaid by the overseers of the said respective parishes out of the next effective rate or rates for the said parishes respectively, the differences between the rates as assessed upon the amounts so above awarded by me, and the rates as assessed upon amounts of rateable value so respectively entered in the rate books." "And I further award, determine, and direct that the costs of the said company connected with the preparation of the said agreement of reference, and of the reference, and of this my award be borne and paid by the other party to the said agreement of reference; and that if the said company shall have paid any of such costs, the same shall be repaid to them by the said other party to the said agreement."

8. While negotiations were pending, and while the appeals were pending, poor rates were continuously being laid by the several parishes, and the plaintiffs' property assessed in respect of the same. But for the agreement in the 4th paragraph mentioned the plaintiffs would have had to appeal against each rate, both to the assessment committee and to the quarter sessions. Each appeal to the quarter sessions would have had to be respited from time to time until a decision was finally arrived at, and very large expenses would have been thereby incurred both by the plaintiffs and the defendants.

9. The umpire duly advised the solicitors to both parties on the 2nd Feb. 1874 that the award was ready, and accordingly the plaintiffs on the 4th Feb. 1874, paid the sum of 372*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* for the umpire's charges. The award was not then formally completed, but was returned for completion, and completed on the 7th Feb. 1874.

10. Mr. Goode, who at that time was and still is solicitor both to the Barrow-on-Soar Union and to the assessment committee for the time being of such union, on the 5th day of February 1874 wrote and sent a letter to the plaintiffs' solicitor, which was received on the 6th day of February, 1874, and was as follows :

Barrow-upon-Soar Union.

Day of Fortnightly Meeting, Tuesday.

WILLIAM WHITE GOODE, Clerk to the Union.

Loughborough, 5th Feb. 1874.

Leicester Waterworks Company.

Dear Sir,—I have received a letter from Trollope and Winckworth that this award is ready on payment of the fees, viz., £372 18*s.* 9*d.*, which please take up for the appellants, on behalf of respondents I cannot.

Yours truly,

(Signed) WM. WHITE GOODE.

J. B. Haxby, Esq., Solicitor, Leicester.

11. A copy of the award was sent by the plaintiffs' solicitor to Mr. Goode on the 12th day of Feb. 1874, with a letter, of which the following is a copy :

11, Belvoir-street, Leicester,

February 12th, 1874.

Leicester Waterworks Company and the Assessment Committee of the Barrow-upon-Soar Union.

I beg herewith to send you in your official capacity of Clerk to the Assessment Committee an examined copy of the award of Mr. Hunt. I have paid the sum of 372*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* on taking up this award, which amount I find is ordered to be paid by your clients, the respondents, and of which I have to require repayment from them at once. As soon as the next quarter sessions are over, and the order of sessions made upon the several appeals in accordance with the decision set out in the award, I will send you my bill of costs, which has also to be discharged by your clients. In the mean time I shall be glad to hear from you with cheques for the amounts ordered by the award to be repaid by the several parishes to the appellants in respect of the amounts for rates paid by them to such parishes under protest pending the decision in this case, and which amounts are set out in the award.

I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

(Signed) JOS. B. HAXBY.

W. W. Goode, Esq.

The repayment not being made to the plaintiffs as requested, the award was, on the application of the plaintiffs, made a rule of court on the 21st Nov. 1874, and a copy of such rule and of plaintiffs' costs was duly served on Mr. Goode on the 16th Jan. 1875.

12. The plaintiffs' costs in the matter of the reference were taxed at 26*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, and a letter was sent on the 19th June 1875 to Mr. Goode, informing him thereof, and requesting payment.

13. The award has been acted upon by both parties, and the terms of it carried out so far as relates to the altering of the several valuations, and to the refunding of the various rates overpaid under protest by the plaintiffs. The award was by consent taken as the basis of settlement of the rateable value by the court of quarter sessions on the hearing of the appeals.

14. The Barrow-on-Soar Union duly, and in pursuance of the statute in that behalf, appointed an assessment committee in and for each of the years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876. In each of these years the assessment committee was differently constituted. The defendant William Nuttall was a member of such committee in each of the above years. He is no longer a member of the said committee, or of the said board of guardians. The defendant Sheffield was a member of such committee in the year 1872.

15. The assessment committee in all their proceedings with reference to the rates, appeal, and arbitration, were acting by and with the consent and approval of the guardians of the said union.

16. In an interview between the solicitors to the plaintiffs and defendants, it was arranged that the latter should take the opinion of the Local Government Board as to the defendants repaying the amount paid by the plaintiffs for the umpire's costs. Application was made for repayment by the defendants on the 10th June 1875. On the 16th Nov. 1875 a letter was sent to Mr. Goode demanding payment of the sum of 399*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* due under Mr. Hunt's award for costs, and on the same day a letter to the same effect was sent to Mr. Nuttall. The following reply was received from Mr. Nuttall, namely :

South Croxton,

Nov. 25th, 1875.

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 16th inst., with regard to the payment of costs due to the Leicester Waterworks Company from the Barrow-upon-Soar Union under an award of Mr. Hunt. I laid the case before the board on Tuesday last, and it seems there is a difficulty about the payment of them, so we instructed Mr. Goode to write to the Local Government Board in London for their advice about the matter. So I hope no steps will be taken pending their answer. I am, Sir, yours truly, (Signed) WILLIAM NUTTALL.

To J. B. Haxby, Esq.

In consequence of this request the plaintiffs did not then enforce payment for the sums for which this action is brought. The defendants however did not apply to the Poor Law Board for any extension of time for payment, and in consequence thereof no extension of time was made. These repeated applications not having been complied with, and repayment being still withheld, the writ in this action was issued on the 17th Feb. 1876. No order has been made by the Local Government Board extending the time for payment of the plaintiffs' claim.

17. No notice of action was given previously to the commencement of this action.

18. The plaintiffs have not been repaid any part of the amount so paid by them for the umpire's costs, nor have they been paid any part of their own taxed costs.

19. The plaintiffs have been put to other costs in consequence of the award not having been fully carried out with regard to the repayment of rates and in respect of other proceedings consequent thereon.

The questions for the opinion of the court are, First, whether under the above circumstances the defendants on the record of this action, some or one of them, are liable to repay to the plaintiffs the amount paid on taking up the award?

Secondly, whether the defendants on the record, some or one of them, are liable to pay the plaintiffs the amount of their taxed costs in connection with the reference?

Thirdly, whether the plaintiffs can recover from the defendants on the record, some or one of them, any damages under the circumstances hereinbefore stated? Such damages, if recoverable, to be settled by arbitration.

Merewether, Q.C. and Sills for the plaintiffs.—The assessment committee are liable for these costs, and this action is maintainable. They have entered into an agreement for arbitration, and they enjoy the fruits of that arbitration. But by one of the terms of the award they must pay the costs. They cannot avail themselves of one part of the award and reject the rest. The result of appointing an arbitrator was exactly the same as if they had employed an individual valuer. The 20th and 26th sections of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103 give them expressly such a power, and by the 37th section of the same Act they may provide for the expenses they incur. It was unnecessary to have the authority of the guardians for taking this step, their consent and approval was all that was necessary. The guardians are not liable for this payment; the assessment committee is the sole intermediary between the creditor and the various parishes, and no doubt the parishes are ultimately liable: (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39.) The provision of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 49, which limits the time in which an action may be brought against guardians, is not applicable to this case, as it is clear from the correspondence that the defendants are alone responsible for the delay that has occurred. Moreover, if the assessment committee is not liable as a body or quasi corporation, they are liable individually for what they have done. At all events Nuttall and Sheffield are bound by their signatures:

Cherry v. The Bank of Australasia, 21 L. T. Rep. 866; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 24;

Bottomley v. Fisher, 11 H. & C. 21; 6 L. T. Rep. 688;

They also cited

Kirby v. Banister, 5 B. & Ad. 1069.

Marshall Griffith, Q.C. for the assessment committee.—It is impossible to sue the assessment committee qua committee. They are not a corporation, nor yet a quasi corporation. If the committee contracted at all they did so as the agents of the guardians; there is no case on record where any assessment committee has ever been treated as defendants, and the reason for that probably is that they are a fluctuating body changing from year to year. They have, moreover, no funds under their control from which they could pay these expenses. In 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, which deals with expenditure of this kind, the assessment committee is never mentioned at all—all the provisions there apply either to the parishes or to the board of guardians. The action here should have been against the board, but the time for bringing such an action has elapsed, and the plaintiffs want to get over the difficulty occasioned thereby by means of the present action. The agreements entered into between the parties show that the guardians were all along regarded as the responsible parties, and it is impossible for the plaintiffs to turn round now and try to fix the liability on the assessment committee.

Pitt Lewis and Glen for the other defendants.—No personal liability attaches to Nuttall or Sheffield, as it is clear they were acting for the committee, and it is found by the case (par. 15) that they did not act ultra vires:

Lindus v. Melrose, 3 H. & N. 177; 31 L. T. Rep. O. S. 86;

But even if they did act ultra vires, their powers were defined by law, and the plaintiffs ought to have known the extent of those powers:

Rashdall v. Ford, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 750; 14 L. T. Rep. 790.

In Cherry v. Bank of Australasia (ubi sup.) there was a distinct misrepresentation of fact, but there is nothing of the kind here. The wrong course has been adopted; the proper procedure would have been under Baines's Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45), ss. 12, 13. Under these circumstances no one is liable for these costs. They also cited

Thorpe v. Cole, 1 M. & W. 531.

MELLOR, J.—This is a case between the Leicester Waterworks Company and the Assessment Committee of the Barrow-on-Soar Union, and Mr. Nuttall, the chairman of the committee, is also made a defendant to the action. Now, the case arises in this way. The plaintiffs are the Waterworks Company of Leicester, and their works, which are necessary for the supply of the town, run through various parishes of the Barrow Union, and differences have arisen as to the value at which these works should be assessed for the payment of the poor rate. It appears to me that there can be no doubt that, under such circumstances, it would be a prudent and wise course for the parties if sui juris to meet together, and to come to some agreement as to the sum at which the property in question should be rated, rather than endeavour to arrive at that conclusion by a series of costly appeals. Here it was determined, and wisely determined, as it appears to me, that the rateable value of these works should be ascertained by some competent person—a course which might reasonably be calculated to save great expense. Accordingly a meeting took place between the waterworks company, as represented by their chairman, and the assessment committee of the Barrow-on-Soar Union, and at this meeting it was agreed that, pending negotiations, the appeals, of which several had been entered, should be respite, and ultimately the two parties entered into the agreement, which is dated the 29th June 1872, which purports to be made between the Leicester Waterworks Company of the one part, and the assessment committee of the Barrow-upon-Soar Union in the county of Leicester, for and on behalf of the board of guardians of such union, of the other part; and this agreement was signed by Mr. Ellis, the chairman of the water company, and by Mr. Nuttall on behalf of the assessment committee. In this agreement it was recited that differences had arisen with regard to the rating of the works and mains of the company, and that it had been agreed to submit the whole question to arbitration. This was accordingly done, and, by an agreement of submission, the parties bound themselves to abide the award of the arbitrators as to costs. Subsequently the reference was held, and an award was made in favour of the waterworks company, and certain expenses which the umpire charged became payable by the opposite party, that is, apparently by the assessment committee or the board of guardians, who had incurred the expenses in the first instance. The award having been made, and the amount of the expenses ascertained, an action has been brought against the assessment committee, and Mr. Nuttall and Mr. Sheffield, who appear to have been the chairman and vice-chairman of that committee. The question for us to determine is, whether such an action will lie either against the committee or against these gentlemen who signed on behalf of the committee. I am of opinion that it will not. In the first place, who form the assessment committee, and how is it constituted? By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103, s. 2, it is enacted that the board of guardians of every union shall in every year appoint from among themselves any number, not less than six or more than twelve, to be a committee, to be called the assessment committee of the union, and the duties cast upon the committee are to investigate and supervise the valuations made in accordance with the Act. Now we may assume that this committee was duly elected in the manner prescribed by the Act, and that upon it devolved the duties there mentioned; still they were guardians, for they were a part of the guardians elected out of the larger body, because a smaller number would, with greater propriety and greater ease, perform the duties required by the Act of Parliament, which include the hearing of objections to the valuation list, and the making of alterations and corrections in the same. It has been contended by Mr. Merewether that under sect. 20, which enacts that the committee may, with the consent of the guardians, appoint or employ a person to revise and value the rateable hereditaments comprised in the valuation list, or may take such other means as they may think necessary for ascertaining the correctness thereof; the assessment committee could refer a question of value to arbitrators in the same way as they would refer it to an ordinary valuer. But it appears to me that the object of the section is to obtain a valuation list which may be useful for the future, and that it does not give the committee power to refer the valuation of any particular property against which an appeal may have been lodged to the arbitration of persons that may be agreed upon between them and the appellants—that, to my mind, is clearly not contemplated by the section. I cannot help thinking that the true course in a case of this kind would have been to have proceeded under Baines's Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45), then the arbitration proceedings would first have obtained the authority of a judge's order. That has not been done here. The question therefore arises whether the assessment committee had power to incur the expenses of arbitration without taking the course I have suggested, and, if not, whether the expenses have been so incurred as to render the committee personally liable for them. I think not, for the contract they have entered into for arbitration expressly states that they were acting on behalf of the guardians of the union, and no doubt, as they acted for the guardians, the guardians were relied upon to discharge any expenses incurred under the agreement. I am of opinion, therefore, that they have never acted in such a way as to render themselves personally liable. Nor is the committee liable qua assessment committee, for it is not a corporation—it is merely a body selected from amongst the guardians to perform certain acts which are entailed upon them by the sections of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103. It has no funds of its own. The funds of the union, which are administered by the guardians, are the only means available for discharging liabilities incurred by the assessment committee. The guardians therefore can alone be liable, and if sued in time, and it appears that the committee acted with their assent, they no doubt might be bound to pay these costs. That being so, it is scarcely necessary to go further than to say that neither the assessment committee collectively nor individually, nor Mr. Nuttall nor Mr. Sheffield is liable for the costs of the arbitration. Unfortunately it happens that, although these expenses have been most wisely incurred with a view to save great expense, the assessment committee were not en juris, but were acting under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and it is provided, as I have before said, that their expenses are to come from the funds of the union, which must be administered by the guardians and not by any select body of such guardians. Unfortunately, however, the time within which the claim could have been made against the guardians had been allowed to elapse; for by the provisions of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 49, the period within which actions may be brought against boards of guardians is strictly limited, and in this case no proceedings had been taken before that period had elapsed. By the 4th section of that Act the time is in certain cases extended, but that is to enable the guardians to make payments to a man who has used all due diligence in prosecuting his claim, and where nevertheless he has been unable to bring the case to a conclusion from delays over which he had no control; but I think that that section is not applicable in this case, and I confess I am sorry, because everything here has been done in a bona fide manner by both parties. I regret very much, therefore, that under the circumstance of this case I think that no one is liable. On all these grounds I am of opinion that there was no liability on the part of the assessment committee, or of Mr. Nuttall or of Mr. Sheffield, though there may have been on the part of the guardians. The questions submitted to us must therefore be answered in the negative.

MANISTY, J.—I am also of opinion that these three questions should be answered in the negative. I do not think it is necessary, after the careful manner in which my brother Mellor has recapitulated the facts of this case, to go over them again. This is not an action by a person who has been employed by the assessment committee to make a valuation. This is not an action by employed against employer, but by one of two parties to a contract against the other, and is founded on a contract as to how the costs of an arbitration entered into between the parties should be paid. The only question before us is, who are the parties to the submission to reference; and that will appear from the agreements of the 8th June 1872 and the 29th June 1872. Who are the parties to those agreements? The waterworks company no doubt on the one part—not their chairman, who only acted in a representative capacity, just as Mr. Nuttall did for the assessment committee; and the assessment committee for the board of guardians on the other part. Having ascertained, without reference in any way to the validity of the contract, that the parties to the contract were on the one part the Leicester Waterworks Company, and the guardians of the union on the other part, it appears to me that we have almost entirely disposed of the whole case. It has been contended that we must look simply at the signatures; but, as far as I understand the authorities, it is necessary to look at the whole document and at the signature as part of it. To my mind the intention of the parties is very clearly expressed in the document itself. It purports to be an agreement entered into "between the Leicester Waterworks Company of the one part and the assessment committee of the Barrow-on-Soar Union, in the county of Leicester, for and on behalf of the board of guardians of such union, on the other part." The Leicester Waterworks Company are the one party, and the guardians the "other party" referred to in the award who are to pay these costs. The costs are in the arbitrator's discretion; he decides they are to be paid by the "other party," and upon looking into the matter we find that the other party is the board of guardians—it is with their consent that the assessment committee entered into the contract, and it was made on their behalf, and by the terms of the agreement they are to pay these costs. It follows, therefore, that neither collectively nor individually can the assessment committee be sued—it is not a corporation, so that we do not know what the term "assessment committee" really means. Whether an action might be maintained against the guardians I cannot say, though I have my opinion upon the point. I am strongly of opinion that the 20th section of the Assessment Act of 1872 gives no power to refer the question of a valuation to an arbitrator, whose decision was to be final. That appears to be the purport of the agreement, but that intention should have been carried out under the provisions of Baines's Act. If the question were as to the liability of the guardians, I should require time to consider it. But here clearly the Statute of Limitations has no bearing upon the question at issue, so it is needless to discuss it.

LAX v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF DARLINGTON. (a)

Negligence—Public market—Liability of lord of market for misfeasance—Frequentation of market not a mere licensee.

The defendants were the owners of a market which is held for the sale of cattle at D. In the market place defendants had erected spiked railings round a statue which had been placed there. This railing the jury found was dangerous for cattle with a propensity for leaping. A cow which the plaintiff had brought to market attempted to jump the railings, and was killed in so doing. The plaintiff sought to recover from the defendants the value of the cow.

Held, that the defendants were liable, as, by erecting the railings, they had done a wrongful act, whereby a safe market had been rendered unsafe; and that the plaintiff had not been guilty of contributory negligence, inasmuch as, having paid toll for the use of the market there, he was not a mere licensee placing his cattle at his own risk, but was entitled to a safe standing place for them.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

This was an action tried before Lush, [J., at Newcastle, whereby plaintiff sought to recover compensation for the loss of a cow which had been killed by attempting to jump certain spiked railings erected by the defendants in the market place of Darlington. It was contended on the part of the defendants that the plaintiff was a mere licensee who was bound to take the market as he found it; that the danger was not concealed, and therefore the plaintiff should have guarded against it, and that there was no obligation upon the defendants to make the market absolutely safe.

Cave, Q.C. and Edge for plaintiff.

Herschell, Q.C. and Shield for defendants.

The following written judgment was delivered by LUSH, J.—This action is brought to recover compensation for the loss of a cow, which came to its death from an attempt to leap over a spiked fence, placed by the defendants round a statue which they had erected in the market place of Darlington. The defendants are the owners of the market which is held for the sale of cattle, and the plaintiff had for many years brought his cattle there for sale. The market is held in the public street. The plaintiff had regularly occupied with his cattle a given site, for which he paid toll, and the statue had been erected near to that site between two and three years before the accident happened. The only point contested at the trial was, whether the spiked railing was or was not of sufficient height from the ground. The top of the spikes was 2ft. 6in. from the stone in which the bars were set, and this the jury found was insufficient, and the railing being spiked, was consequently dangerous to cattle having a propensity to leaping. It was not contended that the plaintiff was guilty of any negligence in not properly looking after or managing his herd. The point made at the trial, and which has since been argued before me, was that the corporation was under no obligation to have the fence of such a height as that cattle could not or would not be tempted to leap it; that the plaintiff was a licensee who must take the market as he found it; that there was plenty of room for him to stand his cattle elsewhere (which for aught that appeared was the fact); and that as the danger was not concealed, but one obvious and apparent, he placed the cattle there at his peril. I am of opinion that neither of these objections is tenable. The franchise of a market, like that of a port, is granted for the benefit of the public, and everyone has as good a right to frequent the market for selling and buying the marketable commodities as

(a) Reported by A. H. POYSEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div.]

HARGREAVES v. SCOTT AND ANOTHER.

[C.P. Div.]

he has to traverse a public highway. The grantee of a market, especially when he takes a toll for his own benefit, does, I think, incur an obligation to maintain the market in a state reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was granted. (See the observations of Bayley, J., in Prince v. Lewis, 5 B. & C. 371.) I see no reason why, if he erects in the market place which he appropriates to the market any dangerous obstruction which causes danger to the property or the persons of those who frequent the market for a lawful purpose, he should not be liable to an indictment as much as the person who places a dangerous obstruction in a public highway. Of course, where the danger is, as it was in this case, obvious and apparent, a person who heedlessly and without reasonable care to avoid it incurs damage, cannot maintain any action, because he is the author of his own wrong. But he is not a contributor to his own wrong by going to the market. The owner or the person who, in legal phraseology, is lord of the market, has no right to say to him, "You might have gone to some other market, and as you chose to come here with your cattle, you elected to run the risk." Nor can the owner of a port excuse himself for erecting a dangerous obstruction to the navigation by saying to the shipowner, "You might have gone to some other port." The subject using a port or a market is not a mere licensee, he is exercising a right as one of the public for whose benefit the port or the market was erected, and is entitled to have a free and safe passage in the one case, and a safe standing place in the other. I was impressed at the time with an argument urged by Mr. Herschell. Suppose, he said, that the market was situate on the bank of a river or lake, is the man responsible if the cattle brought there run into the water and drown themselves? If the specific spot were designated in the charter by which the market was granted, so that the grantee had no option to hold it elsewhere, I am inclined to think he would, even in that case, be bound to fence for the protection of cattle; but if no place was designated, and he voluntarily selected so dangerous a spot, I should say certainly he would. This case, however, does not require that question to be answered. The charge against the corporation is of misfeasance, not of nonfeasance. The erection which constituted the danger in this case was an artificial erection by them, by which they rendered a safe market an unsafe one; that was a wrongful act. Nor do I think it is competent to the defendants to object that the plaintiff chose to continue standing his cattle in the place he had been accustomed to use long before the statue was erected. Every part of a market place is open to buyers and sellers, subject to the reasonable control and regulation of the lord of the market, and the selection of the spot in question was as much the act of the corporation as of the plaintiff, for they regularly charged and received toll for the use of that specific site. Besides, it is impossible to say that the damage would not have happened if the herd of which the cow formed part had been stationed at some other part. But whether it would or not is not in my judgment material. The defendants had done a wrongful act in placing the spiked rails in the cattle market so low as to be dangerous to the cattle; this was the immediate cause of the injury, and they cannot say the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in using that part of the market which they assigned to him, though it was in proximity to the danger, he not being guilty of any negligence which immediately conduced to the accident. See Clayards v. Dethick (12 Q. B. 439; 11 L. T. Rep., O. S. 222); Thompson v. North-Eastern Railway Company (2 B. & S. 106; 6 L. T. Rep. 127; 31 L. J. Q. B. 194.) I therefore give judgment for the plaintiff for the agreed amount—22l. 14s. 6d., and costs.

HARGREAVES v. SCOTT AND ANOTHER. (a)

Costs, taxation of—Municipal election petition—Counsel's fees—Discretion of master—35 & 36 Vict. c. 60, s. 19, sub-sect. 2.

The Court will not interfere with the master's taxation of counsel's fees, unless there is ground for thinking that he has not exercised a reasonable and fair discretion.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Field, J., upholding the master's taxation of the costs of a municipal election petition. A Queen's counsel had been taken specially down to Carlisle, and he received 100 guineas with his brief, and a refresher of 25 guineas on each of the five days that the case lasted. His junior received 35 guineas with his brief, and a refresher of 15 guineas per day. On taxation, the master reduced the fee on the Queen's counsel's brief to 25 guineas, with refreshers of 15 guineas per day; and on the junior's brief to 15 guineas, and refreshers of 10 guineas per day. The master had appended to his allocatur a note to the effect that he had exercised his discretion according to the practice.

Day, Q.C. for the appellant.—The Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60), s. 19, sub-sect. 2, enacts that "the costs may be taxed in the prescribed manner, but according to the same principles as costs between attorney and client in a suit in the High Court of Chancery." All costs which can be recovered by an attorney from his client can be recovered as costs between attorney and client in a suit in the High Court of Chancery. All costs reasonably incurred by the attorney can be recovered by him from his client. It is submitted that the fees that have been disallowed were costs reasonably incurred by the attorney. In Hill v. Peel (the Southampton case) (L. Rep. 5 O. P. 172), Bovill, C. J. says that the meaning of a like provision in the Parliamentary Elections Act is, that the parties are entitled to "an indemnity for all costs that are reasonably incurred by them in the ordinary course of matters of this nature, but not to any extraordinary or unusual expenses incurred in consequence of over caution or over anxiety as to any particular case, or from considerations of any special importance arising from the rank, position, wealth, or character of either of the parties, or any special desire on his part to insure success." In that case the brief was very voluminous, and contained instructions for the examination of eight-five witnesses on behalf of the respondent. The leading counsel received with his brief 200 guineas, and 50 guineas each day for refreshers, besides consultation fees; the master allowed only 100 guineas with the brief, and 25 guineas each day for refreshers, to include consultation fees. The junior counsel received 150 guineas with his brief, and 30 guineas each day for refreshers, besides consultation fees; the master allowed only 75 guineas with the brief, and 15 guineas each day for refreshers, to include consultation fees. Bovill, C.J., in giving judgment, said: "The Southampton case appears to us to stand upon a somewhat different footing. The master seems to have allowed the fees in that case rather as in accordance with a general rule than upon a due consideration of the circumstances of the particular case; and, looking to the affidavits and voluminous briefs in that particular case, we think it will be more satisfactory that the case should be re-considered by him, and upon the principles which we have laid down." In the present case the brief contained about 200 sheets, and there were 160 witnesses examined.

GROVE, J.—I see no reason for interfering with the discretion of the master in this case, which has been held by the judge at chambers to have been rightly exercised. Each of these cases depends on its own facts. This was a municipal election petition. Of course such a case may involve difficult questions of law, as may any case that comes before a revising barrister or a County Court judge. But it seems to me that we must look at the general nature of such cases. Considering that this was a municipal election petition, I do not see that the master has plainly exercised a wrong discretion. If I had been asked what would be the reasonable fees to give in this case, I should have said fifty guineas on the brief and fifteen guineas refresher. Practically that is what the master has allowed, as I never heard of a refresher being given before a case has begun. What I understand the master to say, is what one would expect him to say,—I do not lay down any hard and fast rule as to what fees are to be allowed in municipal election petitions, but I have allowed what, according to the practice, is reasonable.

DENMAN, J.—I see no ground for thinking that in this case the master did not exercise a reasonable and fair discretion.

REDDISH v. HITCHINOR. (a)

Magistrates' clerk — Fees — Liability of person giving prisoner into custody—5 Geo. 4, c. 83, ss. 4, 6—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, ss. 78, 92.

An inhabitant of a borough, who gives into the custody of a police constable suspected persons, and gives evidence against them before the borough magistrates, is not liable to the clerk of the magistrates for his fees in respect of the conviction of such persons, under the Vagrant Act, as rogues and vagabonds.

(a) Reported by A. H. BITTLESTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Semble, that the borough fund is liable for such fees.

THE plaintiff, who is clerk to the borough magistrates at Stockport, sued the defendant (the station master of the London and North-Western Railway Company at Stockport), in the County Court of Cheshire, holden at Stockport, for 22s., the amount of fees to which he claimed to be entitled as magistrates' clerk under the following circumstances:—On the 18th Jan. last the defendant, whilst station master at the said railway station at Stockport, gave two persons into the custody of a police constable on the charge of picking pockets at such station. The defendant followed them to the police office, and afterwards appeared and gave evidence as prosecutor before the borough magistrates, who convicted the prisoners under the Vagrant Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83) of the offence of frequenting a place of public resort with the intent to commit a felony. In respect of such conviction the plaintiff claimed, as such magistrates' clerk, to be entitled to the fees the subject of this action. The plaintiff is paid a salary, but he receives all the fees that are payable by virtue of his office as magistrates' clerk, out of which he retains the amount of his salary, and pays the balance to the borough fund. The County Court judge found a verdict for the plaintiff for 15s., according to the schedule of fees of justices' clerks made by the justices with the approval of the Secretary of State. A rule nisi was afterwards obtained on behalf of the defendant to set aside this verdict, against which

F. Clerk, for the plaintiff, now showed cause.—The defendant is liable to pay the fees of the magistrates' clerk. In Oke's Magisterial Synopsis (p. 109, 12th edit.), it is laid down that "the party liable to the clerks to the justices, however appointed, for the amount of their fees allowed or sanctioned for the particular business, is, except where otherwise directed by statute, the person who made the application or instituted the proceedings in respect of which the fee is due, and the proper way is not to give any credit, but insist upon the payment at the time, and refuse to do the act required until payment." In Reg. v. Coles (8 Q. B. 82), Coleridge, J. says: "Whoever wants the thing in respect of which the fee is made payable, must pay the fee; the prosecutor if he takes out a warrant, the defendant if he enters an appearance." In Wray v. Chapman (19 L. J. Rep. 155, M.C.) the same learned judge says: "It must be admitted that ordinarily the clerks have a right to fees for their services, and ordinarily the party applying is bound to pay these fees." He also cited

Reg. v. Mayor of Gloucester, 5 Q. B. 962.

Collins, Q.C., in support of the rule, referred to 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, ss. 4, 6, which provide (inter alia) that "every suspected person or reputed thief, frequenting any river, canal, or navigable stream, dock or basin, or any quay, wharf, or warehouse near or adjoining thereto, or any street, highway, or place adjacent, with intent to commit felony . . . shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond" (s. 4); and "that it shall be lawful for any person whatsoever to apprehend any person who shall be found offending against this Act, and forthwith to take and convey him or her before some justice of the peace, to be dealt with in such manner as is hereinbefore directed, or to deliver him or her to any constable or other peace officer of the place where he or she shall have been apprehended, to be so taken and conveyed as aforesaid; and in case any constable or other peace officer shall refuse or wilfully neglect to take such offender into his custody, and to take and convey him or her before some justice of the peace . . . he shall on conviction be punished in such manner as is hereinafter directed" (s. 6). [He was stopped by the Court.]

GROVE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. Looking only at the provisions of the Vagrant Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), I do not think that the defendant in this case would be liable for the fees payable to the magistrates' clerk. The defendant is not a constable, he is to be considered only as a witness after having given the prisoners to a constable; I do not see, therefore, how he could be held liable in this action. But further, I think that the 78th and 92nd sections of the Municipal Corporations Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) apply here, and that the borough fund is liable for these fees. That Act provides, by sect. 78, "that it shall be lawful for any constable during the time of his being on duty, to apprehend all idle and disorderly persons whom he shall find disturbing the public peace, or whom he shall have just cause to suspect of intention to commit a felony, and to deliver any person so apprehended into the custody of the constable appointed under this Act, who shall be in attendance at the nearest watch-house, in order that such person may be secured until he can be brought before a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law, &c.," and by sect. 92, that the borough fund "shall be applied towards the payment of" certain specified expenses, and "all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for, which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act." The fees which are sought to be recovered in this action were expenses incurred in carrying the Municipal Corporations Act 1835, into effect, and therefore the case is within that Act. On these grounds I think that the defendant is not liable.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It may be that the plaintiff can recover these fees, as has been suggested by my brother Grove; but I do not see how he can recover them from the defendant. No doubt, a person who wants anything to be done for him by the justices' clerk must pay him his fees; but here the defendant did not employ the plaintiff—he simply gave the prisoners into custody, and left the law to take its course.

Rule absolute.

BENNETT v. ATKINS. (a)

APPEAL FROM REVISING BARRISTER.

Parliament—Borough vote—Payment of rates by landlord—Allowance of deductions—Notice in writing—Condition precedent—Waiver—32 & 33 Vict. c. 41, ss. 3, 4, 7—30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 3.

The Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 provides that (sect. 4) "The vestry of any parish may from time to time order that the owners of all rateable hereditaments to which sect. 3 of this Act extends, situate within such parish, shall be rated to the poor rate in respect to such rateable hereditaments, instead of the occupiers, on all rates made after the date of such order; and thereupon, and so long as such order shall be in force, the following enactments shall have effect: 1. The overseers shall rate the owners instead of the occupiers, and shall allow to them an abatement or deduction of 15 per cent. from the amount of the rate. 2. If the owner of one or more such rateable hereditaments shall give notice to the overseers, in writing, that he is willing to be rated for any term not being less than one year in respect of all such rateable hereditaments of which he is the owner, whether the same be occupied or not, the overseers shall rate such owner accordingly; and allow to him a further abatement or deduction not exceeding 15 per cent. from the amount of the rate during the time he is so rated." (Sect. 7) "Every payment of a rate by the owner, whether he is himself rated instead of the occupier, or has agreed with the occupier or with the overseers to pay such rate, and notwithstanding any allowance or deduction which the overseers are empowered to make from the rate, shall be deemed a payment of the full rate by the occupier for the purpose of any qualification or franchise which as regards rating depends upon the payment of the poor rate."

Held, that a notice in writing by the owner that he was willing to be rated in respect of his hereditaments, whether occupied or not, was a condition precedent to the overseers allowing him an abatement further than 15 per cent. from the amount of the rate, and could not be waived by the overseers. Where, therefore, in the absence of such notice the owner had been allowed an abatement of 25 per cent. from the full amount of rate paid by ordinary occupiers:

Held, that, that allowance not being one which the overseers were empowered to make, the payment of such rate by the owner could not be deemed a payment of the full rate by the occupier for the purpose of preserving to the occupier the franchise.

CONSOLIDATED appeal from the decision of the revising barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the borough of New Windsor. The respondent duly objected to the name of the appellant being retained on the list of voters for the parish of Clewer, in the said borough. The description of the appellant on the said list was as follows: Bennett, Charles, 91, Victoria-cottages, house, 91, Victoria-cottages. The appellant occupied during the qualifying period a house, No. 91, Victoria-cottages, and he stated that by agreement with the owner of the house the owner paid the poor rate thereon.

The rating of the said house, No. 91, Victoria-cottages, was as follows :

Parish of Clewer. Rate made in the month of October 1877. No. 263; name of occupier, Bennett, Charles; name of owner, R. R. Gardner; description of property rated, cottage; name or situation of property, 91, Victoria-cottages; estimated extent, three perches; gross estimated rental, 10*l.*; rateable value, 8*l.*; rate at 6*d.* in the pound, 4*s.*; amount of rate assessed upon and payable by the owner instead of the occupier by virtue of the statute or statutes in that behalf, 3*s.*; allowed to owner, 1*s.*; total amount to be collected, 2*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* (bracketed with other names); amount actually collected, 2*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*

The assistant overseer of the parish of Clewer produced the minute book of the vestry of the parish of Clewer, from which it appeared that, at a vestry meeting of that parish, held the 11th Nov. 1869, it was proposed by Mr. Foster, seconded by Mr. George, and ordered, that the owners of all rateable hereditaments in that parish to which the 4th section of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 applied, be rated to the Poor Rate in respect of such rateable hereditaments, instead of the occupiers; under which order of the vestry owners of property were entitled to an allowance of 15 per cent. from the full amount of rate payable by ordinary occupiers. The assistant overseer stated that neither he nor the overseers had received any notice in writing, as required by the 4th section, sub-sect. 2, of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869, from the owner of the cottage No. 91, Victoria-cottages, that he was willing to be rated and to pay the rates made in respect of the said cottage, whether the same was occupied or not; and, although such notice had not been given, the owner had been allowed a further abatement or deduction of 10 per cent., making together an allowance of 25 per cent. from the full amount of rate paid by ordinary occupiers. It was objected to the appellant's right to be on the list of voters that the extra 10 per cent. was illegal, as no notice in writing had been given by the owner to the overseers that he was willing to be rated and pay the rates in respect of cottage No. 91, Victoria-cottages, whether the same was occupied or not, and that he had not paid an equal amount of rate in the pound to that paid by an ordinary occupier, as required by the People's Representation Act 1867, sect. 3, sub-sect. 4.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the rate having been paid by the owner, he being rated instead of the occupier, pursuant to the order in vestry, such payment by the owner must be considered as that of the occupier, by virtue of the 7th section of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869. The revising barrister held that there was no proof or evidence that any written notice had ever been given by the owner to the overseers, as required by sect. 4, sub-sect. 2, of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869, to entitle him to the further abatement or deduction of 10 per cent., that had been allowed to the owner by the overseers, and therefore the owner was not entitled to the extra deduction of 10 per cent., and the extra allowance of 10 per cent. allowed by the overseers to the owner was an illegal allowance; and that the appellant had not therefore, on or before the 20th July last, bond fide paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of all poor rates that had become payable by him in respect of the premises occupied by him up to the preceding 5th Jan.; and the revising barrister expunged the name of the appellant from the said list. Sect. 4, sub-sect. 2, of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41) is as follows:

The vestry of any parish may, from time to time, order that the owners of [rateable hereditaments of a certain value] situate within such parish, shall be rated to the poor rate in respect to such rateable hereditaments, instead of the occupiers, on all rates made after the date of such order; and thereupon, and so long as such order shall be in force, the following enactments shall have effect [inter alia, sub-sect. 2]:

If the owner of one or more rateable hereditaments shall give notice to the overseers, in writing, that he is willing to be rated for any term not being less than one year in respect of all such rateable hereditaments of which he is the owner, whether the same be occupied or not, the overseers shall rate such owner accordingly; and allow to him a further abatement or deduction not exceeding 15 per centum from the amount of the rate during the time he is so rated.

Sect. 7 of the same Act is as follows:

Every payment of a rate by the occupier, notwithstanding the amount thereof may be deducted from his rent as herein provided, and every payment of a rate by the owner, whether he is himself rated instead of the occupier, or has agreed with the occupier, or with the overseers, to pay such rate, and notwithstanding any allowance or deduction which the overseers are empowered to make from the rate, shall be deemed a payment of the full rate by the occupier for the purpose of any qualification or franchise which, as regards rating, depends upon the payment of the poor rate.

The 3rd section, sub-sect. 4 of the Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102) is as follows:

Every man shall, in and after the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, be entitled to be registered as a voter, and, when registered, to vote for a member or members to serve in Parliament for a borough, who is qualified as follows; (that is to say) [inter alia, sub-sect. 4] Has on or before the twentieth day of July in the same year bond fide paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of all poor rates that have become payable by him up to the preceding fifth day of January [in respect of the premises occupied by him].

If the court should be of opinion that the amount paid by the owner, after deducting the extra allowance of 10 per cent., was a legal amount without any notice being given to the overseers, and was a sufficient payment of the rate by the appellant within the meaning of the 4th section of the People's Representation Act 1867, sub-sect. 3, the name of the appellant was to be inserted in the said list. The names of 230 other persons whose qualifications were similar to those of the appellant, and who were objected to on the same ground, were also expunged by the revising barrister, and their appeals were consolidated with the principal case.

The Solicitor-General (Lewis Coward with him) for the appellant.—The question is whether the absence of notice in writing to the overseers makes the deduction of the extra allowance of 10 per cent. illegal. The object of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 was to allow the parish to enter into arrangements with the owners of certain houses, by which the rates shall be paid by the owner instead of by the occupier. As a consideration for the owner doing so, 15 per cent. is to be allowed him for collecting the rate from the tenant, in the shape of rent, so saving the parish the trouble of collecting it; and as a further consideration, if the owner will undertake to pay the rate, whether the house be vacant or not, an additional deduction not exceeding 15 per cent. is to be allowed him. Can the mere omission of a notice in writing disfranchise the tenant, who is no party to the arrangement between the parish and the owner, and cannot, therefore, tell whether the statute has been complied with or not? The giving of the written notice may be waived. The consideration for the deduction is not the giving of the notice, but the agreeing to pay the rate whether the house be vacant or not. [LINDLEY, J.—You say that the decision of the revising barrister amounts to this, that the notice cannot be waived.] Yes. He cited

C.P. Div.]

BENNETT v. ATKINS.

Reg. v. The Mayor, &c., of Kidderminster, 20 L. J. 281, Q. B.

Kingdon, Q.C. for the respondent.—The question is, whether a notice in writing is not a condition precedent to the authority to make the allowance. A notice in writing is very necessary to protect the overseers and parish. It is not, therefore, a mere formal requirement. And it is not the less necessary to be in writing because it happens to be preliminary to an agreement. The section says, "If the owner . . . shall give notice to the overseers, in writing . . . the overseers shall . . . allow to him a further abatement," &c., which is equivalent to, No abatement shall be allowed, unless there is notice in writing. Why should that provision not be enforced, if it can be shown to have a reasonable ground, viz., to protect the overseers and parish? Durant v. Withers (2 Hop. & Colt. 202; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 257) is practically the same case as this. The deduction made in this case was unauthorised by the statute, and was consequently not one which is referred to in the 7th section as an allowance the overseers are empowered to make, and does not therefore come within the protection of that section.

The Solicitor-General in reply. — Here the notice was expressly waived. [LINDLEY, J.—Has a parish overseer, acting on behalf of the parish, power to waive such a notice? Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—There need be no agreement here; a notice alone is necessary under this section. A rich man might not care whether any further deduction was made or not, and might make no agreement. What power has the overseer to rate unequally? Only the power given him by this statute. But the notice here is merely preliminary. Deductions authorised to be made are any deductions made by agreement between the owner and the parish, subject to a limit as to the amount. [COLERIDGE, C.J.—The statute might easily have said so. GROVE, J.—By sect. 3 there may be a voluntary agreement between the owner and the parish that the owner shall be liable for the poor rates, and shall pay them whether the hereditament is occupied or not, and that the parish shall allow him a commission on the amount; and such agreement is to be "in writing." Surely that is not optional. And if that is not, why should the provision that the notice is to be in writing be optional? The words "in writing" would become meaningless.] The whole purview of the Act shows that the intention of the Legislature was to preserve the franchise to the occupier, where the owner agrees to pay the rates. By sect. 8 the occupier may pay them and deduct the amount from his rent, where the owner has omitted to pay, after agreeing or becoming liable to do so. By sect. 19, the overseers are to insert the name of the occupier in the rate book, whether the rate is collected from the owner or occupier, and the occupier, notwithstanding his name has been omitted, is to be entitled to every qualification and franchise depending upon rating in the same manner as if his name had not been so omitted. If the full rate has not been paid, then notice of the rate in arrear should have been given to the occupier, for, by sect. 10, "Section twenty-eight of the Representation of the People Act 1867, with respect to notice to be given of rates in arrear, shall apply to occupiers of premises capable of conferring the parliamentary franchise, although the owners of such premises have become liable for the rates assessed thereon under the provisions of this Act." He cited

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The question whether the deduction in this case was properly allowed depends on what is the correct construction of sect. 3, sub-sect. 4, of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 41, which enacts as follows: [reads the section, vide sup.] It might be urged that the person affected was the occupier and not the owner, and that to take away the franchise from the former would be punishing him for what it was out of his power to prevent. The courts, however, have nothing to do with the effect of an Act of Parliament; their only function is to construe it, and Parliament can then make any alteration which may seem desirable. But there is another answer to such a contention; the Act gives the voter certain privileges depending on rating which he would otherwise not have been entitled to, and as he gets the benefit he must accept the accompanying burden. I am of opinion that, according to the correct construction of the Act, our judgment must be for the respondent. Sect. 4 provides that the owner of occupied tenements of a certain value may be compulsorily rated instead of the occupiers, and sub-sect. 2 allows an extra deduction where the owner gives a notice in writing of his willingness to be rated in respect of unoccupied tenements. In my opinion the notice here mentioned must be in writing just as much as the voluntary agreement for the same purpose, mentioned in the preceding section (sect. 3), must be in writing; and I think that its being so is a condition precedent to allowing the deduction. The words of the Act are plain, conferring a power on the overseers in a particular event, which event has not arisen. As to the contention that the overseers had power to waive the notice in writing, there is nothing in the Act to warrant it, and, as the overseers occupy a public character, there are good reasons why they should not have such a power given them. This view is supported by sect. 7, which says that the occupier shall be entitled to the franchise when the owner pays the rates, notwithstanding any allowance which the overseers are "empowered to make." The word "empowered" must mean legally empowered. The Act says that rating may be unequal under certain conditions, and, those conditions not having been complied with, the overseers were not empowered to allow the abatement, and the decision of the revising barrister ought to be affirmed.

GROVE, J.—I am also of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister ought to be affirmed. For a long time during the argument I was of a different opinion, the reason being that I thought that it was assumed by the learned counsel on both sides that the agreement, mentioned in the 3rd section of the Act, might be a verbal agreement. Looking only to the words at the beginning of that section as to the hereditaments to which it is to apply, and, passing over the intermediate words, to those at the end, "the overseers may, subject nevertheless to the control of the vestry, agree with the owner to receive the rates from him, and to allow to him a commission not exceeding 25 per cent. on the amount thereof," the agreement there referred to might be a verbal one. If that had been the case, then it might be contended that sects. 7 and 8 would preserve the franchise to the occupier wherever there was an understanding that the owner should pay the rates, and would not depend upon any preliminary matter such as a notice having been given in writing. If the agreement in the 3rd section need not be in writing, then the 7th section says that "every payment of a rate by the owner, whether he is himself rated instead of the occupier, or has agreed with the occupier or with the overseers to pay such rate, and notwithstanding any allowance or deduction which the overseers are empowered to make from the rate, shall be deemed a payment of the full rate by the occupier for the purpose of any qualification or franchise," &c. Now, if the words "agreed to" there referred to a verbal agreement, it would show that the substance and not the formalities were to be looked to, and that, therefore, the notice in writing was a preliminary, and its absence could not affect the franchise of the voter. But, upon reading the 3rd section through, I find that the agreement there provided for is expressly to be "in writing." So that it was the intention of the Legislature that there should be in the one case a definite agreement in writing, in the other a definite notice in writing, before any deduction is made by the overseers. That that is the construction of sect. 3 is clear. The words are: "In case . . . the owner of such hereditament is willing to enter into an agreement in writing with the overseers to become liable to them for the poor rates assessed in respect of such hereditament, for any term not being less than one year from the date of such agreement, and to pay the poor rates whether the hereditament is occupied or not, the overseers may," &c. There can be no "such agreement" except the agreement previously mentioned which is to be in writing. In that way, all the words of the sections become sensible, and read into one another. The fair reading of the 3rd section, is that if the overseers are willing they may enter into an agreement in writing with the owner, for any term not less than one year from the date of such agreement, to allow him a commission in consideration of his becoming liable for the rates. On any other construction, you give no meaning to the words "such" and "in writing." Then sect. 4, sub-sect. 1, enacts that "the overseers shall rate the owners instead of the occupiers, and shall allow to them an abatement or deduction of 15 per cent. from the amount of the rate." And by sub-sect. 2, "If the owner of one or more such rateable hereditaments shall give notice to the overseers in writing that he is willing to be rated for any term not being less than one year in respect of all such rateable hereditaments of which he is the owner, whether the same be occupied or not, the overseers shall rate such owner accordingly, and allow to him a further abatement or deduction not exceeding 15 per cent. from the amount of the rate during the time he is so rated." Under the 3rd section, it is optional with the overseers to agree or not, and the agreement must be in writing. Under the 4th section, all that the overseers are to do is imperative, except as to the amount of the abatement which they will allow, and the notice by the owner is required to be in writing. In the first instance, where the matter is optional, there is to be an agreement in writing; in the second, where it is imperative, the owner is to give a notice in writing. The notice becomes much more, therefore, than a mere preliminary, or a merely formal matter, its object being to enable the overseers to have a voucher for the abatement which they are compelled to allow. "The overseers shall . . . allow," &c., but, on a condition, viz., that "the owner . . . shall give notice to the overseers in writing;" that is a substantive requisite, and one to which a meaning can be attached. I think such a requisite as that cannot be waived by a parish officer acting on behalf of the parish.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether the landlord has paid the rates in such a manner as to entitle the occupier to vote. That depends upon two questions: first, upon the true construction of the Act of Parliament (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41); and, secondly, upon the power of the overseers to waive the notice in writing by the owner provided for by that Act. As to the first point, I do not think that there can be any doubt. I have heard no explanation of the words "willing to enter into an agreement in writing" in the 3rd section; but I can have no doubt that the subsequent words of that section, "from the date of such agreement," refer to an agreement in writing. Then, by sect. 4, a "notice in writing" is clearly to be given by the owner before any allowance is made to him by the overseers. But it does not follow to my mind that such a notice could not be waived. Apart from the power of waiving, the provision is quite clear; and additional light is thrown upon sects. 3 and 4 by sect. 7. Then, as to the second question, whether it is competent for the overseers to waive the giving of a notice in writing, at first I certainly thought that this might be waived, and that the giving of the notice in writing was merely preliminary, and could be dispensed with. But the answer to that is, that the overseers are not acting for themselves, but are public officers. Unless they could in every case produce either an agreement in writing or else a notice in writing, the parish for which they act might be involved in endless disputes and endless lawsuits. It is true that in Leonard v. Alloways (48 L. J. 81, C. P.), we held the other day that overseers could waive compliance with the condition of 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 5, as to sending in a claim before the 20th July; but the language is very different here, and I am of opinion that the overseers cannot waive this matter, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

REG. v. OVERSEERS OF WALSALL AND OTHERS.

COURT OF APPEAL

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Dec. 9 and 10, 1878.

REG. on the prosecution of THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE OVERSEERS OF THE TOWNSHIP OF THE FOREIGN OF WALSALL AND OTHERS. (a)

Rating—Public Health—Borough—Town council—Local Acts—Public Health Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 79), ss. 7, 16—Sanitary Law Amendment Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 89), s. 3—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 207, 211.

By a private Act, passed in 1848, Improvement Commissioners were appointed with powers to carry out certain improvements for sanitary purposes in a district comprising part of the municipal borough of Walsall and part of the town of Walsall outside the borough. The Act gave the commissioners power to levy a rate for defraying the expenses incurred in carrying the Act into execution, and provided that the occupiers of land used as a public railway in the district should be assessed at one-fourth only of its annual value. The Public Health Act 1872 made boroughs urban sanitary districts, and the council of a borough the urban sanitary authority; and by sect. 7 (and sect. 3 of the Sanitary Law Amendment Act 1874) all the powers, duties, and obligations with respect to sanitary purposes of bodies having jurisdiction under a local Act were transferred to the urban sanitary authority of the district.

Sect. 16 of the Act of 1872 provides that all expenses incurred or payable by an urban sanitary authority under the Sanitary Acts shall, where the Local Government Acts were not in force at the passing of the Act, be defrayed, in the case of the council of a borough, out of the borough fund or borough rate.

By sect. 207 of the Public Health Act 1875 all expenses incurred or payable by an urban authority in the execution of the Act . . . shall be charged on and defrayed out of the district fund and general district rate leviable by them under the Act, except that, if in any district the expenses incurred by an urban authority, being the council of a borough, in the execution of the Sanitary Acts, were at the time of the passing of the Act payable out of the borough fund or borough rate, then the expenses incurred by that authority in the execution of the Act shall be charged on and defrayed out of the borough fund or borough rate. Sect. 211 provides that the occupiers of land used as a railway shall be assessed at one-fourth only of its annual value. By an Act passed on the 13th July 1876 the boundaries of the municipal borough of Walsall were enlarged and made to include that part of the commissioners' district which was previously outside the borough, and the corporation was declared to be the sanitary authority throughout the borough as extended. The appellants were the occupiers of a railway within the limits of the extended borough. On the 1st Dec. 1876 the corporation made a borough rate to provide for sanitary expenses, and assessed the appellants at the full rateable value of their land.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, Mellor and Lush, J.J.), that the corporation, in respect of sanitary purposes within the extended borough, had only power to make a general district rate, and to assess the appellants at one-fourth of the net annual value of their land used as railway.

APPEAL from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division.

This was a case stated on an appeal against a borough rate laid on that part of the foreign of Walsall which is situate within the municipal borough of Walsall.

The Queen's Bench Division affirmed the order of the court of quarter sessions.

The case is reported and the special case set out 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 626.

The town council appealed, and the case came on for hearing on Feb. 5, 1878, when the objection was taken for the railway company that no appeal would lie from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division. The Court of Appeal (Cockburn, C.J., Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.) took time to consider, and on the 18th May delivered judgment, holding (Bramwell and Cotton, L.JJ. dissenting) that no appeal would lie (reported 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 665). The town council appealed from this decision to the House of Lords, and they reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and remitted the case to the Court of Appeal for hearing. (The case in the House of Lords is reported 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 453.)

Herschell, Q.C. and Anettie for the corporation (the appellants).

Bosanquet and N. Nevill for the London and North-Western Railway Company (the respondents).

The arguments were the same as in the court below, and sufficiently appear in the judgments (post).

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I think this judgment should be affirmed. I speak with great reserve and hesitation on the subject, because of one's utter unfamiliarity with the subject-matter of cases like this, which come on appeal from magistrates at quarter sessions, and involve a consideration of the proceedings of bodies such as local boards and sanitary authorities. The question, as far as I understand it, turns first upon the 207th section of the Act of 1875, which says that "all expenses incurred or payable by an urban authority in the execution of this Act, and not otherwise provided for, shall be charged and defrayed out of the district fund or general district rate leviable by them under this Act, subject to the following exceptions." So far the section would comprise the present case, unless any one of the exceptions applies. Now, it is said to be within this exception: "That if in any district the expenses incurred by an urban authority, being the council of a borough, in the execution of the Sanitary Acts, were, at the time of the passing of this Act, payable out of the borough fund or borough rate, then the expenses incurred by that authority in the execution of this Act shall be charged on or defrayed out of the borough fund or borough rate." That provision, of course, requires it to be ascertained whether at the time of the passing of the Act of 1875, these expenses were payable out of the borough rate. Now, I am of opinion that they were not, and upon this ground: that the joint effect of sects. 7 and 16 of the Act of 1872 is, either that the power of the commissioners to make rates for the district marked blue remained up to 1875, and that the town council had no power to make any rate for sanitary purposes within that district, or that the town council only succeeded to and got the power which the commissioners had before—that is to say, the power to make a rate for sanitary purposes within the area of the commissioners' district. That is the conclusion I have come to. That difficulties might certainly arise before the Act of 1875 came into force I can well imagine; but there is this in favour of my conclusion—and it is a consideration which may be fairly borne in mind in considering this question—that the construction contended for by the town council would shift the burden which previously existed, and would heighten and augment the obligations of the defendants, who are the owners of such property as is referred to in the exemption clauses relied upon by the railway company, in ease of the burden upon the other ratepayers. No reason can be given why that should be done, and I cannot but think upon the general view of the Acts of Parliament that it was not intended to be done. I think that the intention of the Legislature in passing the 207th section was that, where the borough rate had previously borne the whole of the sanitary expenses, it was to continue to do so; but where it had borne none, or only a part of them, it was not to bear any of them, or only to bear that part of them, in future, but a district rate was to be made. If the borough rate had borne some only of these expenses it would be just and reasonable that it should bear those only in the future, because otherwise it might happen that there would be an unjust shifting of liability. Whether it was right in the first instance to have certain property assessable at one-fourth of its real value is a question we have not to inquire into. It had been done for years, and property in the borough had consequently obtained an increased value. The effect of the construction suggested by the appellants would be to make the property specified in sect. 40 of the private Act of less comparative value than it was before. No reason has been given why this should be done, and I do not think the Legislature intended to do it.

BRETT, L.J.—It seems to me that, in order that the plaintiffs may succeed in this case, we must find that in the present existing borough of Walsall the expenses in respect of sanitary matters can only be provided for by a general district rate, and that no part of them is payable out of the borough fund. I am quite aware that the question is not brought before us exactly in that form; but that would have been the form of the plaintiffs' objection if the parties had not come to an agreement. The proper application would then have been to quash the borough rate, but by arrangement the parties do not ask that the rate should be quashed, but they confine themselves to asking for a judgment which shall decide whether or not the plaintiffs are only liable to be rated to the extent of one-fourth of the net annual value of their railway within the borough. Nevertheless it seems to me that, in order to work this case out, we must hold that all sanitary expenses within the whole borough of Walsall, including the added part, are payable out of a general district rate, and not out of the borough fund, and I am of opinion that they are so payable. Now, I shall venture to take the case in an inverse way to that in which the Lord Justice has taken it. It seems to me that in the borough of Walsall from 1848 to 1872 there were two authorities. One was the town council acting for the whole borough, which at that time included all the part marked blue on the map, and not the pink part which was within the commissioners' district, and has since been added to the borough; and the other was the body composed of the Improvement Commissioners who acted for the blue part and the pink. Now, the town council at that time might, and I suppose did, form or make a borough fund by making a borough rate; but that would be done under the Municipal Corporations Act and for the purposes of that Act, and those purposes only. They had nothing to do with sanitary expenses. At that time the only real town within the borough was that which was contained in the blue part, the part of the borough comprised in the commissioners' district. The town extended beyond the borough that was contained in the blue to the pink, the part added to the borough in 1876, but by the local Act of 1848 there were commissioners to act for that which was the real town, namely, the blue and not the pink. By other statutes which were incorporated with that Act of 1848 they had the control, not only for all sanitary purposes, but for other purposes which generally are now incorporated into Sanitary Acts. In respect therefore of the sanitary purposes and the sanitary expenses by virtue of the incorporation of the other Acts with the Act of 1848, these commissioners were the persons to provide for the sanitary expenses, and they did so by levying a district rate; that is to say, they provided for them by levying a rate upon the blue and pink districts. But that rate, by the section of the Act of 1848, with regard to the property of railway companies, gave them what has been called a limitation; that is, that a rate levied in order to raise that fund under the Act of 1848 was, with regard to railways, to be levied only upon one-fourth of the net annual value. That seems to me to have been the state of things from Dec. 1848 to Jan. 1872, and then the general Public Health Act of 1872 was passed. Now I agree with the judges of the Queen's Bench Division, that it is not necessary to consider whether the commissioners remained as the sanitary authority within the blue and pink part of the district under the Act of 1872, or whether their authority was given within the blue district to the town council. If they still remained the authority within the blue district, it seems to me that they would remain the authority in respect of the sanitary expenses incurred in the blue and pink districts; but if they were not, and if their authority passed to the town council with respect to the blue part, it seems to me that, although their authority passed, the same power which they had was merely transferred, and that I think follows from the words which are contained in sect. 7 of the Act of 1872, or rather it may be said in sect. 3 of the Act of 1874, which is an exposition and explanation of sect. 7 of the Act of 1872. The words of sect. 3 are, "All the powers, rights, duties, capacities, liabilities, and obligations of the authority having jurisdiction under a local Act in the district of an urban sanitary authority at the time of passing of the principal Act, so far as they or any of them related to such purposes, not "were altered," but "were transferred to and became attached to the urban sanitary authority." That is to say, all the powers, in this borough, of the commissioners within the blue part, are transferred to and become attached to, upon the hypothesis, the town council. If the powers of the commissioners—the powers which they had when in the blue part—were only to make a district rate and to make a district rate containing, with respect to railways, the limitation for which the plaintiffs contend, then those powers only passed. If that be true, the state of the borough of Walsall from 1872 to 1875 was this: The town council was still the authority to make the borough fund—that is, the borough fund proper—applicable to the purposes of a borough fund under the Municipal Corporations Act. They were the municipal authorities and also the sanitary authority throughout the whole borough. With regard to the parts of the borough which were not within the blue (the part of the borough contained within the commissioners' district), they were the sanitary authorities under the Act of 1872, irrespective of the Act of 1848, and they would have the power within that part of the borough of the sanitary authority not circumscribed by the local Act of 1848; but as to that part of the borough which was within the blue, and which after all was the main built part of the borough, and therefore the portion in respect to which the sanitary expenses would be the largest, they were, upon the hypothesis, the sanitary authority, but they only had the power of the commissioners transferred to them by sect. 3. Therefore, within the blue part they would not have the larger authority, but only the authority of the commissioners—that is, to levy a district rate for sanitary purposes. So that in the borough of Walsall at that time you still had only a borough fund and a district rate—a borough rate throughout the whole borough for municipal purposes proper, and a borough rate liable to pay the sanitary expenses incurred in a part of the borough not within the blue part or old district of the commissioners; but you had a district rate for sanitary purposes to be laid and applied by the town council within the blue part. Now, it is obvious that such a state of things must have brought about the greatest possible difficulty, and it would seem a forcible argument to say that those difficulties were insurmountable, and that they were so great that we ought not to suppose that the Legislature meant them to exist, and that, therefore, we ought to put a different interpretation on the statute. But it seems to me sect. 33 or the statute of 1872 gives a key to the whole difficulty, and I agree with my learned brethren in the Divisional Court of Queen's Bench that that section is of the greatest importance. Sect. 43 is of importance as concerning the continued existence of the local Act; but sect. 33 has this importance to my mind, that it was a mode by which the difficulties might have been met. It gives power to the Local Government Board to interfere, and if an application had been made to the Local Government Board in London by the inhabitants of Walsall, and it had been shown to them that the Act of 1848, if it was allowed to exist in its full force, made it almost impossible for the town council to meet the sanitary expenses of the whole borough, then the Local Government Board might have altered and repealed the local Act of 1848, but if they had so repealed it justice would have required that they should have repealed it on terms. At all events there was a power, and that power might have been called into play, but it never was. Therefore the difficulty remains, no doubt, but that difficulty might have been met. Now, that was the state of the borough, as it seems to me, up to the year 1875. Then it has been admitted that the plaintiffs' contention is right unless the case of the borough of Walsall is brought within the first exception of the 207th section of the Act of 1875; and unless the case is brought within that exception it is within the general enactment with which the 207th section begins. If it is within the general enactment, then all the expenses incurred or payable by the urban authority in the execution of the Act of 1875—that is, by the town council—are to be charged on and defrayed out of the district fund and general district rate. Now, to my mind, the circumstances necessary to bring it within the exception to the Act of 1875 are wanting; and I therefore think that it is not within the first exception. If it is not, but is within the general enactment of the 207th section, then in the borough of Walsall after the passing of the Act of 1875, all sanitary expenses are to be paid out of a district fund or general district rate to be made according to that statute. After the Act of 1875 the state of the borough of Walsall was this: The town council was the only sanitary authority. The town council under the Municipal Corporations Act was the sanitary authority for the whole borough and it could raise a borough fund for municipal purposes under the Municipal Corporations Act, as it always could, but throughout the whole borough it was bound to pay the expenses incurred by sanitary proceedings out of a district fund and general district rate; that is to say, it was bound to make a rate upon the whole borough in respect of sanitary purposes. Then, by sect. 211 of the same statute, if there was to be a general district fund and general district rate for the whole borough, there was also to be the limitation with regard to rating railways throughout the whole borough. Now, as to the question under the Act of 1875, it seems to me that the borough rate made by the defendants was bad, and in strict law ought to be quashed, and that there ought to have been in respect of all sanitary purposes a general district rate, and that under that district rate this railway, in respect of its whole length throughout the whole borough, ought only to be liable to be rated on one-fourth of the net annual value. Then comes the Act of 1876, which puts the borough into the pink part. Now, I do not think Mr. Nevill's argument in respect of sect. 15 of that statute is applicable, because sect. 15, whatever may be the decision on the point we have now to decide, cannot help the argument of it at all. But what the Act of 1876 does is to put the pink part into the borough and to make everything done in the pink part come within the rules, regulations, and laws applicable to the whole borough; so that with regard to the whole borough of Walsall, including the pink part, it seems to me the town council, as the town council, and being also the sanitary authority, were required to make a general rate throughout, and that there must be, or ought to be a general district rate, out of which such sanitary expenses in respect of the whole borough ought to be paid. I therefore think this judgment is right.

COTTON, L.J.—The question we have to consider by arrangement between the parties is this, how ought the expenses incurred under the Public Health Act of 1875 to be provided for? But for that arrangement the question would be whether or no the rate made in the year 1877 as a borough rate was, or was not good in consequence of it having been made for the purpose of providing for expenses under the Public Health Act 1875. Now that question really depends on the 207th, 209th, 210th, and 211th sections of the Act of 1875, because the rate is made and must be supported under those sections. Sect. 207 contains a general enactment as to how the expenses incurred under the Act, and in respect of the powers given by the Act, are to be met, and it constitutes in the borough that which I suppose was new at that time, namely, a distinct fund, and in addition to that it directs that the district rate shall be leviable, and that all the expenses incurred in the exercise of the powers given by the Act shall be paid out of the district fund in aid of the general district rate which the subsequent sections gave power to raise, unless the case is brought within the exceptions which are afterwards mentioned; and that general district rate was a rate which, as regards the railway companies and other particular owners of property, was only to be assessed on one-fourth the value of their property, whereas the rate which has been made upon them has been assessed upon the full value. Now, it was not contended that the case came within any of the exceptions mentioned in the 207th section unless it came within the first. I think it was said in argument on behalf of the corporation, and it is certainly my opinion, that that exception does apply unless the expenses incurred for sanitary purposes as an entirety were, at the time when the Act of 1875 came into operation, paid or payable out of the borough fund. This throws us back for the purpose of seeing what ought to have been the state of things when the Act of 1875 was passed. In the year 1848 the private Act was passed which gave the commissioners powers which no one up to that time had of exercising a certain sanitary authority within particular districts; and for the purpose of providing for the expenses of sanitary works there was given to them by the Act of 1848 power to raise a district rate, and for that purpose railway companies and other owners of special property were to be assessed at one-fourth only of the net annual value of their property. Now, the district over which the commissioners had jurisdiction was partly within, and partly without, the borough of Walsall. The private Act remained in force up to the year 1872, and at that time the Improvement Commissioners were the only persons authorised to construct sanitary works in the district, and the rate which they could raise under the private Act was the only mode by which they could provide for sanitary expenses. Up to 1872 it is perfectly clear that the railway company were entitled to the exception in their favour of being rated only at one-fourth. And it lies upon those who contend that between 1872 and 1875 their right in that respect was taken away to show in what way it was taken away. Now, the Public Health Act 1875, as I understand it, did this: it made the town council the urban sanitary authority within the whole borough, but including part only of the district which had been within the jurisdiction of the Improvement Commissioners, and it transferred to and vested in the town council the power which had been previously exercised by the commissioners within so much of their district as was within the borough, and within the jurisdiction of the urban sanitary authority constituted under the Act of 1872. It certainly did not put an end to the power of the Improvement Commissioners, because one of the general sections, the third subsection of the 4th section, clearly says that their powers were to extend over that portion of their district not included within the district coming under the Acts of 1872, and in the 7th section of the Act of 1872, and the interpretation clause of the Act of 1874, it is not said that they are to come under any private Act, within the limits of the authority of the urban sanitary authority, nor does it say that similar powers were to be given to the urban sanitary authority, but that the powers and duties of the Improvement Commissioners were to be transferred to the urban sanitary authority constituted under the Act of 1872; so that my interpretation of the Act certainly is not that the Improvement Commissioners were, after the Act of 1872, themselves to exercise the power as regards this blue district which they had previously exercised, but that their powers were to be transferred to and vested in the new urban sanitary authority, and they took those powers, as is shown both by the 7th section of the Act of 1872 and by the 3rd section of the Act 1874, with all the obligations attaching. It is after all the Act of 1872 which says that all the powers, rights, duties, capacities, liabilities, and obligations shall be transferred, so that this town council has obtained a portion of this district which had formerly been within the power of the district commissioners subject to the obligations of the commissioners, one of which was that they were only to rate railway companies and certain other owners of property specified at one-fourth of their full value. So far I should say we have got at nothing that can by possibility take away the exemption or privilege given to the owners of certain particular kinds of property. One matter which was relied on for the corporation was sect. 16 of the Act of 1872, and I agree that the proviso in that section is one which it is not very easy to construe; but I think one must remember this, that it is a rule of construction that if a particular benefit is given by a statute to a particular person you must not deprive him of the benefit that the statute has given without clear words in a subsequent Act to take it away from him. I think it is a very reasonable interpretation and construction of this proviso, that, where there had been a body exercising sanitary powers, and providing for the expenses which in the former state of things would have been raised and paid in a particular way, those expenses must still be so raised and paid. It was urged on behalf of the appellants that, provided the urban sanitary authority had, before the passing of this Act, the power to make a district rate to meet the expenses, and if the town council which is constituted and made the urban sanitary authority under the Act of 1872, had the power, then this sect. 16 would apply. That could not be so here, because the urban sanitary authority—that is the town council—never had power within the district to raise this rate at the time the Act of 1872 was passed, because it never had any sanitary power, and therefore never had any power to raise a district rate or any other rate for sanitary purposes. You must really not, I think, construe it in that way without strong necessity. If you take it literally probably the proviso cannot apply at all, because the urban sanitary authority never could have existed before the Act; it was a creation of the Act, and I think the reasonable interpretation is, not that which was alleged on the part of the town council, but that which I have mentioned, namely, that, where anybody had previously exercised the power now given to the urban sanitary authority to provide for these expenses by this general district rate, they should still be so provided for. That was the state of things which existed down to the Act of 1875, and at the date of that Act there was, as regards the blue district, the portion of the borough formerly within the power of the district commissioners, power to pay the expenses such as could be incurred under the Act of 1848, not out of the borough fund but out of another fund, and ex hypothesi they could not be paid out of the borough fund if the exemption (that privilege of the railway company) had not been taken away; because as regards the borough rate there was no power to assess them at less than their full value. The borough rate, as was conceded on both sides, would be made upon all owners of property equally at the full value of the property which they held, and if the exemption of the railway company had not been taken away (and I have stated my reason for thinking it had not been) then of necessity it could not be that the expenses at the time of the passing of the Act of 1875, as an entirety, had been provided for out of the borough rate, because, as regards a part of these expenses, the railway company were entitled to exemption. It comes then to this that, at the time of the Act of 1875 being passed, there was a part (and that is quite sufficient) of these expenses in respect of which the railway company had a right to say, "We are entitled to exemption." That part therefore could not be a matter to be paid and provided for out of the borough fund, because the first exception of sect. 207 of the Act of 1875 must be that, in making the general district rate, the owners of all railways and other works specified in the Act of 1848 are to be assessed at one-fourth only of the full value of their property.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MAYOR, &c. OF BRECON. (a)

Municipal corporation—Municipal Corporations Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), s. 92—Application of borough fund—Opposing Bill in Parliament.

A municipal corporation is justified in using the borough fund for the purpose of opposing a Bill in Parliament whereby its existence, property, or privileges are sought to be imperilled or diminished, both by virtue of the 92nd section of the Municipal Corporations Act 1835, by which the employment of the borough fund is authorised in payment of "all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act," and by virtue of the general law by which the owners of property in trust are authorised to be reimbursed out of the trust estate for any expenses necessarily incurred for its protection or otherwise.

THIS was an information to restrain the mayor and corporation of Brecon from applying the funds of the corporation in opposing a Bill promoted by the Brecon Markets Company, whereby it was alleged that the existence, property, and privileges of the corporation were likely to be injured.

The facts of this case sufficiently appear in the judgment.

The question turned partly on the construction of the 92nd section of the Municipal Corporations Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), whereby the disposition of corporate property and the appropriation of the corporate income are to be regulated. The object and drift of the section sufficiently appear in the judgment, as also the following sections of the Act for incorporating the Brecon Markets Company, viz., ss. 21, 43, 65, 80, 82, 89, and 90; Local and Personal Acts, 25 & 26 Vict. cxxxvi.; and the 8th section of the Act to amend the Brecon Markets Act 1862; Local Acts, 41 & 42 Vict. c. clxxvii.

Whitehorne and Maonaghten for the Attorney-General.

The cases and arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

JESSEL, M.R.—The case before me is one of a very special character. As far as I know it has never occurred before, and I do not think it is very probable it will very often occur again; but still it raises important questions both as regards the meaning of public Acts of Parliament, and as regards the general law. In the first place, there is no doubt that the Municipal Corporation Acts were intended to impose great restrictions on the dealings by municipal corporations with the corporate funds. In substance, whatever the words used were, the Municipal Corporations Act reduced municipal corporations from the position of owners of property to the position of trustees of property. Instead of having the power which they possessed and abused, before the passing of the Act, of disposing of the property pretty well in any way the corporations thought fit, they were restricted to certain definite purposes as pointed out by the 92nd and other sections of the Act, the 92nd being the principal section, and the others merely ancillary. In substance, as I said before, they were reduced to the position of trustees. The 92nd section provided for certain expenses which, in the case of the borough funds not showing a surplus over what I will call the ordinary expenses of the borough, were restricted to expenses necessary for carrying the purposes of the Act into execution. Probably some definite word might have been used; for the word "necessary" like most other words in the language, has only a relative meaning, and that may be necessary in one case which is not in another, and you cannot lay down any absolute rule of what is necessary. Those are the words of the Act. Now it is manifest, the moment you read the Act, that if you read "purposes" merely for express purposes, you would have left the corporation in this position, that they could not even defend their property or their very existence against attack. If, therefore, it was said that the word "purposes" is to be read in the narrowest form, namely, the purposes expressed in the Act, this would follow: that if an action of ejectment were brought against the corporation, or what is now called "an action for recovery of land," to get from them the whole of their landed property, they would not be justified under the Municipal Corporations Act in incurring the costs of defending that action. That, of course, is too extravagant, and you must therefore assume that there is to be found somewhere, either under the word "purposes," as mentioned in the 92nd section, or under the general law, a provision for such a case as that. Again, if a proceeding were taken to destroy their charter of incorporation either directly or indirectly, it would be absurd to say that the corporation were not entitled to resist those proceedings, and not the less if these proceedings were by Bills in Parliament instead of by proceedings in a court of law. That is, that Acts threatening the existence of the corporation itself must be resisted, and must be resisted, of course, at the expense of the corporation. Then again, if you read the word "purposes" in the narrow and restricted view, it would be difficult to find any such purpose expressed in the Act; but you must either read it in the larger way, or else you must assume that the Legislature intended that the ordinary rights of corporations in defending themselves against attack, whether by action at law or by Bill in Parliament, or otherwise, were reserved to them. It does not appear to me to be very material to consider which is the proper view to take, because they both conduct you to the same conclusion: that is, the first view makes it implied in the words to be found in the Act of Parliament, that there must be a mode of construction which includes such objects; the second says, the Act of Parliament reserves the ordinary rights of persons and corporations to defend themselves. That being so, and independently of the recent Act of Parliament, what is the principle on which these corporations should be allowed to defend themselves? There are decisions which, as I said before, go expressly to defending their property from attack, and defending their existence from attack. Does it not go further? If their existence, which is not a simple existence for the purpose of affixing a seal, but for the purpose of the government of the town, is interfered with—that is, if their duties and rights of government are interfered with—their existence is to that extent interfered with, though it is not the actual existence of a corporation. It is the existence of their corporate powers which in fact altogether go to make up their existence; and it appears to me that, on the same principle, a corporation, when attacked, shall have the right to defend itself. Supposing the corporation has a power to regulate the fairs and markets within the borough, and an individual, as lord of the manor, claims the right to control the regulations of the fairs and markets, then it is clear it is in the nature of property, a right to levy tolls. But suppose a company is instituted to take possession of the fairs and markets, and levy the tolls, and take them out of the hands of the corporation, and promotes a Bill in Parliament for the purpose, then it is also quite clear. But suppose there is no property in the corporation at all, but merely a right to regulate the fairs and markets—that is to prescribe the places where the fairs and markets shall be held, to prescribe the tolls that shall be taken in respect of them, and to prescribe the time at which the fairs and markets are to be held—is it to be supposed that an individual or a company can present a Bill to Parliament for taking away those privileges and duties of the corporation, and that the corporation shall have no power of defending itself even under the Municipal Corporations Act; shall have no right to spend the money necessary for defending its privileges and duties as a corporation? It appears to me that to make that statement shows there is no valid distinction between the right of property, which, after all, is only held by the corporation as trustee for these public purposes, and the powers and privileges forming a larger or smaller share of the government of the town, which are conferred on the corporation, and with which it is sought to interfere. As I said before, it seems to me that on principle you must imply a right in the corporation to defend itself from such an attack. Now, if that is so, it is of very little consequence, as I said before, by what means I arrive at that conclusion. I find the judges in some cases have adopted the one method, that is, they have read it as implied in the term "necessary expenses" in the Act of Parliament; in others they have adopted the second method, and said, "The Act of Parliament must be intended to reserve to the corporation the ordinary rights of corporations." It does not appear to me, as I said before, material; but I think it is quite clear that the decisions go to this—that the right of defending themselves from an attack of this kind extends not merely to property, not merely to their existence in its smallest sense, that is, to the continued existence of the corporation as such, but to existence also in the larger sense, that is, the existence of the corporation with all its rights and privileges, and that an attack on a substantial portion of its privileges, rights, and duties is as much within the provision of the cases as an attack on its property or its mere existence. Now, first of all, as regards authority. The strongest case on the part of the plaintiffs is certainly Reg. v. The Mayor, &c., of Sheffield (L. Rep. 6 Q. B.

CHAN. DIV.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MAYOR, &C., OF BRECON.

652). I by no means say that that case is, in my own opinion, rightly decided, or that I have any occasion for criticising it adversely; but it does not go to the extent contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs. The judgment of the Lord Chief Justice goes very much upon the principle that I have mentioned. He says at p. 657: "With regard to the expenses incurred in opposing the Bill in Parliament, I think it is abundantly clear, and open to no doubt or question, that that was a purpose to which, looking at the words of the section, it was altogether beyond the municipal government, or anything to be done under that Act of Parliament, in a borough without a surplus fund, to apply the borough funds altogether beyond the scope of the municipal government." That is the ground of his decision. I shall show presently in this case it is by no means beyond the scope of the municipal government. Then he goes into the reasons for coming to that conclusion, and justifies it; but he then goes on to comment on certain cases which had been decided, and upon which I must say the judges seem to have come to a different conclusion to a certain extent. I mean the case of The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Wigan (Kay 268). But it is quite plain that the ground of the Lord Chief Justice's discussion is that the Act in question was beyond the scope of the municipal government. Now, when we come to Mr. Justice Blackburn's judgment, in giving his opinion he says this: "These are two separate questions: first, whether they might lawfully and properly do what they did; secondly, whether they might charge the borough fund for the purpose." Then, after explaining the object of Act somewhat in the way that I have stated it, he says this, at p. 663: "Now, can we say as to these two matters, which do concern the interests of the inhabitants, and as to which the town council cannot be considered as impertinent intruders—can we say that these are matters which come within the terms of sect. 92 of the Act, as being expenses necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act? There are some things which are obviously so, though they are not here enumerated. We have already decided more than once that when there is property belonging to the corporation, estates of their own, and anybody attempts to take away those estates, although there is no express enactment, yet the very fact that the corporation are owners of the property which is put into the borough fund, would make any litigation concerning it a purpose for carrying out the objects of the Act within the general terms." So that his decision comes to this: that, inasmuch as the income of the property is applicable to the borough fund, the preservation of that property must be considered a purpose of the Act. This is one way of putting it; but he finds it a purpose of the Act by inference. It is not within the express powers; it consequently comes to this, that any necessary incident to property (and there is no distinction in the world that I can see between "property" and "powers" for this purpose) is a purpose of the Act. Again, I will go back to the illustration which is very germane to this case, the regulations of the markets. The regulation of the market is part of the municipal government of the town; it is part of the rights and privileges enjoyed by the corporation, and it is as much within the judgments of the Lord Chief Justice and Blackburn, J. as actual property in the market itself. It is vested in the corporation for the benefit of the town, as part of the government of the town; and he who seeks to interfere with the privileges and duties connected with the regulations must be resisted, and, of course, resisted at the expense of the corporation. It does not appear to me that that judgment at all prevents a corporation defending an attack upon such a portion of the privileges of a corporation. Now I come to a case which does not appear to have been cited, and I am sorry it was not, in Reg. v. Sheffield. It is a case which of course, as far as I am concerned, is of higher authority than the judgment of the Queen's Bench, because it is a judgment of the Lord Chancellor. It is the well-known case of Bright v. North (2 Phill. 260). When I come to read that case I find this. There was an Act of Parliament providing for the better conservation of the river Ouse. "The lands adjacent to the banks at each side were divided into six districts, and it was provided that the portion of the banks comprised within each district should be maintained by commissioners appointed from among the owners of lands of a certain quantity within such district by means of funds to be levied by a district rate not exceeding 3s. an acre in each year; and the fund so raised was to be applied in making, doing, constructing, and executing all such works, acts, matters, and things as by such commissioners should from time to time be deemed necessary, proper, or expedient for putting so much of the bank as was situate in their respective districts into, and for maintaining the same in, a permanent state of stability." As I read the report of the case, and as I know from experience, as regards other similar Acts of Parliament, there is no pretence for saying that the ownership of the banks was taken away from landowners and put in the commissioners. They were conservators and nothing more. Now the Lord Chancellor says this: "The commissioners of each district are bound by the Act to protect the lands adjacent to the banks." So they were: they were as much bound to protect the lands adjacent to the banks as to keep the lands in order "from inundation; and they were authorised by the Act to levy a rate on the proprietors of the district for the purpose of defraying these expenses." Again, the lands adjacent to the banks of course did not belong to them. Then it was alleged that the works which were to be undertaken by the promoters of the Bill in Parliament which they were opposing might be injurious to the banks; and the question was, whether the commissioner was authorised, having no special power for this purpose, to oppose the Bill in Parliament. The Lord Chancellor says: "The Bill therefore raises this proposition as to the construction of the Act; that, however injurious the works may be, the commissioners are not authorised to expend one farthing of the money intrusted to their care in preventing them. That being all that is alleged in the pleadings, and the rule being to take the case as strongly against the pleader as his statements will justify, I must assume that the means are likely to be injurious. Now, it is clear that, if actual injury was done and proper measures had been taken by the commissioners to prevent it, they would be entitled to their expenses so incurred. For every trustee is entitled to be allowed the necessary and proper expenses incurred in protecting the property committed to his care." But, if they have the right to protect the property from immediate direct injury, they must have the same rights where the injury threatened is indirect and probable. Then he goes on: "I wish it to be understood that I proceed entirely on the pleadings, and assume that they state a case in which the works contemplated are likely to be injurious to the banks of this district, and on that assumption, although there is no direct authority in the Act for the application to the proposed purpose, I think it is incident to the powers which are given to the commissioners, and to the duties imposed upon them." It comes therefore to this, that a Bill promoted in Parliament which the commissioners thought would injure the lands might be opposed by them on the ground that it was their duty to protect the banks and the lands adjacent, and not on the ground of their having any right of property either in the banks or in the lands adjoining. It is therefore a decision that a proposed interference by Act of Parliament with the powers of the commissioners and with their duties, is such an interference as fairly entitles them to appear before a committee of either House to oppose the Bill. Now, when we come to look at the case which was very much commented on in the case of Reg. v. The Corporation of Sheffield, viz., the case of The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Wigan, which is reported in Kaye's Reports, whatever view we take of the construction of the Act of Parliament put by Wood, V.C., afterwards Lord Chancellor Hatherley, we shall see that he simply founds himself on Bright v. North. He does not decide at all on the notion of injury to property. He reasons out in a way which has not been satisfactory to the judges of the Queen's Bench, and, if I may humbly say so, is not altogether satisfactory to me, a power in the corporation to restrain nuisances generally. But having found that power and the duty to stop nuisances generally, he then goes on in this way. He says they have a plain duty of taking care there shall be no nuisance in the town. Now, assuming he is right so far, then I think there is no possible fault to be found with his judgment. The real difficulty in the judgment is, that you cannot find the power, without giving to the restricted words of the section which he commented on a very much larger meaning than they fairly bear. That really is the criticism on the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, or at least by three of the judges of that court. But, if you once arrive at the same conclusion as the Vice-Chancellor did, as to the true construction of the section, that there was power to abate nuisances generally, and the duty to prevent it, I think his reasoning is, as he says it is, exactly in accordance with Bright v. North (ubi supra). He says: "It seems to me very strange to say, if it be a corporate duty to prevent nuisances, and to prevent them by bye-laws, yet if an enormous and gigantic nuisance was about to be perpetuated, and the corporation was to take steps by applying to this court, through the medium of the Attorney-General, for an injunction to restrain such nuisance, that they would not be allowed the costs of such a proceeding." And then he goes on describing this nuisance, of taking away 800,000 gallons of waters: "It would be a strange thing to say in the case of a continued nuisance of that description, although the corporation are under at least a moral obligation to protect the town from all petty nuisances, yet that they shall not lay out a farthing to prevent a large nuisance like that to all the inhabitants of the borough." And so I think it did. That is, if his construction of the previous portions of the Act of Parliament could be supported. Then, as he says, it is a case of duty, which is interfered with by the proposed legislation. It is a case, in effect, of attempted deprivation of the corporation of a part of their powers and duties, and they ought to be entitled to prevent it. I am quite aware that, when the case came on for appeal, the judgment is by no means so clear. The appeal case is reported in 5 De G. M. & G. 52, and Knight Bruce, L.J. says: "The costs in question were incurred by measures which, in effect merely defensive, were taken by the corporation of Wigan, not unsuccessfully or uselessly, for the purpose of preventing or diminishing the mischief to the town of Wigan, that certain intended proceedings (reasonably considered as likely to interfere materially with its drainage, and so to render the air less pure, and cause general inconveniences there) were, not without probable grounds, thought likely to occasion mischief, which (not solely of a public nature) might well have been expected to be also prejudicial to the property of the corporation." Now, although there is no statement in the report in Kaye of any injury being alleged by the bill, I see it was alleged in the argument that the corporation possessed houses and property within the borough likely to be injured, and I gather from this that Knight Bruce, L.J. was not satisfied with the reason of the Vice-Chancellor as to there being a general duty to prevent nuisance imposed on the corporation, and he took hold of this, which does not appear from the report to be in the Bill, that there was a probability of injuring property. Certainly, the judgment proceeds on no other ground, and the same remark may be made as to the shorter, but by no means less clear judgment of Turner, L.J. He says: "The Municipal Corporations Act contains no express provision authorising the application of the funds of corporations to the payment of expenses incidental to the protection of the corporate property. That has been left to the general law which sanctions such expenditure if reasonably and properly incurred." He takes the other view, that is, that the Act is silent, but leaves the general law to take effect, not limiting it to the words "necessary expenditure." "The expenditure in question here was, as it seems to me, incurred bond fide, for the protection of the corporation property. My present impression is that it was reasonably and properly incurred." Therefore the judgment in the appeal court proceeds simply on the protection of the corporate property. It does not, as far as I can gather, in the slightest degree touch the judgment in the court below, so far as regards the latter portion; but I think the appeal court doubted whether the former part of it, viz., the proposition that it was a duty of the corporation to restrain nuisances generally, should be supported. Therefore they confined their judgment to the question of property. It seems to me, therefore, looking at the authorities, that whether we take the one view or the other, whether we consider that under the words "necessary expenditure," or similar words used under the Act, this incidental expenditure is included; or whether we consider that the general law, as to the rights of trustees defending their property and privileges remains unaffected, that, in either way, if there is an attack by proposed private legislation on the rights, privileges, and duties of a corporation, that corporation is entitled to defend itself before Parliament. Now, before concluding what I have to say as to the law, I should like to say a word or two as to the recent Act of Parliament. As I read that Act of Parliament, it very much increases the responsibility of corporations who choose to act in opposing Bills in Parliament without obtaining the sanction of the ratepayers, because, if unsuccessful, it will be more difficult for them now than it was formerly to show that the expenses ought to have been allowed, inasmuch as they could have readily obtained the sanction which would have protected them from all consequences of want of success. But still I must read the Act as I find it; and I find in the 8th section of the Act these words: "Nothing in this Act shall extend or be construed to alter or affect any special provision," and so forth; "or to take away or diminish any rights or powers now possessed or enjoyed by any governing body, or which are or shall be vested in or exercisable by the inhabitants of any district under any general or special Act." The result therefore is, that if the municipal corporation had a power prior to the passing of this Act to oppose this Bill in Parliament, that power is certainly not taken away, and, to use the words of the Act, diminished by the recent statute. I now come to the circumstances of the case, and I must say I think it is a very strong case, quite distinguishable from all the cases to which I have been referred, because, in this case, the corporation had a special series of powers and duties which were very much interfered with. It is only necessary to say a few words as to the history of this market company and the corporation. It appears that in 1638 an Act of Parliament was passed empowering the corporation to buy lands in the borough of Brecon, and to make markets, and giving them all sorts of authorities and so forth. Then, notwithstanding the powers so conferred on the corporation, this market was not made, or not satisfactorily made; and, in 1862, an Act of Parliament was obtained authorising the company to make a new market place instead of the corporation, and transferring the market place, and the property which the old corporation acquired under the Act of 1838 or otherwise, to the company. Then the markets and fairs, and the market house, market places, and all the works connected with it, are, by the 21st section, vested in the company, i.e., they are taken away from the corporation. Then certain powers are reserved to the corporation which appear to me very important, and certain compensations given. By the 43rd section the sum of 210*l.* a year is by the Act charged on the market places, and the tolls in favour of the corporation, and then by a subsequent section of the Act, sect. 65, the company is empowered with, but not without, the consent of the corporation, to provide and maintain slaughter-houses; and then, by the 80th section, "the company shall not at any time lower, raise, or alter any of the tolls, rents, stallages, and dues specified in the 3rd and 4th schedules to this Act annexed respectively, without in every case the consent of the corporation. By the 82nd section the company has power to let the markets for three years only. Then by sect. 89, "the company and the corporation from time to time may enter into and carry into effect all such contracts with respect to any of the purposes of this Act, and in accordance with the provisions thereof, and all matters incidental or necessary thereto as they may think fit." Then the 90th section saves the rights of the corporation, except where they are expressly taken away. Well now, in that position of matters, the corporation had both rights and duties; e.g., it was an important power of the corporation that they had a veto on the erection of slaughter-houses. Slaughter-houses are not agreeable things as a general rule, and no doubt it was considered not desirable to vest in a private company the right to put slaughter-houses anywhere they pleased in the town of Brecon. Again, the powers of altering tolls and rates is a very important power as regards the regulation of a market, and that again was not left to the company, but a control was given to the corporation of Brecon. Under these circumstances, the company, not having the power to erect slaughter-houses, or to use them rather, without the assent of the corporation, erected them, and then the corporation refused to assent to the use of the slaughter-houses. And to obtain, amongst other things, the right to use the slaughter-houses they had erected, they presented a Bill to Parliament, and this Bill in Parliament, presented by the company, contained, amongst other clauses, a power to use the slaughter-houses already erected, without any consent of the corporation. That is the 2nd section of the Bill in Parliament. It was for power to them "to use and maintain the slaughter-houses already erected by them on the site selected by the corporation as aforesaid without any further consent from the corporation," and that they should be deemed to be part of the market-place. That was as the Bill was brought in. Then the Bill also proposed that they should have power to lease the market for ten years instead of three, and it also proposed that they should have power to lower the tolls without the assent of the corporation. Lastly, it proposed that they should be empowered to sell the property of the company to the corporation, that the corporation should have borrowing powers conferred on it to raise the money to pay. This Bill the corporation opposed, and not altogether unsuccessfully, because as regards the slaughter-houses the first amendment made was that it should be sent to a referee to certify whether the slaughter-houses were fit for use or not. I am stating it shortly. Then in the House of Commons it was not sent to the named referee, but to a person to be appointed by the Local Government Board—I think at the request of the corporation or of the company—so that, instead of giving the company power to use the slaughter-houses, effect was given to the objection of the corporation that they were not fit for use. For the committee must have come to the conclusion on the evidence that they were not to be used until they were certified to be fit for use by the person nominated. That appears to me to be a very important success—so important that it does not matter whether they did succeed or did not succeed on all the grounds of their opposition, because on some of the other points they were not so successful. That being so, is it tolerable that an individual or private company shall take away from the corporation the right conferred on it by a private Act of Parliament to object to erection or use of slaughter-houses which the corporation consider unfit or improper for use, and shall say to the corporation, "You shall not be entitled to oppose my Bill in Parliament; I will pass it in spite of you behind your back?" I think such a decision would be perfectly irrational. Such a privilege is a valuable privilege conferred on a corporation. Then there is a minor point, but still that is a very important point. The corporation has a security on the market rates amongst other things—no doubt only for 210%; but the corporation has a right to say, "You shall not lower the market rates without my consent." Is an individual or private company to take the right to lower the market rates, which may actually diminish the property of the company in the 210%? That is a very small point; but it may be a material point. As regards the keeping up of the market, and the welfare of the inhabitants of the town, it by no means follows that lowering the market rates may be beneficial to the town. It may so lower the interest of the company as to prevent the markets being kept in an efficient state; and it appears to me that the privilege or right of the corporation to assent to the lowering of the market rates is one which ought not to be interfered with by any individual or any company without giving the corporation the option of opposing it in Parliament. Then we come to the third ground, which is very important—that the general power of contracting given by the first Act is limited to the purposes of that Act. We have now a new company imposed on the corporation, and a power to buy on the terms fixed by the Act, the power to borrow the money to complete the purchase. I know that it is an option, but a very serious option. Is not the corporation to be heard as to the reasonableness of the terms? They did object to one of the terms. If it is not to be heard this might happen, that it may become very desirable to purchase, and although the terms are not fair terms, the corporation having no other means of purchasing, must purchase on those terms. But if the corporation can be heard before the committee of the House of Commons or the House of Lords, the corporation can then insist on the terms being fair: "Give me the power, but give it me on fair terms." And I think for myself, it is the very heart of the interest of the corporation, if I may say so, that, as to the terms of the purchase, they are entitled to be represented. It is such an interference with the corporation, qua corporation, both as regards its rights and duties, and as regards its property, that I cannot imagine it can be fairly said it is not connected with the purposes for which the corporation exists. I say nothing about the three years instead of the ten. That is a very small point. I think I have said enough to show that this is the kind of active interference with the corporation itself, and with its rights, duties, and property, which entirely puts the case out of the class of cases I have been considering. It really comes much closer to the other class of cases, viz., an action to recover from the corporation a part of its property or to deprive it of a part of its privileges. It appears to me, rightly considered, that the corporation has by law the right to apply its funds in opposing such a Bill as this; and that therefore the information fails, and must be dismissed. I ought to have noticed before an argument addressed to me about the assent of the ratepayers. I did not notice it for this reason. They said a majority of the ratepayers are in favour of the Bill. That may be so now, but the corporation is governed by its town council, which is a representative body of all the ratepayers, and I am not aware of any means by which the town council can be controlled by the ratepayers, except by the system of not re-electing them when their time comes round, which system is very likely to be enforced in the present instance if the town council do not carry out the views of the ratepayers.

NEWINGTON LOCAL BOARD v. COTTINGHAM LOCAL BOARD, W. H. WILKINSON, AND THE HULL BOTANIC GARDEN COMPANY (LIMITED). (a)

Local authority—Public Health Act 1875, sect. 22
—Discharge of contract by statute.

By a deed, dated 1874, local board A. agreed with local board B. to allow B. to cause the sewers of B. to communicate with a sewer of A., provided that the sewage of other places should not be permitted by B. to pass into the sewers of B., so as to discharge into the sewer of A. Persons in other places constructed sewers, connected with sewers of B., and discharging through them into the sewer of A. B. made no attempt to restrain them. A. claimed an injunction restraining B. and the persons in other places from causing or permitting the flow of sewage from any of such other places into sewers of B., so as to discharge as aforesaid.

On demurrer,

Held, that, by the effect of the Public Health Act 1875, sect. 22, the contract made by the proviso in the deed of 1874 was discharged, and the persons in other places had a right to connect with the sewer of B., without making any application to A.

DEMURRER.

By a deed dated the 18th July 1874, to which the Local Government Board was a party, the Newington Local Board agreed to allow the Cottingham Local Board and the Hull Local Board of Health to cause the sewers of the district of the Cottingham Local Board, and of part of the district of the Hull Local Board of Health, to communicate with a certain outfall sewer of the Newington Local Board's district, to be constructed by that board, for the purpose of the outfall of sewage. The deed contained the following proviso:

Provided always and it is hereby further agreed and declared, that so far as practicable all storm waters from such districts respectively shall be prevented from flowing into the said outfall sewer of the said Newington

Local Board, and that the sewage of any other districts or places shall not be permitted by the said Cottingham Local Board and their successors and the said Hull Local Board of Health and their successors to pass into their respective sewers so as to discharge into the said outfall sewer of the said Newington Local Board without the consent in writing of the said Newington Local Board first had and obtained.

The plaintiffs duly constructed the said outfall drain or main sewer.

Two roads called Princes Avenue and Spring Bank were parts of the boundary of the district of the Cottingham Local Board. Sewers were constructed under each by that board, that under the former discharging into that under the latter, and the latter into the plaintiffs' main sewer. The Hull Botanic Garden Company (Limited), hereinafter called the Hull Garden, owned a piece of land not in the district of the Cottingham Local Board, nor within the part of the district of the Hull Local Board of Health intended to be drained in accordance with the deed of 1874. On part of this land they intended to lay out a lake and build villa residences. They had laid down sewers for draining the piece of land and carrying away the overflow of the lake and the sewage of the villas, which sewers, with the consent of the surveyor of the Cottingham Local Board, they had connected with the sewer under Spring Bank. In spite of the plaintiffs' remonstrances, the Cottingham Local Board and the Hull Garden were allowing these sewers still to remain so connected. Surface water was flowing from the land of the Hull Garden through their sewer into the Spring Bank sewer and thence into the plaintiffs' main sewer. Wilkinson owned land, also not within the above-mentioned district or part of district. He intended to erect buildings on it, and had laid down sewers for draining his land and buildings, and intended to connect them with the sewer under Princes Avenue. He applied to justices to assess the compensation to be paid by him to the Cottingham Local Board on making such connection. The Cottingham Local Board appeared by their clerk, and neither assented to nor opposed the application. The compensation was assessed at 175*l.*, and paid. It was alleged that, if sewers not within the district of the Cottingham Local Board should be connected with such of that board's sewers as discharged into the plaintiffs' main sewer, the main sewer would be overcharged and in great danger of bursting. The plaintiffs had not given any such consent as mentioned in the deed of 1874. They claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from causing or permitting any sewage or surface water, other than any arising in or flowing from the district of the Cottingham Local Board, to flow or pass into any of the sewers of that board, so as to discharge into the plaintiffs' main sewer; and from causing or permitting to be made any new outfall into any of the sewers of the Cottingham Local Board which communicated, either directly or indirectly, with the plaintiffs' main sewer, whereby any surface or sewage water, other than as aforesaid, might flow or pass into any of the sewers of the Cottingham Local Board, so as to discharge into the plaintiffs' main sewer. Each of the defendants demurred.

Higgins, Q.C. and Macnaghten for the Cottingham Local Board.—The proviso does not operate to prevent such communications as at the date of the deed were authorised by statute to be made (Public Health Act 1848, sect. 43; Sanitary Act 1866, sect. 9), and as are now authorised by sect. 22 of the Public Health Act 1875. At the time of the deed any owner or occupier could as a matter of right connect with the drain; and so now. Having, by reason of the statute, no power to refuse the communication, we have not contravened the clause, for we do not allow what we cannot prevent.

Glassey, Q.C. and W. Hatfield Green for the plaintiffs.—The parties to the deed must take the proviso as qualified by sect. 28 of the Act of 1875. As to the effect of sect. 22, we say an Act only prevents effect from being given to a contract where it makes the execution of the contract impossible:

Baily v. De Crespigny, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 185.

So far from the contracts being now impracticable, the Act gives the defendants all the power that they can want: (sects. 15, 27, 173, 175.) Hest v. Gill (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 291; L. Rep. 7 Ch. 699), on the effect of threatening, is the same as this case.

Higgins in reply.—The proviso was taken from the Public Health Act 1872, sect. 32. Sect. 28 of the Act of 1875, and the sections of the earlier Acts from which it is borrowed, apply to agreements between local authorities. Sect. 22 of the same Act, and the corresponding sections of earlier Acts, apply to other cases, viz., cases where communication is required by other than local authorities. Baily v. De Crespigny is in my favour; for it decides that a covenantor is equally disabled from preventing a third party from doing what he is empowered, or as what he is required by statute to do, and therefore is equally relieved from liability in either case.

J. Pearson, Q.C. and Borthwick, for Wilkinson.—I had only to deal with the Cottingham Local Board, and had nothing to do with any agreement between them and the Newington Local Board. Assume that at the time of the deed there was no enactment equivalent to sect. 22 of the Act of 1875, still, when that Act came, it repealed the agreement in the deed as to Wilkinson:

Brewster v. Kitchell, 1 Salk. 97, 197, 198; 1 Ld. Raym. 317, 321.

Glassey for the plaintiffs.

Ford North, Q.C. and B. B. Rogers, for the Hull Garden.—It is said that the words in sect. 22 of the Act of 1875, "local authority," mean all the local authorities through whose land the sewer passes; but it would be preposterous to suppose that a man opening a sewer has to negotiate with all such authorities; he has only to deal with the one immediately near to him.

Malins, V.C.—The injunction is sought upon the ground of the contract entered into between the two local boards by the deed of the 18th July 1874. The meaning of the proviso, I think, is plain enough, that the Cottingham board are not to give their consent; so far as they can, they are not to permit any persons who have property not within the district to drain into the Cottingham sewer, thereby increasing the quantity of sewage to be thrown into the Newington district, without the consent of the Newington board. [His Lordship then stated the facts above given as to Wilkinson.] As far as Wilkinson is concerned, there has been no breach of the undertaking according to the express words; because it says that the sewage of any other district or place shall not be permitted by the Cottingham board to flow into their sewer so as to discharge into the Newington sewer. As they have not given their consent, but have remained indifferent, there has not, according to the strict letter of the contract, been any breach of it. They have neither assented nor dissented, but have stood by and allowed the authorities to decide what they thought was right according to the law. In the part of the statement of claim relating to the Hull Garden, there is an allegation of a breach of contract, because the Cottingham board are stated to consent, and consenting is permitting. Under these circumstances it is contended that there has been such a breach of the contract entered into as entitles the plaintiffs to an injunction. To this statement of claim each of the defendants has demurred. The defendants mainly rest their cases on the 22nd section of the Public Health Act 1875, and if that Act does apply, then the plaintiffs are wrong and the defendants right. Before I read the section, I may say it appears that all persons within the local district have an absolute right, under the 21st section, to drain into the sewer, without consent being given, or without any terms being imposed upon them. An owner or occupier of premises within the district is not bound to make any compensation whatever. But the right of Wilkinson and the Hull Garden, who are without the Cottingham district, depends on the 22nd section. It was urged that, whatever may be the effect of the contract of the 18th July 1874, it is superseded by the Act of 1875. On that subject, the law cannot be better put than in Brewster v. Kitchell (1 Salk. 198), though it is an old authority: "Where the question is, whether a covenant be repealed by Act of Parliament? this is the difference, viz., where H. covenants not to do an act or thing which was lawful to do, and an Act of Parliament comes after, and compels him to do it, the statute repeals the covenant; so, if H. covenants to do a thing which is lawful, and an Act of Parliament comes in and hinders him from doing it, the covenant is repealed. But if a man covenants not to do a thing which then was unlawful, and an Act comes and makes it lawful to do it, such Act of Parliament does not repeal the covenant." That is also followed by the recent case of Baily v. Crespiigny (ubi sup.). There it was held, "that the defendant was entitled to judgment; for the defendant was discharged from his covenant by the subsequent Act of Parliament, which compelled him to assign to the railway company, and so put it out of his power to perform the covenant, on the principle of the maxim, lex non cogit ad impossibilia, and that it could make no difference whether the company were only empowered or were compelled to build the station on the paddock." Now, assuming that in the present case there was a covenant between these parties, originally binding between them, yet, if the Act has authorised every member of the community to do that which the Cottingham board bound themselves by the covenant not to permit anyone to do, when the Act says what the 22nd section of the Act of 1875 says, it seems to me that the case falls strictly and literally within those decisions, that a later Act of Parliament discharges the covenant between the parties. Mr. Higgins put it correctly, that the defendants could not prevent, and therefore did not permit. That is, they could not prevent the owner from doing it, because Parliament conferred the right upon him; and if they could not prevent him, it is not their permission, but that of the law. Mr. Glasse argued that the covenant is absolutely binding, and that the consequence of a repeal of it would be to throw great inconvenience upon the Newington board, by overcharging their drainage and rendering it impossible for them to work their sewer properly. The answer is, that at the date of the deed of 1874 there already existed the 9th section of the Sanitary Act 1866 and the 32nd section of the Public Health Act 1872, and that in view of those sections, when the Newington board entered into this arrangement, they were bound to consider what under the existing law was the chance of the drainage being increased. They were bound to make their sewer of the size which was calculated, not to dispose only of the actual sewage, but of that sewage which would be added to it in the exercise of that power which then existed and undoubtedly exists under the later Act. It is an inconvenience which they were bound to prepare for. It is the right of every owner without the district to consider what will be most convenient to him. [His Lordship then pointed out that the map showed that the most convenient sewer for the Hull Garden was the sewer of the Cottingham board, which also was the convenient sewer for Wilkinson.] Another topic of Mr. Glasse was that Wilkinson and the Hull Garden were bound to apply, not only to the Cottingham board, but to the Newington board. I cannot agree with that, because the Act gives them this right. [His Lordship read from the 22nd section of the Act of 1875, and continued:] The local authority mentioned in this section is the local authority of the district adjoining; that local authority's is the drain into which the sewage is to be poured, and no other. The section prevented the Cottingham board from objecting to the making of the connection by the other defendants. The question whether the Newington board may be entitled to a portion of the compensation paid by Wilkinson to the Cottingham board is a matter between the two boards that has nothing to do with the questions raised in this action. Therefore it appears to me that the Cottingham board have not done anything which by law they were not bound to do. Wilkinson has done nothing which by law he was not entitled to do, and the same observation applies to the Hull Garden. The three demurrers will be allowed with costs.

BELL (app.) v. MORSON (resp.). (a)

Election of guardians—Falsely assuming to act—Voting paper—Conviction—14 & 15 Vict. c. 105, s. 3.

The appellant called at the house of a voter for an election of guardians of the poor during his absence from home, asked for his voting paper, placed the voter's initials against two of the candidates' names, signed his own name as witness to the voter's mark, and got another person who was present to make a cross. The voter was not an illiterate person, and had given no permission or authority to the appellant to write upon the paper. Although this voting paper was allowed by the returning officer at the election, it did not appear how it reached him or what the voter knew about it.

Held, upon a case stated, that these facts were not sufficient to justify a conviction of the appellant under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 105, s. 3, for falsely assuming to act in the name or on the behalf of a person entitled to vote.

THIS was a case stated by justices of the peace in and for the county of Durham, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant, who was dissatisfied with the determination upon the question of law, which arose, as hereinafter stated, on the 24th June 1878, at Bishop Auckland, in the said county, the appellant having duly entered into a recognisance to prosecute the appeal.

1. Upon the hearing of a certain information preferred by the respondent against the appellant, under sect. 3 of the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 105, that the said appellant between the 7th and the 10th April 1878, at the township of Crook and Billy Row, in the county of Durham, pending the election of guardians of the poor for the said township under the statutes in that behalf, wilfully, fraudulently, and with intent to affect the result of the said election, unlawfully did falsely assume to act in the name and on the behalf of one John Hewitson, being then a person entitled to vote at the said election, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. The justices convicted the appellant of the said offence, and adjudged him to be imprisoned in Her Majesty's prison at Durham, in the said county, and there to be kept without hard labour for the space of ten days.

2. The following facts were either proved or admitted by the parties:

3. That there was an election of guardians of the poor for the township of Crook and Billy Row aforesaid pending in the month of April last, and that one John Hewitson was a person entitled to vote at the said election.

4. That a voting paper, prepared by the clerk of the guardians, and produced at the hearing, was left at the house of the said John Hewitson, in which paper there was the name of the said John Hewitson as the person being entitled to vote at the said election, together with directions as to the voter filling up and signing the voting paper.

5. That Jane Hewitson, the mother, and Anthony Hewitson, the brother, resided with the said John Hewitson, and also that the two brothers had worked for several years at a colliery at which the appellant is the overman.

6. That on one day between the 7th and 10th April last the appellant went to the house of the said John Hewitson, that the said John Hewitson was not at home, and that the appellant asked the mother and brother, who were in the house, if the voting paper was filled up, upon which the brother said it was not, whereupon the appellant said he would fill it up for them, and asked for the paper, which was given to him by the mother, and he (the appellant) then, without any further remark and without asking for whom John Hewitson voted, filled up the paper by placing John Hewitson's initials, "J. H.," against the names of Bell and Jones, two of the candidates, and writing the name John Hewitson, as the name of a voter who could not write, at the foot thereof, and signing his own name, "Thomas Bell," as witness to the mark of John Hewitson. Appellant then requested Anthony Hewitson to make a cross at the foot of the voting paper, which he accordingly did in the blank space opposite to where the appellant had written the name of John Hewitson. The appellant then asked the mother and brother if they voted for Bell and Jones, to which Anthony Hewitson, the brother, replied "No," whereupon the appellant said, "It is filled up now," and then went away.

7. The voting paper so prepared and witnessed by the appellant, which was afterwards allowed by the returning officer on taking the poll at the said election, was produced at the hearing before the justices.

8. That John Hewitson had not given any permission or authority to the appellant or Anthony Hewitson to sign his name or mark to the voting paper, and that John Hewitson was not an illiterate man, but that he could write his name.

9. On the part of the appellant, it was contended that the mere preparation by the appellant of the voting paper to receive the mark of the voter was not sufficient in point of law to support a conviction of the appellant for falsely assuming to act in the name or on the behalf of a person entitled to vote.

10. The justices, however, being of opinion that the appellant was well acquainted with the two Hewitsons, and also that he did the act with which he was charged wilfully, fraudulently, and with intent to affect the result of the said election, gave their determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

11. The question of law upon which the case is stated for the opinion of the court therefore is, whether the preparation and filling up of the voting paper by the appellant by the placing of John Hewitson's initials opposite the names of Bell and Jones, two of the candidates, writing at the foot thereof the name of John Hewitson as the name of a voter who could not write, and signing his own name as witness to the mark of John Hewitson, whilst the mark was placed on the voting paper by Anthony Hewitson at the request of the appellant, who knew that he was not John Hewitson, the person entitled to vote at the said election, is sufficient to support the conviction of the appellant for falsely assuming to act in the name and on the behalf of the said John Hewitson, being then a person entitled to vote at the said election.

RIDDLELL (app.) v. SPEAR (resp.).

By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 105, s. 3:

If any person, pending or after the election of any guardian or guardians, shall wilfully, fraudulently, and with intent to affect the result of such election, commit any of the acts following: that is to say, fabricate in whole or in part, alter, deface, destroy, abstract, or purloin any nomination or voting paper used therein; or personate any person entitled to vote at such election; or falsely assume to act in the name or on the behalf of any person so entitled to vote; or interrupt the distribution or collection of the voting papers; or distribute or collect the same under a false pretence of being lawfully authorised to do so; every such person so offending shall for every such offence be liable, upon conviction thereof before two justices, to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction for any period not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour.

Meek argued for the appellant.—This is a conviction for falsely assuming to act in the name or on the behalf of a person entitled to vote; and it is not necessary to consider whether what the appellant did could properly constitute either of the other offences created by the section. There is nothing in the evidence to show any acting in the name or on behalf of John Hewitson; nor, indeed, does it appear that John Hewitson did not ratify and act upon what the appellant wrote. [Stopped by the Court.]

J. Cook, contra.—The chief ingredient of the offences under this section is the intention, and the justices have found that the appellant acted in the matter wilfully, fraudulently, and with intent to affect the result of the election. It does not appear that John Hewitson ever knew anything about the paper, either before or after the appellant wrote upon it. The voting papers are called for at the houses of the voters, and it never could have been intended that a vote should be given without any knowledge of it by the voter. The case of Whiteley v. Chappell (38 L. J. 51, M.C.) failed as a conviction on the ground that the person whose name was assumed was dead: it is consistent with that decision that this conviction was right.

MELLOR, J.—I think if, upon these facts, the justices had convicted the appellant of fabricating in whole or in part this voting paper, it might have been contended that the evidence was sufficient; but they seem to me to have proceeded on the wrong clause of the section. I see nothing to justify me in thinking that the appellant assumed to act in John Hewitson's name. It would be too much to infer this when it does not appear that John Hewitson was even called as a witness. Moreover it does not appear how the paper reached the returning officer; if the voter himself gave it him, he might have thereby ratified the appellant's fabrication. At all events the evidence is not enough for a conviction under this clause.

MANISTY, J.—I agree; but I think the circumstances come very nearly within the offence charged. Possibly what the appellant did is consistent with innocence. I do not see how the justices could find what is stated in the case without John Hewitson's being called as a witness; and it is amazing that he was not further asked if he had adopted the vote which the appellant had written. I agree that the evidence is not sufficient as it stands.

RIDDLELL (app.) v. SPEAR (resp.). (a)

—38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, ss. 94 and 96.

The appellant rented land of the owner of houses and other land in the neighbourhood; and about two years ago the landowner, without the appellant's consent, made a sewer under the land he occupied. Pecuniary compensation was claimed at the time, but during the two years the sewage of several houses passed through the sewer; the appellant, being unable to get satisfaction from his landlord, at length stopped up the sewer, and the local board obtained a conviction against him under sects. 94 and 96 of the Public Health Act 1875, although no nuisance existed on his land.

Held, upon a case stated, that the appellant was a person by whose act the nuisance arose or continued; and that he was rightly convicted.

THIS case was stated for the opinion of the court by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Durham, acting in and for the East Division of Chester Ward in the said county, in pursuance of the statute made and passed in the twentieth and twenty-first years of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, chapter 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of this court in questions of law which arose as hereinafter stated.

On the 6th April 1878 the respondent, John Spear, of South Shields, in the county of Durham, medical officer of health of the local board of health for the district of Hebburn, in the said county, made a complaint that in or upon certain premises—the Caledonian Hotel, situate in Lyon-street, Hebburn Quay, in the said county, within the district of the said local board of health for the district of Hebburn, in the said county—the following nuisance then existed, the said premises being in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious to health, arising from the reflux of sewage matter into the cellar of the said premises which are called or known by the name or sign of the Caledonian Hotel, situate at Lyon-street, Hebburn Quay aforesaid; and that the said nuisance was caused by the act, default, or sufferance of the above-named appellant, Edward Riddell, of Lyon-street, Hebburn Quay, in the said county of Durham, by placing an obstruction in the sewer in the locality of the said house and premises; and thereupon a summons was duly issued and served upon the said Edward Riddell, the above-named appellant, requiring him to appear before two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace of the county of Durham and answer the said complaint.

On the 30th April 1878 the said complaint came to be heard at the justice room, Waterloo Vale, South Shields, in the said division and county, when the respondent, by Thomas Grieves Mabane, a solicitor, who is also clerk to the local board of health for the district of Hebburn aforesaid, and the said appellant by his solicitor, appeared before the said justices.

The proceeding was under the Public Health Act 1875, sects. 91 to 111, both inclusive, and sect. 13 was also referred to.

It was satisfactorily proved by Henry Wilson,

(a) Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div.]

RIDDELL (app.) v. SPEAR (resp.).

surveyor to the local board of health of Hebburn, and Richard Hill, the sanitary inspector of the board, that a sewer had existed within the said local board district for draining the Caledonian Hotel in question for at least two years previous to the complaint, and that such sewer belonged to the board, and was part of the main sewerage of the district, and that it drained other properties besides the Caledonian Hotel, and particularly that it drained all Lyon-street.

It was proved that the sewer in question was put in about the year 1873 by Mr. Carr Ellison, the owner of the land whereon the Caledonian Hotel is built, and of the surrounding land, and that the appellant alleged and complained to the local board that he had not received compensation from Mr. Ellison for putting the sewer through land of which the appellant was his tenant. The letter of appellant to the local board, of which the following is a copy, was put in evidence on behalf of the respondent :

Lyon-street, Hebburn, Feb. 7, 1878.

To the Urban Sanitary Authority, Hebburn.

Chairman and Gentlemen,—I respectfully inform you that I have not received payment for putting the sewer down my premises at Jarrow Wood House, a claim for which was forwarded to R. C. Ellison some time ago. If my demand be not complied with within fourteen days from this date I will cut off the sewer from your use. As you will be aware, I never received notice from you or any other party at any time that such sewer was wanted. I shall regret if such course has to be taken by me on account of other people's property, but I see no alternative.—Yours faithfully,

E. RIDDELL.

J. Buchanan, Esq., Chairman.

It was further proved that the appellant between the 7th and 25th Feb. last, stopped up the passage of the sewerage from the Caledonian Hotel, by filling up the sewer at the manhole, thereby preventing the drainage of the Caledonian Hotel flowing through it, and caused such drainage to accumulate in the cellar of the said hotel; that such drainage there became a nuisance injurious to health, and that such nuisance existed at the date alleged by the complaint. The evidence of John Spear, medical officer of health to the said local board, was distinct, that the liquid accumulated in the cellar of the Caledonian Hotel was a nuisance injurious to health, and he also deposed that the appellant had admitted to him that he had stopped up the drain, giving as his reason that the local board had not made any acknowledgment for putting the sewer through his land.

It was further proved that a notice by the sanitary inspector of the local board requiring the appellant to abate the nuisance in question within twenty-four hours was duly served upon him on the 3rd April 1878.

The appellant contended that the summons or complaint ought to be dismissed on all or one of the following grounds :

First, that defendant is in possession of the land under a claim of right, and it was unnecessary therefore to consider his title.

Secondly, that the sewer not constructed by the board and not vested in them.

Thirdly, that the sewer is constructed through defendant's land and drains more than one house, so that it is a sewer which vests in the local board unless it was unlawfully made through defendant's land without his authority and without the local board having served notice under the Sanitary Acts.

Fourthly, defendant claims the right to prevent the sewage coming upon his land by the means he adopted, and that, as the sewage does not originate on his land, he is not responsible for any nuisance it may cause by its having been prevented by him from coming on to his land. The defendant claims the right to prevent foreign sewage coming upon his land, and is therefore not liable to conviction under sect 96.

In support of appellant's contentions he relied upon the facts proved as above stated, and also upon the following evidence adduced upon cross-examination of Mr. Wilson, wherein he stated as follows :

The local board was constituted two or three months before I was appointed surveyor in July 1873. The sewer was not put in, in consequence of a notice from the board. It is understood by me now to belong to the board, because owners of property put them in and hand them over. I cannot say when this sewer became the property of the board. I am not aware of this sewer being handed over to the board by any formal act. I have not seen Mr. Ellison as to this sewer. I prepared the plan produced. The manhole is 174 yards from the Caledonian Hotel. The manhole is in a field which I understood to be in the occupation of the defendant. The manhole is about 200 yards from the sewer mouth, which is an open field, and discharges itself into defendant's second field. It is about forty yards from the nearest dwelling, and the distance from the mouth to the foreshore (of the river) is 144 yards. All Lyon-street drains into the sewer. Defendant has complained of the sewer being through his land. No reply was given to the letter of the 7th Feb.

The appellant called Michael Pigg as a witness on his behalf, whose evidence was as follows :

Have known land at Jarrow Wood Farm for fourteen years, resided in it ten years. I know Humble by sight. He is a contractor at Gateshead. In Sept. 1874 the sewer was made. I heard George Riddell say to Humble, "By whose authority do you come here?" He replied, "Mr. Carr Ellison." George Riddell is defendant's brother, and they are joint occupiers of the land. George Riddell said they had not any right there; he would treat them as trespassers. I consider the discharge of sewage upon the land a nuisance. It has been complained of.

The justices gave the evidence and contentions on both sides their careful consideration, and were of opinion that it was satisfactorily proved that the sewer was in possession of the local board, and that the appellant was responsible under the Public Health Act 1875.

And on proof there had before them that the said nuisance so complained of did exist on the said premises, and that the same was caused by the act, default, or sufferance of the said Edward Riddell, the appellant, the justices, in pursuance of the Public Health Act 1875, ordered the said appellant within twenty-four hours of the service of their order, or a true copy thereof according to the said Act, to effectually abate the said nuisance by removing the said obstruction in the said sewer, and by cleansing and purifying the said premises situate at Lyon-street, bHebburn Quay, in the said county, and called or known by the sign of the Caledonian Hotel, so that the same should no longer be a nuisance or injurious to health as aforesaid. And they further adjudged the said appellant for his said offence to forfeit and pay the sum of ten shillings to be paid and applied according to law, and they also directed that the said appellant should pay the sum of fifteen shillings and sixpence, being the amount of costs incurred up to making of the order for abatement of the said nuisance; and if the said several sums were not paid forthwith they adjudged the said appellant to be imprisoned in the house of correction at the City of Durham, in the county of Durham, for the space of seven days, unless the said several sums and all costs and charges of the commitment and conveying of the said appellant to the said house of correction should be sooner paid.

If the court shall be of opinion that the said order is wrong in point of law, then the said order is to be quashed; but if the court shall be of opinion that the said order was legally and properly made, the same is to stand.

Meek for appellant.—It may be, as the justices have found, that this sewer was vested in the board under sect. 13 of the Public Health Act 1875; but the appellant is not the person under sects. 94 and 96 "by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues." Sect. 94 continues: "Or, if such person cannot be found," the notice shall be served "on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises." Here the hotel is the premises on which the nuisance arises, and moreover the person by whose default the nuisance arises is Mr. R. C. Ellison, who improperly made the sewer, and not the appellant. An authority for this is Brown v. Bussell; Francourt v. Freeman (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 251), where the person whose premises were drained in one case, and the person who constructed the drain in the other, were held to be the persons by whose act respectively the nuisances arose.

Cave, Q.C. and Cock appeared for the respondent, but were not heard.

MELLOR, J.—I think our judgment must be for the respondent. There is some difficulty in applying the sections of the Act to this particular case; but the justices have found that this sewer has been vested in the board. Moreover, the sewage passes not only from the hotel, but from the whole street, and has done so for two years past. No doubt the appellant's claim might have been enforced upon Mr. Ellison either before or after the making of the sewer; but he could have no right to stop the sewage after the sewer had become vested in the board. It appears from the cases cited that there is some ground for arguing that Mr. Ellison or the occupier of the hotel might have been proceeded against as well as the appellant; but the ground upon which I based my decision in those cases is quite sufficient to support our judgment for the respondent here. "Suppose it to be a disputed question," I say (L. R. 3 Q. B. at p. 261), "whether an open drain was made through land with the consent of the owner, the public health is not to suffer until this question is determined. The proceedings are to be, in the first instance, against the person whose act causes the nuisance; if he cannot be ascertained, then against the person who has the misfortune to have such a noxious easement on his land." Here the appellant is the person whose act caused the nuisance, and it was within the justices' power to convict as they have done.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the appellant has any remedy, it can only be against Mr. Ellison, his landlord. He has mistaken his course by stopping up the sewer.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Nov. 8 and 12, 1878.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns), Lords O'HAGAN and SELBORNE.)

WARD v. HOBBS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act—Sale of goods—Implied warranty—Sale "with all faults"—Breach of statutory duty.

The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act (Stat. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 70) enacts, sect. 57: "If any person exposes in a market or fair, or other public place . . . any animal affected with a contagious or infectious disease, he shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he shows . . . that he did not know of the same being so affected, and that he could not with reasonable diligence have obtained such knowledge."

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the mere fact of exposing for sale in a market animals which were to the knowledge of the vendor suffering from such disease did not, in the absence of an express warranty, and of any fraud or concealment on the part of the vendor, create an implied warranty under the statute which would make him liable to the purchaser for damages sustained by him in consequence of the condition of the animals.

A breach of a statutory duty does not necessarily give a right of action to the person wronged by such breach.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.), reported in 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 654, and 3 Q. B. Div. 150, reversing a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Mellor and Lush, JJ.), reported in 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 511, and 2 Q. B. Div. 331, in favour of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff and defendant were both farmers near Newbury. In Sept. 1875 the defendant sent some pigs to be sold by auction at Newbury market. Among the conditions of sale were the following:

4. The lots, with all faults and errors of description, if any, to be paid for and removed at the buyer's expense immediately after the sale.

6. No warranty will be given by the auctioneer with any lot, and as all lots are open to inspection previous to the commencement of the sale no compensation shall be made in respect of any fault or error of description of any lot in the catalogue.

The plaintiff purchased the pigs for 44l., which was admitted to be a fair price; but immediately after the sale they showed symptoms of typhoid fever, and all but one died, and they infected other pigs of the plaintiff, which also died. The plaintiff then brought this action for the damage he had sustained.

WARD v. HOBBS.

The case was tried before Brett, L.J. at the Berkshire Summer Assizes in 1876, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, finding expressly that the defendant was aware that the pigs were infected with the disease when he sent them to the market.

The learned judge reserved leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendant, but the rule was discharged by the Queen's Bench Division. This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, as above mentioned, on the ground that the defendant did not by taking the animals to a public market represent that they were free from disease.

The plaintiff then appealed to the House of Lords.

H. Matthews, Q.C. and Bros appeared for the appellant.—The arguments urged appear sufficiently from the judgments of their Lordships. In addition to the cases mentioned in the judgments, the following were cited or referred to in the course of the argument :

Nov. 12.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, in this case the respondent sold a certain number of pigs by auction at Newbury market, and the appellant became the purchaser of those pigs at the auction. There were conditions of sale under which they were sold, and the fourth and sixth of those conditions ran in these words: [His Lordship read the conditions set out above, and continued:] It turned out that almost immediately after the sale the pigs, in the hands of the purchaser, showed symptoms of being affected with typhoid fever, a contagious and infectious disease; they rapidly died off, and nearly all of them ultimately died. If the finding of the jury, that the pigs were infected with this disease at the time of the sale, and that the respondent knew it, is a correct inference from the facts of the case, then, beyond all doubt, the respondent was, both morally and legally, highly culpable. But the question is, Is there a right of action on the part of the appellant? In his claim he puts the case in this way: he says that by warranting the pigs to be free from any infectious disease, the defendant induced him to buy them; and then he alleges that "even if the defendant did not warrant the pigs, the plaintiff says that the defendant, either knowingly, or having good reason to believe that the pigs were suffering from an infectious disease, offered them for sale at a certain open and public market held at Newbury, and sold thirty-two of them to the plaintiff for 44l.;" and then he says that "the defendant knew that the plaintiff was a farmer, and that the pigs would be placed with other pigs, and would also be turned into certain stubble fields." Now with regard to the allegations in the statement of claim, undoubtedly there was no warranty, and the case in that respect is unsupported. As to the other allegation, that simply from the fact of sending the pigs to the market when they were in this state a right of action arises, that was not the ground on which the case was mainly rested at your Lordships' bar. The counsel for the appellant contended that, from what took place at the trial, and afterwards, any technicality founded upon the claim was out of the question, and the appellant might succeed by showing that, on the facts as they were proved, there was any right of action on his part on any ground whatever. The appellant's contention at your Lordships' bar was this, that the respondent had made a representation which was untrue in point of fact, and that the action lay as in the nature of an action for deceit. Now, I apprehend there can be no doubt of this proposition, that if a man expressly states upon a sale that he gives no warranty, and that the goods sold must be taken with all their faults, but goes on to say expressly in addition to that, that so far as he knows, or believes, or has reason to believe, the goods are free from any particular fault, and that the animals (if it be animals that are sold) are free from any disease, if he expressly states that, and if it can afterwards be proved that the animals were tainted with the disease to which he referred, then there can be no doubt that, notwithstanding the negation of warranty, an action would lie for deceit for the false representation. There is no difficulty in reconciling the two express statements—one that he does not warrant, and that the property must be taken with its faults, and the other that, so far as he knows or believes, the article sold is free from a particular fault. Upon that part of the case there can be no controversy. But the question here is, not how two express statements of the kind that I have described are to be made to stand together, but whether, in addition to the express negation of warranty which I have described, there was any other representation at all. Now, any representation in words there clearly was not in this case. The only statement actually made was the one contained in the two conditions of sale which I have read. Beyond that not a word was said, or is alleged to have been said, on the part of the auctioneer; and the respondent never in any way came in contact with the appellant. But what was contended at your Lordships' bar was this, that, although there was no express representation made in words, yet there was conduct on the part of the respondent which amounted to a representation; and it was endeavoured to make that out in this way: it was said the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70), s. 57, enacts that any person who sends an animal, having at the time upon it an infectious or contagious disease, to any public or open place, shall be guilty of an offence under this Act, unless he shall prove that he was not aware that the animal was so tainted with disease. And it was said, therefore, that the respondent here, from the mere fact of sending his pigs into a public market, must be taken (being of course held to be aware of the law upon the subject) to be representing that he was

WARD v. HOBBS.

complying with, or, at all events, not infringing the law, and that the animals were not tainted with any infectious or contagious disease. I think it always desirable to abstain, as far as possible, from expressing an opinion upon a case which is not actually the case under consideration, and I desire here to be held free from expressing any opinion as to what, in a case in which there was no negation of warranty, no statement such as I have read from the two conditions of sale in this case, ought to be the law as to a man who sent his pigs to a public market, knowing them at the time to be tainted with disease. I observe that in the case of Bodger v. Nichols (28 L. T. Rep. N.S. 441), in the Court of Queen's Bench, Blackburn, J. seems to have thrown out an opinion that, in a case of that kind, there being nothing upon one side in the shape of statement or negation, and there being simply the fact of a man sending diseased animals to a public market to be sold on the other, that must be held to be a representation by conduct that the animals were free from disease, and that the person so sending them might be liable for the consequences of that representation if it turned out to be untrue. I desire, so far as I am concerned, to hold myself unpledged, if such a case had to be considered. But that, as it seems to me, is not the case which your Lordships have now to consider. You have here to consider an actual, clear, unqualified statement in writing, on the one hand, and no statement whatever, even in mere words, on the other hand, but an attempt to raise a conclusion as to an implied statement from conduct. The words of the statement on the one side are perfectly clear; they are that the vendor will not warrant the goods—that they are open to inspection, that the purchaser might inspect them, and that the purchaser must take them with all their faults. Now I hold that, in order to countervail or qualify that, and to cut it down, there must be something as clear in statement in an opposite direction. If there had been that representation in words which I began by supposing, namely, that notwithstanding that negation of warranty, the vendor said that he believed the animals were free from disease, that might be the foundation of an action for deceit; but it seems to me that there is no authority and no principle upon which, in the face of a clear and unqualified statement on the one hand, such as I have described, that the purchaser must take the articles with all their faults, you are to raise, from the mere circumstance of his sending the animals to the market, the implication of a representation on the other hand that the animals were, in the belief of the vendor, free from disease. I therefore, on this part of the case, entirely agree with the unanimous conclusion of the Court of Appeal. But there were some minor points in the case suggested as arguments upon which the appeal might be sustained, and I will refer to them very shortly. The first of them was this: It was said that there was here a breach of statutory duty, and that wherever you have a breach of statutory duty and any person wronged by it, the person wronged has a right of action. Now, I do not stop to consider how far that can be supported as a general proposition. A good deal might be said upon that subject, but it is sufficient to point out to your Lordships that the statutory duty here is of this kind; it is a duty not to send infected animals into a public place—for an obvious reason, lest they should by contact or neighbourhood taint other animals, and thereby occasion injury to the public. If in that state of things some person had come forward and said, "You, the respondent, sent tainted animals into this public place, and my animals in that public place, by contact or neighbourhood, were infected, and I suffered a loss," then I could understand the argument. But that is not what occurred here. What occurred in the public place was the buying and the selling, and no tainting of other animals, although it is said that after the pigs became the property of the purchaser, and were taken to his farm, they tainted other animals which were there. But that is not the gist of the enactment, and therefore it appears to me that this argument altogether fails. The next point was this: It was said that that which was sold here was not really a lot of pigs, but a mass of disease—of typhoid fever. To that all I can say is, that a pig having typhoid fever appears to me not to lose its identity any more than a man having typhoid fever ceases to be a man; and therefore the thing sold was that which it was professed to sell. Then again it was said that what was sold here was not merely infected by disease, but was a noxious and a dangerous thing, certain not only to be useless in itself, but to be a source of evil and of danger wherever it might be carried, and it was likened to the case of a person selling explosive substances without any warning being given to the purchaser, and without its being known or made clear that the possession of the substance was attended with danger. There again I should not wish to express any opinion as to how far that argument might be urged in a case where there was no express statement upon the subject of the thing sold; it is sufficient to say that it seems to me that where you have an article sold with a statement, not merely that the vendor does not warrant it, but that the purchaser must take it with all its faults, this point really becomes a branch of the first point to which I have referred; and you cannot therefore contend that the purchaser is afterwards to be at liberty to turn round and say, "There was this fault in the article which I bought which makes it a dangerous article for me to become the possessor of." Those were the arguments which your Lordships heard urged with great skill and ingenuity by the counsel for the appellant; but it appears to me that they all failed, and that the decision of the court below ought to be affirmed. I move your Lordships, therefore, that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I do not regard this case as free from difficulty; but, on the whole, I see no sufficient reason for declining to concur with the Court of Appeal. The matter, as presented by the appellant, is of the first impression; no authority supports his contention, and its success would involve the establishment of a new principle, and the recognition of a legal presumption heretofore unknown. The statement of claim relies upon a warranty, but makes no case of deceit, or fraud, or failure of consideration, and contains no averment that the plaintiff was misled by any representation of the defendant. Warranty there was none; but, on the contrary, the conditions of sale expressly declined the giving of any, and purchasers were informed that they might make what inspection they pleased before the commencement of the sale, and that no compensation would be given "in respect of any fault or error of description of any lot in the catalogue." The very ingenious and exhaustive argument of the counsel for the appellant addressed itself to several points which, as I observe, were not made in the pleadings, and were dealt with sufficiently by the Lord Chancellor; but the real question is that which alone seems to have been raised and considered in the courts below, whether the offer for sale in open market, of itself, under the circumstances proved in evidence, amounted to a representation of soundness imposing responsibility on the defendant for the loss which the plaintiff undoubtedly incurred? I assume, for the purpose of the argument, according to the verdict of the jury, that the defendant knew of the diseased condition of the pigs when he sent them to market, although for my own part I am more than doubtful of the correctness of the finding in that respect. But, taking it as proved that the animals were known by the respondent to have disease, I should not be prepared to say, even in the absence of the conditions of sale on which he relies, that the non-disclosure of the fact would, without more, have cast liability for loss upon him. We must deal with the law as we find it, even though we might desire, in cases of bargain and sale, to compel more full and candid statements on peril of grave responsibility; and that law is stated thus by Judge Story in his book on Contracts (at p. 511): "The general rule, both of law and equity, in respect to concealment, is that mere silence with regard to a material fact which there is no legal obligation to divulge will not avoid a contract, although it may operate as an injury to the party from whom it is concealed." And again (p. 551): "Although a vendor is bound to employ no artifice or disguise for the purpose of concealing defects in the article sold, since that would amount to a positive fraud on the vendee, yet, under the general doctrine of caveat emptor, he is not ordinarily bound to disclose every defect of which he may be cognisant, although his silence may operate virtually to deceive the vendee." I take it that this is a correct statement, and, if so, as there was not in the present case any legal obligation to divulge the knowledge assumed to belong to the defendant, his simple failure to divulge it did not nullify the contract, and could not be taken, as the appellant insists, either as a representation of the soundness of the animals or as a representation that he did not know them to be unsound. If the vendee bought at his own risk and in reliance on his own inspection, without requiring a warranty, which he might have made the condition of his purchase, and if there was not—and no one says there was—any artifice or disguise on the part of the vendor, for the purpose of concealment, then I should be disposed to hold, if it were necessary to decide upon such a state of facts, that the mere silence, which he was not asked to break, did not impose responsibility. However, the case of the respondent is different and stronger, and we are not required to pronounce such a decision. The argument of the appellant rests upon implication, and inference arising from conduct; and no doubt conduct may amount to representation as clearly as any form of words. But the express declaration made in the conditions of the sale, in my opinion, forbade the implication and repelled the inference. The purchaser was informed that he would have no warranty, and that he was not to expect compensation for any fault. He was told to inspect for himself and to judge for himself, and warned that he must take the consequences of any error he might commit in making a bad bargain. He had the clearest intimation that the vendor, whatever might be his state of knowledge, expressly refused to give any help to a right decision or make any disclosure of any kind. The legal result is stated very plainly by Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Baglehole v. Walters (3 Camp. 154), the authority of which has never, so far as I know, been called in question: "Where an article is sold with all faults I think it is quite immaterial how many belonged to it within the knowledge of the seller, unless he used some artifice to disguise them, and to prevent their being discovered by the purchaser. The very object of introducing such a stipulation is to put the purchaser on his guard, and to throw upon him the burden of examining all faults, both secret and apparent. I may be possessed of a horse which I know to have many faults, and I wish to get rid of him for whatever sum he will fetch. I desire my servant to dispose of him, and, instead of giving a warranty of soundness, to sell him with all faults. Having thus laboriously freed myself from responsibility, am I to be liable if it be afterwards discovered that the horse was unsound?" Now the defendant in this case did precisely what was held by Lord Ellenborough to protect a vendor against liability for all faults, "secret or apparent." And, I repeat, it has not been pretended that he was guilty of any contrivance to conceal or to deceive. The conditions of sale, by declining to compensate, suggested that there existed, or might exist, a state of things which, but for the condition, would entitle to compensation. It at once challenged inspection, and aroused attention to the probable necessity of making it, and so left the purchaser without reason to complain. How is the force of this authority sought to be evaded? Only, so far as I understand the argument, by reliance on the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act. It is said that this Act, making the exposure in a market of animals affected by contagious disease a criminal offence, warrants purchasers in presuming that persons so exposing them intend to represent them—and represent them, in fact—as free from such disease; and that therefore responsibility attaches as on a warranty created through a representation by conduct. This is very subtle and not very tangible reasoning, and it has failed to satisfy my mind. In the first place, the condition of sale, by its express refusal of warranty or compensation, appears to me to negative the existence of any representation of the kind. It is distinct notice to all the world that there may be faults which the vendor does not care to disclose, for which he will not be accountable. Next the assumption, and the gratuitous assumption, is, that vendors and purchasers generally know not merely of the existence but of the terms of the Act, and of its penal operation, and of its effect in probably deterring the owners of unsound cattle from bringing them to sale. There may have been no such knowledge; and even if it existed, what reason have we for supposing that men will not violate the law, and brave its penalties, taking the risk of discovery and the chance of escape? What right or reason has anyone to presume that the dealer, by the fact that he offers to sell, demonstrates, or intends to demonstrate, his compliance with the Act, and consequently affirms the soundness of the animal? In this case, if the finding of the jury was correct, the defendant, knowing that he would be guilty of a breach of the statute subjecting him to punishment, ventured on it notwithstanding, and got off scot free, for his pigs passed the inspector, and were pronounced to be without disease. Many similar transactions may and must take place, for obedience to the law cannot always be expected when evasion of it may be the source of profit; and I find it impossible to hold that the mere appearance of animals in a market can be reasonably presumed to imply their immunity from contagious illness in any case, and certainly not in a case in which the owner negatives any such implication by refusing to warrant, and insisting on an acceptance "with all faults." I cannot see any real relation between the penal statute and the contract we are considering; and I agree with Brett, L.J. that the attempt to connect them is illusory. The Act was passed for the benefit of the general public; it has nothing to do with the bargains of particular persons. Under such circumstances as are now before us the presumption on which the appellant rests his claim to recover the compensation which the conditions of sale forbade him to expect, seems to me to have no foundation in fact or law; and I concur with my noble and learned friend that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

WARD v. HOBBS.

Lord SELBORNE.—My Lords, I feel compelled to agree in the judgment moved by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, though I confess I do so with some reluctance. Upon the question of implied representation I have never felt any doubt. Such an implication should never be made without facts to warrant it; and here I find none, except that in sending for sale, though not in selling, these animals, a penal statute was violated. To say that every man is always to be taken to represent in his dealings with other men that he is not to his knowledge violating any statute is a refinement which, except for the purpose of producing some particular consequence, would not, I think, appear reasonable to any man. The argument which for some time most weighed with me was, that for a man to sell to another, without disclosing the fact, an article which he knows to be positively noxious, and the other man does not know to be so, even though he expressly negatives warranty, and says that the purchaser must take his bargain with all faults, is an actionable wrong. I confess I should not be sorry if the law were so; but I know of no authority for the proposition that such is the law, even with respect to the particular case of infectious disease in animals sold. The very nature of the condition that the buyer is to take the animals with all faults implies that they may be diseased, without any distinction between infectious and non-infectious disease, and I cannot think that the legislation which has recently taken place in the public interest against particular acts tending to propagate such disease can make that an actionable wrong as between the parties to a private contract, which would not be so without it.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Nov. 30 and 31, and Dec. 2, 1878.

(Before BRAMWELL, BRETT, and COTTON, L.JJ.)

Local board—Streets—Vesting—Grazing of roads in board's district—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) s. 149.

The effect of the word "vest" in sect. 149 of the Public Health Act 1875 is to give to an urban authority, with respect to the streets mentioned in the section, the property in so much of the soil and surface as is necessary for all the purposes applicable to a street.

An urban authority, in 1876, let to plaintiff the grazing of a highway and of a private road within their district. Plaintiff accordingly turned in his cattle, and defendant, having subsequently pastured his cattle on the highway and private road, plaintiff claimed damages against him for trespass.

Held (affirming the decision of the Q.B. Division, Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J.), (1) That sect. 149 gave the urban authority sufficient property in the highway to enable them to let the grazing, and therefore that plaintiff could maintain his action. (2) That the urban authority, having no power to let the grazing of the private road, plaintiff had not sufficient possession to enable him to maintain his action in respect of that road.

THESE were cross appeals from a judgment of the Q.B. Division, on a special case.

The following are the facts, so far as they are material for the purposes of this report, set out in the special case:—

In the year 1766 an Act was passed for dividing, inclosing, and draining certain lands, grounds, and common pastures in the parish of Cottingham, in the East Riding of the county of York.

The commissioners appointed by or under the said Act made their award on the 24th Aug. 1771, and thereby set out and appointed certain public and private roads within the said parish (including Endyke and Cold Harbour-lanes hereinafter mentioned). Endyke-lane was set out by the said award as a private road in the following terms:

We do order, direct, determine, and award that there shall at all times for ever hereafter be a private way or road, as and where the same is staked, ditched, or bounded out, of the breadth of thirty feet, for the use of the said proprietors whose allotments adjoin upon the same, their tenants, lessees, heirs, and assigns, their servants, horses, cattle, carts, and carriages only, leading from the turnpike road of the town of Kingston-upon-Hull and Beverley westward into and over the south side of lands in the said New Ings herein severally awarded the said Francis Riley and Samuel Knipe to and for them awarded the said Francis Whiting, &c.

(a) Reported by W. AFFLETON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Since the year 1818 Endyke-lane had been a public road, and as such it has since that date been repaired by the parish. Cold Harbour-lane, which in the said award was described as the North Carr-road, was set out thereby as a private road in the following terms :

And we do order, direct, determine, and award that there shall at all times for ever hereafter be a private way or road, as and where the same is now staked, ditched, or bounded out, of the breadth of forty feet, for the use of the several owners of lands and grounds in Cottingham aforesaid, their tenants, lessees, heirs, and assigns, and their servants, horses, carts, and carriages only, and to be called the North Carr-road, leading to and from the said Dunswell-road eastward into and over lands in the said Inn-common and North Carr, to and from the turnpike road leading from the said town of Kingston-upon-Hull to Beverley aforesaid.

Cold Harbour-lane has continued since the date of the said award, and still is, a private road.

Cottingham, whether strictly the area of a parish or a township, is and always has been for the purpose of maintaining its highways a distinct and separate area, which is commonly and in this case hereinafter called the parish of Cottingham.

On the 19th April 1876 the local board entered into an agreement in writing with the plaintiff, under which the local board agree to let to the plaintiff the right of herbage or pasturage for cattle, except sheep, in and about the sides of the roads hereinafter mentioned, from the day of the date of the said agreement, until the 23rd Nov. then next at the rent of 8*l.* 10*s.* Such roads were described as follows in the schedule to the said agreement: "From Gibson's to Railway Gate, north Moor-lane, 5*l.*; Cold Harbour and Middle Dykey to railway gates, 2*l.* 5*s.*; Little North Carr-lane, and Endyke-lane, 1*l.* 5*s.*"

The day after the execution of the said agreement the plaintiff commenced depasturing the herbage with his cattle in the roads that had been assigned to him under the said agreement, and thenceforth until the commencement of this action he regularly continued to do so.

On the 25th April 1876 three horses and eight head of other cattle, belonging to the defendant, were turned into Endyke-lane aforesaid, under the care of the defendant's servant, and grazed there upon the sides of the said road, and on the following day horses and other cattle of the defendant, to about the same number, were turned into Cold Harbour-lane aforesaid, under the care of the same servant, and grazed there upon the sides of the said roads.

The defendant knew that the said alleged right of the herbage in and about the sides of the said roads had been let by the said local board to the plaintiff, but refused to remove his cattle or to discontinue turning them out to graze upon the sides of the said roads.

No actual obstruction of the plaintiff's cattle was caused on either day on which the alleged trespasses took place by the acts referred to in the seventeenth paragraph.

It has been agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that, if the judgment of the court be for the plaintiff, the amount of the damage is to be 1*s.*

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

Costs of the trial to abide the event of the action.

The Q.B. Division gave judgment for the plaintiff as to the highway, Endyke-lane; for the defendant as to the private road, Cold Harbour-lane.

Each party appealed from this judgment.

The case in the court below is reported, and the special case fully set out, ante, p. 323; and 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 687.

By sect. 3 of the Public Health Act 1875 :

"Street" includes any highway (not being a turnpike-road) and any public bridge (not being a county bridge), and any road, lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage, whether a thoroughfare or not.

Sect. 144 :

Every urban authority shall within their district, exclusively of any other person, execute the office of and be surveyor of highways, and have, exercise, and be subject to all the powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities of surveyors of highways under the law for the time being in force, save so far as such powers, authorities, or duties are or may be inconsistent with the provisions of this Act; every urban authority shall also have, exercise, and be subject to all the powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities which by the Highway Act 1835, or any Act amending the same, are vested in and given to the inhabitants in vestry assembled of any parish within their district.

All ministerial acts required by any Act of Parliament to be done by or to the surveyor of highways may be done by or to the surveyor to the urban authority, or by or to such other person as they may appoint.

All streets being or which at any time become highways repairable by the inhabitants at large within any urban district, and the pavements, stones, and other materials thereof, and all buildings, implements, and other things provided for the purposes thereof, shall vest in and be under the control of the urban authority. The urban authority shall from time to time cause all such streets to be levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, altered, and repaired as occasion may require; they may from time to time cause the soil of any such street to be raised, lowered, or altered as they may think fit, and may place and keep in repair fences and posts for the safety of foot passengers.

Any person who, without the consent of the urban authority, wilfully displaces or takes up, or who injures the pavement, stones, materials, fences, or posts of, or the trees in, any such street shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and to a further penalty not exceeding five shillings for every square foot of pavement, stones, or other materials so displaced, taken up, or injured; he shall also be liable in the case of any injury to trees to pay to the local authority such amount of compensation as the court may award.

Cave, Q.C. and Cyril Dodd for the defendant.—Endyke-lane is a "street" within sect. 149 of the Public Health Act 1875, and vests in the board. The question is, what is the meaning of the expression "vest in?" It cannot be that the section vests the freehold in the soil and surface in the board so as to give them the cellars below the street. This construction is far too large. It is merely meant to give to the board the same right over the streets as existed for the benefit of the public before the Public Health Acts were passed; that is to say, they may deal with the streets, by lowering or altering them or otherwise, without making compensation to the owners of the soil. "Vest" may mean give the right of passage over, and, if so, the difficulty of assigning a meaning to it different from "be under the control of" is got over. It was never intended that the local board should have such a right of property in the street as would enable them to make a profit. The soil in the highway formed part of the common land awarded by the Inclosure Commissioners. The property in it therefore remains in the lord of the manor :

The surface may be vested in the board so as to make them liable for negligence if they do not repair it (White v. Hindley Local Board, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 46; L. Rep. 10 Q.B. 219; 44 L. J. 114, Q.B.); but it does not follow that the board acquires any beneficial interest in the soil. The plaintiff cannot maintain this action. He has no better right than the board had, and they had none to let the grass in Endyke-lane.

Wills, Q.C. and Wilberforce for plaintiff.—Under sect. 149 a street becomes vested in the urban authority so as to give them full powers of dealing with the soil, and enabling them to keep the roadway in good condition. "Vest" implies that the property in the soil passes to the board. It must mean something more than the words "be under the control of," which are also contained in the section. In White v. The Hindley Local Board (sup.) the point was not taken that the locus in quo became vested in the board under the Public Health Acts, so as to give the board a different character with respect to it than as surveyor of highways. The board have clearly a proprietary right in the trees under sect. 149. See also

By sect. 27 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), the Legislature have thought it necessary to limit the extent to which the soil of streets shall vest by providing that minerals are not to vest in the sanitary authority. As to the private road, Cold Harbour-lane, it is admitted that the board had no power to let the pasturage. But the plaintiff had sufficient possession of the grass to enable him to maintain his action. He had sufficient de facto possession by his cattle. Very slight possession is enough as against a mere wrong-doer. In Co. Litt. 4 b, Lord Coke says, "If a man hath 20 acres of land, and by deed granteth to another and his heirs vesturam terræ, and maketh livery of seisin . . . the land itself shall not pass, because he hath a particular right in the land; for thereby he shall not have the houses, timber trees, mines, and other real things, parcels of the inheritance, but he shall have the vesture of the land—that is, the corn, grass, under-wood, swepage, and the like, and he shall have an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The same law if a man grant herbagium terræ." See also Oave, Q.C. in reply.—As to Cold Harbour-lane, the plaintiff has had no actual or constructive possession. He has never had an actual exclusive possession, because the public have had a right of passing over all the locus in quo. The plaintiff is therefore a mere trespasser :

Jones v. Chapman, 2 Ex. 821;
Smith v. Lloyd, 9 Ex. 562.

As to Endyke-lane, the judgment of Willes, J., in Hinde v. Charlton (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 104; 36 L. J. 79, C. P.) shows that a section like this must be construed with reference to the whole object of the statute, and that "vest" need not necessarily pass the freehold. It is also a clear authority that where a body is intrusted with public duties, such expression as "vest" must be construed so as to give them no more property in the things passed than is necessary for the performance of their duties. BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of opinion that this judgment should be affirmed. With all respect to the framers of these Acts, I find it very difficult to put a meaning on the word "vest" in sect. 149. I have great misgivings as to what is the true meaning, but my inclination would be to attach to "vest" the meaning put upon it by Willes, J. in Hinde v. Charlton (ubi sup.), and to hold that a street, under sect. 149, vests in the local board, without their having any property in the soil or surface. The word "vest" may have two meanings; it may mean that the property in the street, usque ad cælum et usque ad medium filum, passes to the board. I cannot think this is the true meaning of the word as used in sect. 144. It is impossible to suppose that, by using the word "vest," it is intended to give the local board an absolute right to the surface, with all above and all below it. It would be an outrageous and needless thing to do so. Mr. Wills's argument was, that the general object and intent of the provisions of this Act were to be looked to, and, if pressed by particular words, the effect of which is to cause loss to individuals, you must suppose that the Legislature, in view of the importance of effecting the general objects of the Act, contemplated that that loss might be sustained. You must not be deterred from construing the Act beneficially for the public by considering the possible loss to individuals. That is a very forcible argument; but, looking steadily to the objects in view here, I could not make up my mind to say that the meaning of "vest" is to grant the freehold of the land to the local board with all the consequences that follow a grant of the freehold, and consequently the rights in the soil usque ad medium filum. I do not think the Act of last session (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77) bears upon the matter. All that the Legislature mean by sect. 27 was to declare that, whatever might be the proper construction of sects. 68 and 149 of the Act of 1875, they should not be construed as applying to mines and minerals. The monstrous inconvenience and injustice of holding that the word "vest" has the effect of passing the absolute freehold prevent me from putting that construction upon it—a construction, too, which I think a needless one. Then, what is the meaning of "vest?" I do not know that it is a term of art as applied here. It must have a statutory meaning. There is no expression in the Act such as "transferred" or "conveyed;" but it says the street shall "vest." I should like to hold that that means "shall vest quâ street," and that no right of soil

[CT. OF APP.]

COVERDALE v. CHARLTON.

vests; but I am afraid that is not a sensible construction. I do not see that it would add anything to the words "and shall be under the control," &c. I think by the word "vest" it is meant that the surface, and the street itself, so far as it is used as streets are used, shall vest in the board. The Act says that all streets vest, the pavements, stones, and other materials vest, and "all buildings, implements, and materials provided for the purposes thereof." Then it goes on to say in what manner the urban authority are to deal with the streets, and the soil and fences of them, and provides that any person who, without the consent of the urban authority, wilfully displaces or takes up or injures the pavement, stones, &c., "or the trees in any such street," shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*, and "he shall also be liable, in the case of any injury to trees, to pay to the local authority such amount of compensation as the court shall award." Now, what is the meaning of that? Does it mean that, if an oak was standing in a street at the time when that street became under the control of the local board, they would become entitled to that tree? If it does mean that, it goes a long way to show that the local board have the property in the street they now claim. If it does not apply to trees already in existence, but only to the ones the board themselves may plant, even then it goes to show that they must have some property in the soil, or in the produce of it, of the street. I cannot help thinking that sect. 57 of the Act is adverse to the opposite contention, because there it is evidently contemplated that when the local authority had not the control of a street, it was necessary to give them special power to break open the street in order to lay down pipes, &c., showing by implication that in the case of streets which are highways repairable by the inhabitants at large, they needed no such special power. It seems to show that the surface of such a street as I have last referred to vests in the local board for the purpose of doing that which is necessary for it as a street, and also for doing such things as are necessary and usually done underneath a street. I am much fortified in this view by the strong expression of opinion of Willes, J. in Hinde v. Charlton (sup.). I think, therefore, the local board had a right to the herbage which was let to the plaintiff, and that the defendant, having incautiously taken part of it, is liable. As to the other part of the claim, I concur in the judgment of the court below that the plaintiff is unable to make out his case. It was attempted to be made out that he had a de facto possession as to the private road; but it is difficult to see how there could be any de facto possession unless the parts used were so actually in possession that the right claimed by the plaintiff would be an interference with the actual enjoyment of the lane that was going on. If there was an inclosed field, and a man turned his cattle into it and locked the gate, he might well claim a de facto possession of the field; but if he turned them on to an open common, to my mind, no de facto possession could be set up. In the present case I think there could be no de facto possession of anything beyond the spots on which his flock were actually grazing. It is said that by discontinuance of possession the lord of the manor has lost his title, and consequently possession was in the first occupant of the lane; that the actual occupants for the time being were the board of health, and that they having licensed the plaintiff he was in by right. The answer is, that no jury ought to hold, under the circumstances, that there had been such a discontinuance of possession by the person in whom the true title to the soil was, as to entitle the first occupant to claim it. I think, therefore, on that ground also the plaintiff's claim ought to be disallowed, and the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

BRETT, L.J.—The plaintiff's action is not necessarily one of trespass; it is one in which he states certain facts, and seeks for a remedy. There was a dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the plaintiff says that he is entitled to a remedy in respect of acts done by the defendant in two separate lanes. But the plaintiff, although he is not bound to say, "I claim against you as a trespasser," yet does in argument really state that he would be entitled to maintain an action of trespass with regard to both lanes. He says so with regard to the first lane, because he says the property in the soil was in the local board, and they let the land to him. As to the second, he says that he had possession of that lane, and that the defendant was a wrongdoer. The questions which arise in the case are: (1) Had the plaintiff a right to the herbage of the first lane? (2) Was he in possession of the second lane, so that he could maintain his action against the defendant, who was a mere wrongdoer? As to the first lane, the plaintiff's right depends entirely upon the right of the local board, and upon whether they had a right to make any arrangement with him as to the grass. It does not depend upon the nature of the right, whether a necessary or some other right. Now whether the board could or could not give him the right he claims, depends entirely upon sect. 149 of the Act of 1875. It is admitted that as to the first lane it is a "street" within the meaning of that section; therefore the question comes to be, what right does sect. 149 give to the local board in a street as defined by that section? That must depend upon the words of the section. Now it is a rule of construction that you must, if you can, give a meaning to every part of the section you are construing. You must give all the words their ordinary legal signification, unless there is something in the context to vary that signification. The words here are, "all streets shall vest in;" but inasmuch as the words follow, "and be under the control of," you must give a meaning to the words "vest in" different to the words "under the control of." The ordinary legal signification of "vest in" is to give the property in. It is argued that sect. 57 of the Act of 1875 shows that "vest" means the same thing as "be under the control of," and that where the local board had not the control of streets it was necessary to give them special power to break up the surface for the purpose of laying pipes. If that contention be true, it is in effect to strike out the word "vest" from sect. 149 altogether. It is attempted to give a meaning to the words "vest in" by saying that they are words of mere inference, and may be treated as surplusage; but it would be entirely contrary to the rule of construction I have mentioned to say that. Therefore I think that sect. 57 has no effect whatever, and we are left then to the construction of sect. 149 standing alone. In my opinion, a meaning cannot be given to the words "vest in"

in addition to that given to the words "shall be under the control of," except by construing "vest in" as passing the property in. Then it is said you give more than it can possibly be supposed the Legislature intended to give to local authorities; that is to say, that construction would give them the cellars under the streets and the mines under the land. But it seems to me that, after "vest" has been decided to give the property in, the real question is, in what does it give the property? That depends upon the words describing the subject-matter to which the section refers. Here the subject-matter is a "street," not land. The case of Hinde v. Charlton (sup.), with regard to the pew, is a good guide on this point. There the gift of the pew was held not to vest the property in the land on which it was. You must look not only to the words which vest, but to those describing the property given. Here it seems to me "vest" means "vest" the property in a street, so far as it is used as a street. It does not include the houses on each side. It must mean that which consists of the roadway, and the footpath on each side—that part between the houses which is used as the roadway of the street; that is to say, the whole of the surface between the houses. But it is then said, that would not give enough, because it would leave you with respect to matters which must be dealt with in a street without the power of dealing with them. But taking the word "street," as used in an Act of Parliament like this, it means, I think, the depth below the surface, but not the whole depth. It means the whole surface, and so much in depth as may not unfairly be used for the purposes of the local board with respect to the street. That would, therefore, enable them to lay down sewers, gas pipes, and water pipes to such a depth as in a street is used for the purpose of laying them down. It would, therefore, not enable them to go down to the depth of mines, as a street is never used for such a purpose. Neither would it enable them to deal with the houses on each side. "Vest," therefore, in my opinion, gives the local authority the property in the street—the surface and such a depth as may be fairly used for the purposes of the street, and for these purposes the absolute property is given. I agree with Mr. Wills's argument that the Legislature has so far taken away the rights of the adjacent owners, and given them to the local board. They have the ordinary rights of property with respect to what is given to them. If that is so, they were entitled, by reason of the right which they had, to give some right to the plaintiff here. They assumed by agreement to let to him the right of herbage and pasturage. It is not necessary, as to the first lane, to say that they gave him possession of it; but he had a right under his agreement to feed his cattle on that lane, and on that right the defendant has encroached. I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled, as to that lane, to bring the action he has now brought. As to the private lane it is admitted that the local board has no right at all. The plaintiff says he had possession, and the defendant was a wrongdoer; but we must inquire what sort of possession the plaintiff was using. The only actual de facto possession he had was that his cattle were feeding there. He admittedly had no other possession than by the mouths of his cattle. It might be different if the local board had assumed to let him the lane as the owners, although they had no right to do it, and if he attempted to set up a right by agreement to the exclusive possession of it; but, notwithstanding their agreement with him, they still meant the public to pass over it and tread down the grass. All they intended to give him was this: they took a sum of money for allowing his cattle to feed upon the lane. That agreement is no more than for a power of agistering which they could have granted if they had been the owners. I do not think there was any agreement under which it could be said that the plaintiff had any possession of the land either by himself or by his cattle, and therefore I do think that he had not any possession at all, and cannot maintain his action. In my opinion the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division was right, and must be affirmed.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of opinion that both appeals fail. As to the first lane, it is admitted to be a street within sect. 149 of the Public Health Act 1875, and the question is whether or not the local board had any right to the grass; that is to say, any property in the surface of the street. It was said for the defendant that, where public bodies, like local boards, are given by statute a public duty to fulfil, you must construe such words as "vest" not according to their natural meaning, which would have the effect of passing the entire property in the soil and surface, but you must construe them to give so much only as is necessary for the fulfilment of the duty. Hinde v. Charlton (sup.) and the judgment of Willes, J. were relied on to show this. In my mind that judgment does not support the defendant's contention. In construing every Act of Parliament you have to look at the particular words used, and, except so far as it may supply a principle of construction, I do not think Hinde v. Charlton applies to the present case. The question there was as to what right to a pew the claimant obtained under an Act which provided that the pews in a church should be "vested in" the purchaser, and the court held that the freehold of the pew did not vest, but only the right to use it during divine service. But they only decided what was the true construction of the word "vest" in the particular Act. Willes, J., in his judgment, says that there are a "whole series of authorities in which language large enough to convey a right to land, to canal and railway companies, and to trustees for the benefit of the public who require only the control of it, has been held to be satisfied without giving an interest in the soil and freehold to the grantees, but by giving a control only to the extent necessary for exercising the functions which it was intended to assist them in the discharge of." He then proceeds to refer to Stracey v. Nelson (12 M. & W. 535) as one of the strongest of those authorities; but when that case is looked at it does not bear out the general proposition which Willes, J. lays down. To my mind it does not assist us in construing this Act, because the learned judges who decided it do not affect to construe the word "vest," but only say that it applied to a particular kind of property mentioned in the Act. That case, therefore, lays down no such rule of construction as the defendant contends for. There is the further remark, that in Hinde v. Charlton Willes, J. had not to meet the same difficulty we have here, because here the Act says not only that the street shall "vest in," but also be "under the control" of the urban authority. It is a true principle of construction that when separate and distinct words are used in an Act, you cannot construe one part of a section or sentence so as to render the other part inoperative. Now, had the word "vest" any admitted meaning before this Act was passed? In an Act which is pari materia—the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845—you find in sect. 81 that conveyances "shall be effectual to vest the lands thereby conveyed in the promoters of the undertaking." And again in sect. 100 there is a similar proviso. Then in the Trustee Act 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), enabling the Court of Chancery to make orders for the transfer of property to new trustees, sect. 3 provides that the Lord Chancellor may make an order that lands belonging to lunatics be "vested in" certain persons. Another class of Act is the Bankruptcy Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 31), s. 17, where it is enacted that upon the appointment of a trustee the property of the bankrupt shall "vest in" such trustee. There is therefore an established sort of statutory meaning attached to the word "vest." Looking at the Act in question in this case, we find in sect. 12 that all property, real or personal, belonging to the council of a borough at the passing of the Act "shall continue vested, or vest in, such council," &c. Then it is remarkable that sect. 13 contains almost the same words as regards sewers as sect. 149 does with respect to streets. It says that sewers "shall be vested in and be under the control of" the local board. It is impossible, I think, that the Legislature used words in sect. 13 in a different meaning to the same words in sect. 12. In my opinion the meaning is, that whatever vests in the board must become the property of the board. The board therefore must have some property in the surface and soil of the street, and, agreeing generally as I do with Brett, L.J., I think that the street did vest in the board, and some property in the soil and surface of it became vested in them for the purposes of a street. In regard to Cold Harbour-lane, it is admitted that the local board had no property in the soil; but it is said that the plaintiff had such possession as enabled him to maintain his action of trespass against the defendant under the old procedure, and therefore that he can maintain it now. Now, what did he do with respect to Cold Harbour-lane? He maintained that he had asserted his right under a lease from the board, which was in the nature of a grant to him of herbageum terre; that he had taken possession of one part of the lane, and by what he had done had taken possession of the whole. That argument seems to depend upon a fallacious perception of what Lord Coke really said. He referred to a case where there was a grant of an absolute and exclusive right for all purposes of whatever was previously on the land, and then Lord Coke says the grantee shall have an action quare clausum fregit against a trespasser. But here the case is entirely different. The public have a perfect right of walking over the grass, and the plaintiff could not complain of an encroachment. What he had got was merely this—only a very limited right of his cattle eating certain parts of the grass. It was a mere enjoyment, subject to the rights of the public. This was distinctly not a possession of the soil so as to entitle him to maintain his action, and he cannot rely upon any right independent of mere enjoyment, and therefore, in my opinion, cannot maintain his action against the defendant for injury to the grass.

Judgment affirmed.

Local board—Contracts—Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), s. 85, and 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 174.

Defendants, an urban authority, through their surveyor, verbally ordered plans for offices from plaintiff, an architect. Plaintiff made the plans, which were at first approved by defendants, but afterwards abandoned as involving too much expense. New offices were necessary for defendants, and the plaintiff's plans were necessary for the offices for which he had designed them, and the plans were worth 94l.

Sect. 174 of the Public Health Act 1875 enacts that "every contract made by an urban authority, whereof the value or amount exceeds 50l. shall be in writing, and sealed with the common seal of such authority."

Held (affirming the decision of Lindley, J.), that plaintiff was not entitled to recover for his work and labour in making the plans, as, even if plaintiff had executed the consideration on his part, sect. 174 was not directory merely, but obligatory, so as to render all contracts exceeding in value 50l. unenforceable, unless the requirements of the section were complied with.

APPEAL from a decision of Lindley, J., on further consideration, after a trial with a jury at Westminster, on March 13 and 14, 1878.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, an architect, to recover for work and labour done in preparing plans and drawings for the erection of offices for the defendants, the Wimbledon Local Board, in accordance with instructions given to the plaintiff by the defendants' surveyor acting under their authority. The plans, having been made by the plaintiff, were submitted to the defendants, and approved by them, and advertisements for tenders for carrying out the building of offices according to the plans were published, but the amount of the tenders being too high none were accepted. Ultimately offices upon an extensive scale were built from plans made by another architect.

The jury found that the board authorised their surveyor to employ the plaintiff to prepare the plans, and ratified his act in procuring them; that new offices were necessary for the board; that the plaintiff's plans were necessary for the erection of the offices for which they were designed, and they assessed the plaintiff's damages at 94l.

Lindley, J., on April 6, gave judgment for defendants. The plaintiff appealed. The case in the court below is fully reported ante, p. 349; and 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 35.

The Act in force when the plans were ordered was the Public Health Act 1848. Before they were finished the Public Health Act 1875, repealing the Act of 1848, came into force. The 85th section, however, of the Act of 1848 was substantially re-enacted by sects. 173, 174 of the Act of 1875, except that 50*l.* was substituted for 10*l.* as the limit within which the contracts of urban authorities need not be under seal.

By sect. 173 of the Public Health Act 1875,

Any local authority may enter into any contract necessary for carrying this Act into execution.

Sect. 174:

With respect to contracts made by an urban authority under this Act, the following regulations shall be observed:

(1.) Every contract made by an urban authority whereof the value or amount exceeds 50*l.* shall be in writing, and sealed with the common seal of such authority.

(2.) Every such contract shall specify the work, materials, matters or things to be furnished, had, or done, the price to be paid, and the time or times within which the contract is to be performed, and shall specify some pecuniary penalty to be paid in case the terms of the contract are not duly performed.

(3.) Before contracting for the execution of any works under the provisions of the Act, an urban authority shall obtain from their surveyor an estimate in writing, as well of the probable expense of executing the work in a substantial manner, as of the annual expense of repairing the same; also a report as to the most advantageous mode of constructing, that is to say, whether by contracting only for the execution of the work, or for executing and also maintaining the same in repair during a term of years, or otherwise.

(4.) Before any contract of the value or amount of 100*l.* or upwards is entered into by an urban authority, ten days' public notice at the least shall be given, expressing the nature and purpose thereof, and inviting tenders for the execution of the same; and such authority shall require and take sufficient security for the due performance of the same.

(5.) Every contract entered into by an urban authority in conformity with the provisions of this section, and duly executed by the parties thereto, shall be binding on the authority by whom the same is executed, and their successors and all other parties thereto, and their executors, administrators, successors, and assigns, to all intents and purposes.

By sect. 197,

Every urban authority shall from time to time provide and maintain such offices as may be necessary for transacting their business, or that of their officers and servants under this Act.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment (post).

Wilson v. West Hartlepool Railway Company, 2 De J. & S. 475.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of opinion that Mr. Justice Lindley was right in his decision, and that this judgment should be affirmed. First, I think that sect. 173 of the Act of 1875 is applicable to this case, and is not limited, as Mr. Patchett contended, to the cases particularly enumerated in the previous part of the Act. I see no reason for limiting the section, which is general in its terms and plain. In the next place, I think that section 174 is not directory, but obligatory. It is not prohibitory merely, so that the making of a contract otherwise is an offence, but mandatory that the contract shall be made in that particular way. It is an injunction relating to the conduct of both parties in making the contract. I do not mean to say that it makes any partial act on the part of the contractors necessary, but the evidence of their obligation upon contracts above 50*l.* must be in writing, sealed with the seal of the corporation. Before the statute the common law said that the contracts of corporations must be under seal, with an exception as to small contracts necessary for the daily carrying out of the work. The section is important in this view, that under the common law rule it might be difficult to fix the limit, say 5*l.*, 10*l.* or 20*l.*, at which the contract ceased to be a small one within the rule. The Legislature, therefore, has now fixed the sum at 50*l.* It is clear to me that this contract was purely executory (having regard to the order given for the plans), and that no action could be brought upon it, unless the requirements of the statute were complied with. It is said, on the other hand, that it was an executed contract of which the corporation have received the benefit. I will deal with that presently. First, the equitable doctrine of part performance of contracts relating to land was relied upon. I think that doctrine is not applicable to the present case. I believe the doctrine to be that which is mentioned by the Master of the Rolls in his judgment in Ungley v. Ungley (sup.). He says: "The law is well established, that if an intended purchaser is let into possession in pursuance of a parol contract, that is sufficient to prevent the Statute of Frauds being set up as a bar to the proof of the parol contract. The reason is, that possession by a stranger is evidence that there was some contract, and is such cogent evidence as to compel the court to admit evidence of the terms of the contract in order that justice may be done between the parties." Now, I think the reason of that rule is inapplicable to a case like the present. I venture to say that, if the fusion of law and equity had not taken place, a court of equity would not apply the doctrine to a case like this. It is then said that at common law the plaintiff is entitled to recover because the defendants have had the benefit of the contract. That doctrine possibly exists to some extent—I am not sure to what extent. I am not sure it would be found to exist at all if the sum in dispute was a very large one; but the doctrine is said to be, that where a man enters into a contract, not under seal, with a corporation, of which they have got the benefit, he is entitled to recover. It is said to be limited to cases where the benefit has been entirely in hand, and where the work performed has been so necessary, under the circumstances, that the corporation would not have done its duty if the order had not been given. That doctrine does not apply here, for two reasons. The defendants have not had the benefit of the work in that sense. There is no doubt the order for the plans was given, and, so far as the work went, ratified and acted

HUNT v. THE WIMBLEDON LOCAL BOARD.

upon, by the defendants; but there the thing stopped. If the tenders had been accepted there would have been a further benefit from the plans to the corporation, they would have derived a benefit from them in respect of having the buildings erected according to them; but that is different from the case cited where they had the coals and burned them. Here they tried to apply the plans to the purpose for which they were ordered, but found they were unable to do so. There is also the further distinction that here the plans were not necessary things, as in the cases of the things ordered in Clarke v. The Cuckfield Union (sup.) and Nicholson v. The Bradfield Union (sup.), where it was the duty of the corporation to give orders for them. The corporation in this case could have done without the plans; they could have waited and gone on without new offices. In Clarke v. The Cuckfield Union (sup.), Wightman, J.'s judgment is a very long one, and shows that he entertained very great doubt; but after all in that case the bill only came to 14l. 16s., and it may be doubted whether the contract did not come within the common law rule as to small contracts. The next case was Nicholson v. The Bradfield Union (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 620; 35 L. J. 176, Q. B.), and there the amount was only 26l., and I am not sure that even there the same rule did not apply. That was the case in which coals were ordered and used. Blackburn, J., in his judgment, assumes there was an obligation on the part of the corporation, and he follows the case of Clarke v. The Cuckfield Union (sup.), which he says is not distinguishable. Then he adds, "We are aware that many high authorities have questioned the soundness of that decision, and, as pointed out in the judgment of that case, there are prior decisions in the Court of Exchequer which it is difficult to reconcile with it. We think, however, that as far as it extends to such a case as the present, at least the case was rightly decided. There may be cases in which the circumstances may be different from those in Clarke v. The Cuckfield Union (sup.) and the present case, and which would still be governed by the principles laid down in the decisions in the Exchequer—those we leave to be decided when they arise; but so far as those prior decisions are inconsistent with Clarke v. The Cuckfield Union, we prefer to follow the authority of Clarke v. The Cuckfield Union, which we think is founded on justice and convenience." One word as to the accountant's case (Haigh v. The Brierly Union, sup.): It seems to me that Erle, J. does not put the matter upon the mere ground that the work was actually done; he seems to consider that the retainer to do it would have been an engagement binding upon the corporation. Blackburn, J., in Nicholson v. The Bradfield Union, said that "justice and convenience" required that the defendants should be ordered to pay where the contract is executed; but it is by no means clear that he would have said so in a case like the present. It is by no means clear to my mind that people who ought to know the requirements of the law, and that they are dealing with a body exercising authority only on behalf of the ratepayers, should not take the consequences of dispensing with what is required by a provision for the protection of the ratepayers. In the present case, if there had been a little more solemnity in making the contract, the plaintiff's attention might have been called more particularly to the kind of plans required, and he might have prepared less expensive plans, such as the board could use. In my opinion the importance of preserving the general principle has been too much lost sight of in construing statutes such as the one in question and the Statute of Frauds. The latter Act has been frittered away and made unintelligible from a desire to do justice in particular cases.

BRETT, L.J.—I am of opinion that, even if sect. 174 had not been passed, the plaintiff could not have recovered, on the ground that the defendants are a corporation, and that the contract was not made under seal. I take the rule of the common law to be this—that where the defendants are a corporation, and the contract sued upon is not under seal, the defendants are not liable. This case comes within that general rule, and is not within any recognised exception; nor is it within the exception of the doctrine of equitable part performance, applied by the Court of Chancery to the Statute of Frauds. That doctrine is equally applicable, whether the defendants be a corporation or an individual; it seems to me founded upon the view that the Statute of Frauds only deals with the matter of evidence, and not with the validity of the contract. The Statute of Frauds applies where the contract is a good one, only it says that no evidence shall be given of the contract in certain events. The Court of Chancery have held that under certain circumstances they will allow a contract to be put in evidence, although the terms of the statute have not been complied with; but that doctrine does not apply where by a rule of law the contract is not binding at all. That, in my opinion, is the case here. I also think this case is not within the common law exception suggested. There is, I think, by authority, a recognised common law exception in such cases; where the contract is made by the corporation and not under seal, yet, if it be in the nature of a daily small transaction which must of necessity take place, and with regard to which it would be obviously impossible or inconvenient that it should be under seal, then the courts of common law have declared that the general rule shall not prevail. I think the making of these plans was not part of the daily business of the corporation, nor a necessary part of their business, nor a small contract, and was therefore in no respect within the exception. Another exception is suggested. It is said that a rule of law exists that where orders are given by a corporation, and the person to whom they are given accepts and fulfils them to the best of his ability, and the corporation, or the persons on whose behalf they are acting, accept and enjoy the full benefit, the corporation is liable although the contract is not under seal. I doubt very much whether there is any such exception or rule known to the courts of equity or common law. I doubt whether any such rule has ever been recognised by any authority in a court of justice. But it is unnecessary to consider that matter, because I think that, taking this order to have been given on behalf of persons who may be called cestuis que trust, this case does not come within the rule, if it exists at all. This is not like the case of a company where the directors may give the order, and those on whose behalf it has been given may accept or reject the contract, and they do accept it. If that was the case here the doctrine contended for might apply. But here it is only the corporation acting for the inhabitants of a borough—those inhabitants cannot have power either to accept or reject the engagements which their board enter into. They are not like the shareholders of a railway company. If a contract is made it is without their option, for they have no option. To such a corporation the doctrine is not applicable at all. If it was applicable I think the corporation did not take the whole benefit of the work done by the plaintiff. That work was the making of plans ordered by the corporation; he makes the plans, and he has then done all the work which upon the contract (I will assume) he was bound to do; but the only real benefit to the corporation is that the offices should be built according to the plans. Here the board accepted the work, and used the plans in the sense that they gave them out in order to receive tenders upon them; but that is not a beneficial user by the board. Although, therefore, they accepted and partially used the plans, in my opinion, they obtained no real benefit from the contract. The result is that, even if the doctrine exists, and although the board were to be benefited by the contract, they have not actually received any benefit from it. I am therefore strongly of opinion that, even without the statute, the plaintiff could not have recovered, because this contract is within the general rule, and not within any recognised common law exception to that rule. I further think the statute is conclusive upon the subject, and I think so upon the view suggested by Mr. Marriott. The statute is both directory and mandatory; it really comes to this, that when the Act was passed the Legislature knew of the inconvenience arising from requiring that small contracts necessary for the daily carrying on of the corporation work should be under seal. They meant to get rid of the question with respect to these small contracts, and to say that all contracts which the board are properly authorised to make, if under 50*l.*, shall be brought within the exception; if above, shall in all cases be within the general rule. As to the accountant's case, it is not necessary to say whether it comes within the law applicable to the present case. But I think Crompton, J. assented to the judgment upon the assumption that the contract of the accountant was to perform work from day to day. The contract might have been fulfilled in one way or the other. It might therefore be considered a daily employment to a small amount, and Crompton, J. thought it came within the recognised exception. He did not state any new principle, but only brought the facts of that case within an existing rule of law. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the judgment of Lindley, J. was right. A common law rule exists that corporations are not bound by contracts entered into by them, unless made under their seal. There are exceptions suggested to this rule. For instance, contracts made in the course of carrying on the ordinary daily business of the corporation, and involving small sums, need not be under seal. That exception cannot apply to this case. But is there an exception also showing that a corporation is liable where goods having been supplied, or work done under a contract not under seal, the corporation have had the entire benefit? Now I doubt whether a corporation like this can be held liable upon any such grounds, because the corporate body was not the persons who got the benefit of the contract, but the ratepayers for whom the corporation were trustees. The corporation as such cannot derive any benefit from their contracts. If the corporation could be bound, in my opinion there has not been such a beneficial user of the plans as to bring the case within the assumed exception to the statute. No doubt there was a certain user of the plans, but not a beneficial one. The matter went no further than using the plans for the purpose of obtaining tenders for the contemplated buildings. They were therefore not used for the more important purpose of erecting the offices. It is argued that such a contract is not within sect. 174 of the statute, because that section only applies to contracts made for the purposes of the Act, and the building of offices is not one of those purposes; but I think that sect. 197, which says that the local board shall provide and maintain such offices as may be necessary for transacting their business, disposes of that objection. If the board provide any offices at all, it must be for the purpose of carrying the Act into execution. I think it is plain, therefore, that this is such a contract as is within the purview of sect. 173. As to sub-sect. 1 of sect. 174, that, in my opinion, must be considered as mandatory, that is to say, as preventing any contract under the Act being entered into except under the seal of the corporation. The Act provides in a particular way for the making of small contracts; its meaning is to say, "as to all contracts exceeding 50*l.* you shall not bind the rates except you enter into a contract under seal." As to the equity doctrine of part performance, which has been relied on, the cases of Ungley v. Ungley (sup.) and Wilson v. The West Hartlepool Railway Company (sup.) have been principally referred to. In former days the Court of Chancery would not have entertained a suit by the plaintiff to enforce a contract like the present. Ungley v. Ungley (sup.) was simply a case of part performance taking the case out of the Statute of Frauds. It was a contract relating to a house, entered into by a father at his daughter's marriage, and if the Statute of Frauds applied no action could be enforced, because there was no agreement in writing; but possession having been given, the Court of Equity said that the part performance of the contract enabled parol evidence of the contract to be given, acting upon the principle that where there exists a valid binding and enforceable contract, but the Statute of Frauds says that no action shall be brought upon it unless it is evidenced in a particular way, then, if the Court of Chancery finds an overt act by the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced, such as possession, which is referable to the contract, parol evidence is allowed to ascertain what the original terms of the contract really are. This is the class of cases in which contracts are enforced in equity. Notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds, the equity is not administered on the ground of fraud, as is shown by the fact that in a suit for the specific performance of an agreement for the sale of land, payment of the price of the land is not such a part performance of the agreement as will take the case out of the statute. Then there is the case of Wilson v. The West

Hartlepool Railway Company (sup.). The judgment of Turner, L.J. was referred to, in which Knight Bruce, L.J. did not concur. I wish to speak with the greatest respect of the opinion of Turner, L.J., and I should have great hesitation in giving judgment against his opinion if he really decided on the point; but really, to a great extent, he was dealing with a difficulty under the Statute of Fraud, and dealing with a corporation governed by the Companies Clauses Act 1845, and to a very great extent his observations apply to the case of private individuals who had a contract for the sale of his land, but not a contract in writing. He deals with a corporation in the same way. They were a railway governed by the provisions of the Companies Clauses Act 1845, and that Act says that contracts which, if made by individuals, must be in writing, will bind the company if signed by two directors. The Act does not say that contracts shall be, but that they may be made in this way, and Turner, L.J. is applying the doctrine of part performance to cases where they have not been so made. There are other parts of his judgment which are not applicable to the case of a private individual, but there he refers to another class of action entertained by the Court of Chancery, independently of contract, namely, where the court says that if any individual having a title to land allows another person who believes that his own title is a good one, to enter into possession of and expend money upon the land, and "stands by" without interfering, a court of equity will not afterwards allow him to assert his title to the injury of him whom he has allowed so to enter into possession. This equity has no application to the present case.

Judgment affirmed.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS OF ENGLAND
v. ROWE. (a)

Limitation of actions—Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Corporations sole—Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), ss. 2, 29—3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, ss. 50, 57.

Sect. 50 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113 enacts, that all the estate and interest of the holder of a deanery in any lands, &c., shall be vested absolutely in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England for the purposes of the Act; and sect. 57 provides that they shall, for the purpose of obtaining possession of lands, &c., vested in them have all rights, powers, and remedies, which belonged to the holder of the deanery.

Held, that, with respect to lands vested in the commissioners under sect. 50, their right of entry or action for recovery was barred under sect. 2 of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, after twenty years had elapsed without their having taken possession, and that they were not entitled to enter or recover within sixty years, as the holder of the deanery might have done under sect. 29.

APPEAL from a decision of Mellor, J., on further consideration, giving judgment for the plaintiffs in an action for the recovery of land.

The facts of the case and the arguments are fully set out in the judgment of the Court of Appeal (post).

McIntyre, Q.C. and C. Higgins appeared for the plaintiffs.

Herschell, Q.C. and Morgan Lloyd, Q.C. for defendant.

Our adv. vult.

Dec. 10.—COTTON, L.J. delivered the following judgment of the court:—This was an appeal of the defendant from a judgment of Mellor, J., in favour of the plaintiffs after trial without a jury. The action was brought to recover two closes of land called 137 and 137A, which at the time when the action was brought were in the possession of the defendant. After the action was brought the defendant admitted the title of the plaintiffs to the parcel of land No. 137, but defended the action so far as it sought to recover 137A. In the year 1808 an Act was passed authorising the inclosure of certain common lands in the parish of St. Asaph. In the year 1827 the commissioner (acting in the execution of this Act) made his award whereby the parcel of land in question was awarded as follows: "To the personal representatives of Robert Morris, late of St. Asaph, aforesaid, innkeeper, deceased, assigned and allotted in right of the lease of the George and Dragon and other premises in St. Asaph, under the said Dean of St. Asaph." Though the award was not completed until 1827, it appears that the allotment was made in 1816. The George and Dragon, in respect of which the allotment was made, was the property of the Dean of St. Asaph, and until the year 1820 was held under a lease granted by the then Dean of St. Asaph to two persons named Lloyd, as trustees for the next of kin of Robert Morris. This lease was in the year 1820 sold to Hugh Jones, who in 1820 obtained on the surrender of the old lease a new lease. There were several leases of the George and Dragon made after 1820, but none of them included the allotment now in question. By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, the estates of all deans passed to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but under the 75th section of the Act this was to be subject to the right of every dean then living to the estates of his deanery during his life; and it appears from the statement of claim, that the Dean of St. Asaph, living at the time when the last-mentioned Act passed, died in April 1854, and that thereupon the plaintiffs became entitled in possession to the estates of the deanery. It is admitted that the freehold and reversion of the George and Dragon formed part of the estates of the deanery, and the plaintiffs in the year 1850 purchased the then subsisting lease of that inn, and acquired possession thereof. But they never obtained possession of the allotment now in question, and this action was not commenced until the year 1877. Two questions were raised on the part of the appellant, the defendant in this action: first, that the plaintiffs had not shown that the Dean of St. Asaph ever had any title to the allotment in question; and secondly, that if this was decided in the plaintiffs' favour, the Statute of Limitations was a bar to this action. Mellor, J. found as a fact, that the defendant had been in possession adverse to the title of the plaintiffs for twenty years, but not for sixty years; that is, the right of the plaintiffs to bring this action accrued more than twenty years, but not sixty years, before the issuing of the writ, and he decided the question of title and the question raised under the Statute of Limitations in favour of the plaintiffs. The question whether the Dean of St. Asaph ever had any title to this allotment is not free from difficulty. Neither the private Act, which has been already mentioned, nor the general Act in force when the award was made (41 Geo. 3, c. 109), contains any express enactment as to the title of a reversioner to an allotment made to his tenant in respect of his lease. We have not been furnished with a copy of the award, and there is no evidence as to the circumstances under which the allotments mentioned in the award were made to the dean, and, as we are of opinion that the Statute of Limitations affords a good defence to the action, even assuming that under the award the reversion of the allotment made in respect of the Gorge and Dragon vested in the dean, we think it better not to give any opinion on this question. As regards the defence of the Statute of Limitation, the plaintiffs contend that Pears, from whom the defendant bought in 1863, had been in possession of the allotment in question as tenant of the dean. If this point was raised at the trial, Mellor, J. found as a fact against the plaintiffs, and we are of opinion that there is no ground for disturbing his finding, if any, on this point, and further, that the evidence shows that the plaintiffs' contention in this respect is not well founded. In our opinion the allotment referred to in the deed relied on by them is that described in the statement of claim as 187, in respect of which no question now arises. But then it is urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that the Dean of St. Asaph would, under sect. 29 of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 (a), have been able to

(a) By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 1, the word "person" shall extend to a body politic, corporate, or collegiate.

Sect. 2. After the 1st day of December 1833 no person shall make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover any land or rent, but within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action, shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims, or, if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action, shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same.

Sect. 29. It shall be lawful for any archbishop, bishop, dean, prebendary, parson, vicar, master of hospital, or other spiritual eleemosynary corporation sole, to make any entry or distress, or bring such action or suit to recover any land or rent, within such period as herein-after is mentioned next after the time at which the right of such corporation sole, or of his predecessor, to make such entry or distress, or bring such action or suit, shall have first accrued; that is to say, the period during which two persons in succession shall have held the office or benefice in respect whereof such land or rent shall be claimed, and six years after a third person shall have been appointed thereto, if the times of such two incumbencies and such term of six years taken together shall amount to the full period of sixty years; and if such times taken together shall not amount to the full period of sixty years, then during such further number of years in addition to such six years as will, with the time of the holding of such two persons and such six years, make up the full period of sixty years; and after the said 31st day of December 1833 no such entry, distress, action, or suit, shall be made or brought at any time beyond the determination of such period.

The 3 & 4 Will. 4 is now partly repealed by the Real bring his action within sixty years from the time when his right to do so first accrued, and that the effect of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 57, was to give the plaintiffs the same time to bring their action. Mellor, J. found, and it is conceded by the defendant correctly, that the defendant had not been in possession for sixty years, and he decided as matter of law that under these circumstances the plaintiffs' action was not barred by the statute. We are unable to agree with this decision. The plaintiffs are within the 2nd section of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, unless they show any statutory enactment which exempts them from the statutory bar of twenty years. The plaintiffs contend that the combined effect of the 57th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, and of sect. 29 of the Act of Will. 4, gives them such exemption. It is urged that sect. 29 of the Act of Will. 4 gives deans and other corporations sole mentioned in it such a privilege in the nature of a right or power, as by sect. 57 of the Act of 3 & 4 Vict. vests in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. But this, in our opinion, cannot be maintained. The 29th section, it is true, begins with the words, "Provided always it shall be lawful," words which, if taken without reference to the rest of the statute in which they occur, look as if they conferred a right or power on the corporations therein mentioned. But the statute is not one which confers any right or power. On the contrary, it restricts the rights, powers, and remedies which, independently of its provisions, owners of property would possess, by prescribing a limited time within which they must enforce the rights and pursue the remedies which they, independently of the Act, possess. Although the 29th section seems to be enabling, yet, in truth, this and the 2nd section are statutory enactments, that deans and other ecclesiastical corporations sole shall not bring any action to recover land except within the period mentioned in sect. 29, and that all other persons shall not do so except within twenty years from the time when Property Limitation Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), which takes effect from and after Jan. 1, 1879.

By 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 77, s. 1, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of England were constituted a body corporate with power to sue and be sued, and to hold lands, &c.

By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 50: Subject to the provisions herein contained, all the estate and interest which the holder of any deanery or canonry not suspended by or under the provisions of this Act, and his successors, have and would have in any lands, tithes, and other hereditaments or endowments whatsoever annexed or belonging, or usually held or enjoyed with such deanery or canonry (except any right of patronage), or whereof the rents and profits have been usually taken and enjoyed by the holder of such deanery or canonry, as such holder, separately and in addition to his share of the corporate revenues of such chapter, shall, without any conveyance or assurance in the law other than the provisions of this Act, accrue to and be vested absolutely in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, for the purposes of this Act.

By sect. 57: The Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England shall, for the purpose of enforcing payment of all profits and emoluments to be paid to them, and of obtaining possession of all lands, tithes, or other hereditaments vested in or accruing to them as aforesaid, and of recovering the rents and profits thereof, have and enjoy all rights, powers, and remedies, at law and in equity, which belonged or belong, or would belong or have belonged, to the holder of the deanery, canonry, prebend, dignity, or office, or the rector of the rectory in respect of which such profits and emoluments, lands, tithes, and other hereditaments and endowments respectively are by or under the provisions of this Act to be paid or accrued to and be vested in the said commissioners.

the right first accrued. It was much pressed upon us that the consequence of holding that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are within sect. 2 of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, would be that at the time of the passing of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners might have no power to recover property belonging to the deanery, for which the then dean would have forty years to sue, and that it could not have been intended that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should thus lose property which the dean could have recovered. It is probable that the attention of Parliament was never directed to this point, and that there was no intention either way. But the supposed inconvenience is much lessened by the fact that, during the life of a dean living at the time when the Act of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113 was passed, the dean and not the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would be entitled to bring an action to recover property of the deanery, and during this period the Ecclesiastical Commissioners could make inquiries as to the property of the deanery, and might arrange with the dean to recover any property in those cases where, though an action by them would be statute barred, the dean could still bring an action. In our opinion the decision on this point in favour of the plaintiffs would lead to this result, that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners could always bring an action to recover land vested in them under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 50, even that of which they had at one time had possession, at any time within sixty years from the time when the right to do so first accrued, and that they would not be barred from bringing an action to recover land acquired by them under the last-mentioned Act till the lapse of the period mentioned in sect. 29 of the Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, while they would be barred by the lapse of twenty years from bringing an action to recover other estates derived from persons not mentioned in sect. 29. These are inconveniences at least as startling as that suggested by the plaintiffs as the result of a decision that twenty years is a bar. But the question is not one of convenience or inconvenience. It is whether there is sufficient to prevent an action by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners being barred by the limitation contained in sect. 2 of the Act. We are of opinion that there is not, and that an action brought by them is barred not by the period given by sect. 29, but by that enacted in sect. 2.

CHAMPNEY v. DAVY. (a)

Charity—Will—Mortmain—43 Geo. 3, c. 108—Pur and impure personality—Construction—Invalid gift—Particular residue—General residue.

A testatrix bequeathed certain personal estate to her *mother for life, and, after her death, as to 2000*l., part thereof, to the vicar of M., to be applied by him "in or about restoring, altering, enlarging and improving the church, parsonage house, and school." The residue thereof (the "particular residue") she bequeathed upon trusts in the will mentioned. All the residue of her personal estate (the "general residue") she bequeathed to her mother.

*Held, that, as to the church, parsonage house, and school the legacy was good, to the extent ascertained by inquiry to be required in restoring, altering, enlarging, and improving such of them as were already in mortmain; but bad as to the rest: that to the extent of 500*l.* for the purposes mentioned in 43 Geo. 3, c. 108, the legacy might and was to be taken out of impure personality; and the rest out of the pure personality to the extent lawful under the Mortmain Acts.*

Held also, that the abatement of the charity legacy went into the particular, and not into the general residue. The construction of a particular residuary gift is not affected by the presence or absence of a general residuary gift.

HANNAH ELIZABETH WEST made her will, dated the 13th Feb. 1872, whereby, among other things, she gave and bequeathed out of her personal estate, to the vicar for the time being of the parish of Muston, near Filby, in the county of York, the legacy or sum of 100*l.*, to be by him applied in such manner for the benefit of the Sunday-school attached to the church there as he in his absolute discretion should think proper. And she directed that the said legacy, with others, should be paid within six months of her decease.

She also gave and bequeathed to her trustees all her money, securities for money, moneys secured on mortgages, railway stocks and shares, moneys to be produced from the sale of any property at Scarborough or Peterborough to which she was entitled, all moneys to which she was or might be entitled under the will of her late grandfather, Thomas Phillips, and also all her moneys invested upon any securities in any way or manner howsoever, upon trusts for conversion and investment, and for payment of debts, legacies, and legacy duties, and to stand possessed of the residue (which is hereinafter referred to as "the particular residue") upon trust to pay the income to her mother, Hannah West, for life, and after her mother's death upon trust as to 2000*l.*, part thereof, to pay the same to the vicar for the time being of Muston aforesaid, to be by him applied and disposed of in such manner as he in his absolute discretion should think proper, in or about restoring, altering, enlarging, and improving the church, parsonage house, and school attached thereto, whose receipt for the said sum of 2000*l.* should be a sufficient discharge to her executors. And as to the residue thereof, upon the trusts declared of certain real estate thereafter devised. And the testatrix bequeathed to her mother all the rest, residue, and remainder of her personal estate and effects, which are hereinafter referred to as "the general residue."

Questions arose as to whether any part of the legacies of 2000*l.* and 100*l.* respectively failed, and whether any part of the legacy of 2000*l.* was payable out of the impure personal estate of the testatrix, under the provisions of 43 Geo. 3, c. 108. That Act provides :

That all and every person and persons having in his or their own right any estate or interest in possession, reversion, or contingency of or in any lands or tenements, or of any property of or in any goods or chattels, shall have full power, licence, and authority in his and their will and pleasure, by deed enrolled in such manner and within such time as is directed in England by the statute made in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of King Henry VIII., and in Ireland by the statute made in the tenth year of the reign of King Charles I. for enrolment of bargains and sales, or by his, her, or their last will or testament, being duly executed three calendar months at least before the death of such grantor or testator, including the days of the execution and death, to give and grant to and vest in any person or persons, or body politic or corporate, and their heirs and successors respectively, all such his, her, or their estate, interest, or property in such lands or tenements not exceeding five acres, or goods and chattels, or any part or parts thereof, not exceeding in value 500*l.* for or towards the erecting, rebuilding, repairing, purchasing, or providing any church or chapel where the liturgy and rites of the said United Church are or shall be used or observed, or any mansion house for the residence of any minister of the said United Church officiating or to officiate in any such church or chapel, or of any outbuildings, offices, churchyard, or glebe for the same respectively, and to or for those purposes applied according to the will of the said benefactor in and by such deed enrolled, or by such will or testament executed as aforesaid expressed, the consent and approbation of the ordinary being first obtained, and in default of such direction, limitation, or appointment, in such manner as shall be directed and appointed by the patron and ordinary, with the consent and approbation of the parson, vicar, or other incumbent.

Sect. 2 provides :

That no more than one such gift or devise shall be made by any one person, and that if any such gift or devise as aforesaid shall happen to exceed five acres in lands or tenements, or the value of 500*l.* in goods and chattels, any such gift or devise shall be good and valid to the extent aforesaid ; and it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor for the time being, on petition, to make order for reducing every such gift or devise to and within the said limits, and for allotting such specific five acres, and if occasion should require such specific goods and chattels as in his judgment shall be most convenient, and to make such further order touching the premises as to him shall appear just and reasonable.

Hastings, Q.C. and Nalder, for the plaintiffs, stated the facts.

Robinson, Q.C. and Sutton, for the vicar of Manton.—We rely upon Sinnett v. Herbert (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 7 ; L. Rep. 7 Ch. 232), which decides that where pure and impure personalty is given to trustees to erect or endow a church, they are entitled, under 43 Geo. 3, c. 108, to 500*l.* out of the impure personalty, in addition to the whole of the pure personalty.

Pearson, Q.C. and Speed for certain legatees, defendants.—According to Hoare v. Osborne (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 9 ; L. Rep. 1 Eq. 585) it would be impossible to ascertain what proportion of the gift was to be assigned to the illegal and what to the legal object. See also Wrigley's Trusts, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499.

There is nothing in 43 Geo. 3, c. 108, which enables you to bring money into mortmain for restoring and enlarging. Pruitt v. Harvey (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 209 ; L. Rep. 12 Eq. 544), before Wickens, V.C., decided that a charitable gift for building must refer to an existing site, or expressly exclude the application of the money in the purchase of land. Moreover, that was not the case of the application of impure but of pure personalty ; and the gift was held void except to the extent of 500*l.*, under 43 Geo. 3, c. 108. There are two grounds on which this gift might be impugned : either as a gift of pure personalty to bring land into mortmain, or as a gift of impure personalty. To be good you must have the possibility of bringing land into mortmain absolutely excluded. This gift would be void as to the pure personalty. But it is a gift of pure and impure personalty—there is no alternative ; therefore it is bad in its totality. See

Walmough's Trusts, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 88 ; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 272 ;

Incorporated Church Building Society v. Coles, 1 K. & J. 145 ; 5 De G. M. & G. 324.

Sinnett v. Herbert (ubi sup.) was a gift of general residue and not a particular legacy. If one object is void the whole gift fails.

Dickinson, Q.C. and Joyce, for the representative of Hannah West, in the same interest, referred to the 2nd section of the Act. Sinnett v. Herbert has no application. There is no lawful purpose except what was made lawful by 43 Geo. 3, c. 108 ; and the different purposes are here coupled so inseparably that all must be considered bad.

Robinson, Q.C. in reply.—Schools are within the Act of 43 Eliz. The legacy is good if the land is already in mortmain. See Theobald on Wills, p. 196.

HALL, V.C.—The questions which have been discussed on the present occasion with reference to the validity of this disposition of 2000*l.* are now to be disposed of by me. The first thing I shall deal with will be the distinction between the pure and impure personal estate with reference to this disposition. As regards the pure personal estate there is no possible objection to the disposition of that so far as there is pure personal estate to answer the gift ; except in so far as that pure personal estate has been directed, if at all, to be laid out for a purpose which is prohibited by the Statute of Mortmain. As to that, the only possible objection I can see to this disposition is, that the fund is to be applied "in or about restoring, altering, enlarging, and improving the church, parsonage house and school attached thereto." The only possible objection which seems to me to arise as to that is, that it may be the parsonage house and school are not in mortmain ; in which case, it would be practically giving money to be applied in or towards acquiring or purchasing a school not already in mortmain. As to those two, the parsonage house and school, therefore, if it be desired, I must have an inquiry to ascertain what the position of them is as regards their being in mortmain already. Subject to that, it seems to me to be plain that the disposition is perfectly good. [Dickinson, Q.C.—There must be a short affidavit by somebody stating either one way or the other.] I should think there is no doubt about the parsonage house, and very probably not much as to the other. [Pearson, Q.C.—I happen to have some little knowledge of the locality. I believe the parsonage house, is in mortmain, and that the school lands belong to C. Strickland.] To that extent the gift would be bad. I am now dealing with the pure personal estate ; and I say, to that extent (and it is an observation which applies both to pure and impure personal estate), that I do not consider that, with reference to there being three subject-matters upon which the money

CHAMPNEY v. DAVY.

might be laid out, there is any real difficulty arising as to that. No doubt there is an observation, which is to be found in Sinnott v. Herbert (ubi sup.), by Lord Chancellor Hatherley, and there are observations in other authorities of the same kind, that where there are several objects of the charity, one of which is illegal, the whole must fail, there being no distinction taken as to the amount to be devoted to each. But I do not take that to be law in a case where you can ascertain how much ought to go to each. In fact it was in Hoare v. Osborne (ubi sup.), and also, as I recollect, in a subsequent case which was before the same learned judge, that Kindersley, V.C., only because he considered that it could not be ascertained from the nature of the subject-matter what property ought to be set apart for each, decided that he would adopt, not the rule of invalidity, but the rule of there being a number of objects, saying so much for one and so much for the other. The same question was under the consideration of Wood, V.C. in the case of Attorney-General v. Fisk, which is in the 4th vol. of Equity Cases, p. 521. There was a gift of 1000*l.* Consols to the rector and churchwardens of a parish and their successors upon trust to apply such of the dividends thereof as should from time to time be necessary or required in keeping in repair her family grave, and to pay and divide the residue of the said dividends, at Christmas every year for ever, amongst the aged poor of the parish. It was held, that though the amount of the gift for the repair of the grave was not specified, the court could, if necessary, have estimated the amount "necessary and required" for the purpose, and so have prevented the gift of the residue from being void for uncertainty. Then he observed upon the case which has always been considered as a case looking the other way of Chapman v. Brown (6 Ves. 404), and he came to that conclusion. Therefore, as regards the school, you must ascertain how much of the gift, whatever the reduced amount may be, was required to be laid out upon each of the three several objects specified; and the gift, therefore, will prevail to the extent to which it may be ascertained that the money will be required; and it will fail as to the rest. Now then, as to the sum so far as it is to come out of the impure personal estate: it appears that, as regards the coming out of impure personal estate, having regard to the statute, and taking into consideration the second section to which my attention has been called, I must give effect to the gift to the extent to which the law will allow it to take effect out of the impure personal estate. In other words, that it is a valid gift to the extent of 500*l.* after taking the pure personal estate as far as it will go, it being of course clear that the whole amount of 2000*l.* will not be exceeded by taking the whole of the pure personal estate. I assume that, of course, you will take the pure personal estate as far as it will go. I do not know what the amount is.

The question remained to be discussed whether to the extent of the abatement the legacies went into the first or into the ultimate residue.

Pearson, Q.C. and Speed for persons entitled to the particular residue.—There is no intention in any event to benefit the residuary legatee. In Carter v. Taggart (16 Sim. 423), where a gift, directed to be deducted from a particular residue, failed on account of the death of the legatee, went to the particular, and not to the general residue. The same rule is applied in De Trafford v. Tempest (21 Beav. 564). In Harries' Trusts (Johnson, 199), Wood, V.C. thus expresses the principle: "If you find in the will a plain indication of an intention to appoint the whole, that may remain strictly in the shape of residue, as residue is appointed by this will, or to appoint the entire fund charged only with the sums specified in the preceding appointments; then the residuary clause will be read as an appointment, not of the mere balance of the fund, after the sums previously appointed have been deducted from it, but of the entire fund subject to the appointments previously made." The whole question is, what is the first residue? It includes everything payable out of these particular funds:

Theobald on Wills, pp. 93, 94.

Dickinson, Q.C., and Joyce for the representative of Hannah West, entitled to the ultimate residue.—The particular residuary legatee of this specific fund, has no claim to anything but what is expressly given her. See Re Jeaffreson's Trusts, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 278.

The clear distinction is whether the gift, which partly fails, is in the form of a charge or the gift of an aliquot part. Here there is a gift to trustees of a variety of subjects, and a clear residue to be ascertained. It is only in the former case that a particular residue can be benefited by the failure of previous gifts. This case comes within Eusum v. Appleford (5 My. & Cr. 56), in which a testator bequeathing a sum to a daughter for life, and then as she should by will appoint, directed that on failure of appointment the fund should go into his general residue. The daughter appointed part of the fund by an appointment which failed, and the residue to other persons. What was ineffectually appointed went into the father's and not the daughter's residue. See also

Oke v. Heath, 1 Ves. sen. 135 (referred to in Harries' Trusts, ubi sup.);

Bernard v. Minshull, Johnson, 276.

HALL, V.C.—In Falkner v. Butler (Amb. 514), under a limited power of appointment, the donee appointed a sum to persons not objects of the power, and this sum was held to pass under the appointment of residue; i.e., it fell into that residue. So in Wollaston v. King (8 Eq. 165) it was held there being an invalid appointment of part of a trust fund, that fund passed under an appointment, "subject to the appointment thereinbefore contained of all the trust moneys subject to the trusts of the settlement." In Carter v. Taggart (16 Sim. 423), the testatrix exercising a power over a specified sum, gave part of it to a person who died before her, and gave all the rest and residue of the sum, after deducting the legacies above mentioned. The part which lapsed was held to fall into the residue. This decision, I think, turned upon the particular will indicating an intention, particularly by a life estate being given in part with a direction that that part should fall into the residue, that all should pass to the appointee of the residue, subject only to the charge. In De Trafford v. Tempest (21 Beav. 564) a lapsed gift of particular furniture was held to fall into a gift of furniture not thereinbefore otherwise disposed of, and not to pass under a general residuary gift. This is a case of two residues. In Eusum v. Appleford

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. BISHOP OF OXFORD.

(vide sup.), which was a case of an appointment under a power, Lord Cottenham considered that the fund was a definite one, and that the last disposition, though of "residue," was in substance to be read as if the whole amount of such residue had been inserted in the disposition. In Re Harries' Trusts (Johns. 199), Wood, V.C. held upon the whole instrument that a lapsed share of a definite sum passed under an appointment of residue of the said moneys after certain specified sums. He considered Carter v. Taggart and Falkner v. Butler to apply rather than Easum v. Appleford. In Re Jeaffreson's Trusts (L. Rep. 2 Eq. 276), which was the execution of a power the donee appointed 100*l.*, part of the fund, to a person not an object of the power, and appointed the balance of the fund, after payment of certain other sums well appointed, which balance he described as 260*l.*, and, after payment of the debts (which was an invalid direction), and should any surplus remain, she gave it to an object of the power. Here there were two invalid gifts. The latter was held to fall into the ultimate surplus; the former was held to pass as unapplied. That decision as regards the 100*l.* followed Easum v. Appleford, the 100*l.* not becoming part of and passing with the balance, because that was defined as 260*l.* That case, therefore, is not an authority in favour of the general residuary legatee in the present case, viz., the testatrix's mother; and, construing the whole will and having regard to the authorities, I hold that the particular residuary legatees are entitled to so much of the 2000*l.* legacy as is not well disposed of. I do not think there is a sound distinction between cases of lapsed and cases of invalid disposition, whether the disposition be under a power of appointment, special or general, or in exercise of ownership; nor do I think that the construction of a particular residuary gift is affected by the presence or absence of a general residuary gift.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Feb. 27, 28, and March 8, 1879.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J., FIELD and MANISTY, JJ.)

REG. v. BISHOP OF OXFORD. (a)

Mandamus—Ecclesiastical offence—Duty of bishop—"It shall be lawful"—Grounds for refusal—3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, s. 3.

A parishioner made a charge under sect. 3 of the Church Discipline Act 1840, to the bishop of his diocese, that the rector of his parish had offended against the laws ecclesiastical. The bishop declined to issue a commission for the purpose of making inquiry as to the grounds of such charge, for the expressed reasons that the repeated failures in legal proceedings of this kind had tended to cover those concerned in them with ridicule, and to bring the Church into contempt; that the rector was of advanced age, and was held in respect and love; and that the charge was made in opposition to the wish of the majority of the parishioners.

Held, upon a rule for a mandamus, that the reasons alleged by the bishop did not justify him in declining to exercise his office at the instance of a parishioner under this section; and that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, would compel him to proceed.

THIS was a rule nisi for a mandamus directing the Bishop of Oxford to issue a commission for the purpose of making inquiry as to the grounds of a charge, made by the applicant, Frederick G. Julius, a parishioner of Clewer, in the county of Berks, of certain offences under the ecclesiastical law, against the Rev. T. T. Carter, the rector of the said parish of Clewer.

On the 11th July 1878 the applicant made a complaint by letter to the bishop of certain alleged illegal practices by the rector at the celebration of the Holy Communion. The bishop acknowledged the receipt of this letter, and promised consideration thereof, on the following day; and on the 9th Aug. the applicant's solicitors wrote to the bishop asking the result of his consideration.

On the 10th Aug. the bishop wrote to the applicant's solicitors as follows:

In reply to your letter, I can only say that I have not yet been able to satisfy myself as to the best way of dealing with the complaint to which it refers. The repeated occurrence of failures during the last few years in the conduct of legal proceedings of this kind has had a tendency to cover all persons concerned in them with ridicule, and to bring on the Church itself some contempt, which I would not willingly increase. In this case I have further to consider that the complaint is made in opposition to the strongly-expressed wish of the great majority of the parishioners, and that the person complained of is a clergyman in advanced years generally respected, and even beloved, by those who know him. I mention these circumstances not as affording any answer to your complaint, but as reasons which impose upon me the duty of taking unusual care in deciding on the course which I ought to adopt.

On the 23rd Oct., in answer to a further application from the solicitors, the bishop again wrote:

My former letter will have explained to you in general the considerations which impose the duty of extreme caution upon me in the nature of complaint professionally intrusted to you. Further, I am led to believe that proceedings will be taken as to the late judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench which may affect the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court of Arches and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in some important respects. While these are pending, I am unwilling to add to the large amount of costly and abortive litigation from which the Church has already suffered so much discredit.

On the 12th Nov. the solicitors wrote to the bishop:

We are instructed to ask your Lordship for a definite reply to our client's application to your Lordship either to issue a commission for the purpose of making inquiry into the grounds of the charges set out in the application or to send the case by letter of request to the Court of Appeal of the province, to be there heard and determined in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

To this, on the 14th Nov., the bishop replied as follows:

In reply to your note I can only refer you to my former letter. As no change has occurred in the state of things in view of which that letter was written, I have nothing to add to it. I am not aware that there was any obscurity in the language.

On the 22nd Jan. 1879 this rule nisi for a mandamus was granted on the application of A. J. Stephens, Q.C. for the applicant.

Feb. 27 and 28.—The Bishop of Oxford in person showed cause against the rule.

Charles, Q.C. and Phillimore also showed cause on behalf of the Rector of Clewer.

REG. v. BISHOP OF OXFORD.

[Q.B. Div.]

A. J. Stephens, Q.C. and Jeune supported the rule.

The arguments and the authorities discussed sufficiently appear in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 8.—COCKBURN, C.J. delivered the judgment of himself, Field and Manisty, JJ.—This was an application for a writ of mandamus to the Lord Bishop of Oxford, directing him to issue a commission under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, to inquire into the matter of a complaint of Frederick G. Julius, Doctor of Medicine, a parishioner of the parish of Clewer, in the county of Berks, and a member of the Church of England, against the Rev. Thomas Thelluson Carter, rector of the said parish, for offences against the laws ecclesiastical in respect of unauthorised deviations from the ritual of the Church in the Communion Service and the use of unauthorised vestments. The complaint was in due form, and it must be taken that the instances of alleged departure from the established ritual set forth in the complaint were according to the law as it had been laid down in the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council offences against the ecclesiastical law, and therefore within the statute. The bishop has declined, however, to issue the commission as required, assigning as a reason, not that the matters complained of were not offences against the ecclesiastical law, or were of too unsubstantial and trivial a character to call for inquiry, but resting his refusal on the ground that the repeated failures which had occurred during the last few years in legal proceedings of this kind had had a tendency to cover those concerned in them with ridicule and to bring the Church itself into contempt, as well as on the advanced age of the incumbent, the respect and love in which he was held, and the fact that the complaint was made in opposition to the expressed wish of the great majority of the parishioners. The writ of mandamus being applied for under these circumstances, these three questions present themselves: 1. Assuming the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86), the statute upon which this application is founded, to be still in force in such a case, is it obligatory on the bishop, as a matter of statutory duty, to issue a commission as prayed for, with the alternative of sending the cause to the Court of Arches in the first instance; or is it in his discretion to refuse to institute any further proceeding? 2. Is the Act in question still in force, or has it been superseded by the Public Worship Regulation Act of 1874? 3. If the Church Discipline Act is still in force and applicable to the present case, and the exercise of the power conferred by the statute is obligatory on the bishop, is the present case one in which this court should exercise the discretion which it possesses in the matter of mandamus and refuse the writ? With a view to these questions, it becomes necessary, in the first place, carefully to consider the Church Discipline Act under which this application is made, not only with reference to the 3rd section, on which the application is immediately founded, but also with reference to the general scope and purpose of the statute. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, superseding the former modes and proceedings against clerks in orders, in sect. 3, enacts that "in every case of any clerk in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland who may be charged with any offence against the laws ecclesiastical, or concerning whom there may exist scandal or evil report as having offended against the said laws, it shall be lawful for the bishop of the diocese within which the offence is alleged or reported to have been committed, on the application of any party complaining thereof, or if he shall think fit of his own mere motion, to issue a commission under his hand and seal to five persons, of whom one shall be the vicar general or an archdeacon or rural dean within the diocese, for the purpose of making inquiry as to the grounds of such charge or report." The commissioners so appointed are to examine witnesses on oath for the purpose of "ascertaining whether there be sufficient prima facie ground for instituting further proceeding. If the commissioners report that there is sufficient prima facie ground for further proceeding, and if the bishop or the party complaining shall thereupon think fit to proceed against the party accused, articles are to be drawn up, which, with the depositions, are to be filed in the registry of the diocese. The bishop is then to cite the party accused to appear to make answer to the articles. If he appears and admits the truth of the articles, the bishop or his commissary specially appointed for the purpose is to pronounce sentence according to ecclesiastical law. If the party fails to appear, or appearing, makes any other answer than an unqualified admission of the truth of the articles, the bishop is to proceed to hear the cause with the assistance of three assessors specially qualified by the Act; and, having heard the cause, is to determine the same and pronounce sentence thereupon according to the ecclesiastical law. There is, however, a special provision that before issuing the commission, or after the report of the commissioners, provided it be before the filing of the articles, "it shall be lawful for the bishop, if he shall think fit," to send the case by letters of request to the Court of Appeal of the province, there to be heard and determined. Such being the method of proceeding provided by this statute, the first question which presents itself is whether the enactment in the 3rd section, which says that on a complaint against a clerk in orders of an offence against the ecclesiastical law, it shall be lawful for the bishop to issue a commission of inquiry, simply confers a power to be exercised at discretion, or imposes a duty which requires the exercise of the power in the circumstances contemplated by the statute. It is said that the question is settled by authority, there having been a decision of this court to the effect that the Act simply confers a power to be exercised at discretion, in the case of Reg. v. The Bishop of Chichester (2 E. & E. 209). But when that case comes to be looked at it appears extremely doubtful whether such was the ground of the decision of the majority of the court. The argument on the rule having been heard before Lord Campbell, and Justices Wightman, Erle, and Hill, before judgment was delivered, Lord Campbell had become Lord Chancellor, and Mr. Justice Erle had become Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; for which reason the only judgments delivered were those of Wightman and Hill, JJ., who, while they concurred in discharging the rule for a mandamus, proceeded on different grounds, Wightman, J. no doubt expressly holding that the bishop had a discretionary authority which could not be controlled by mandamus, while Hill, J. declining to act on this view, concurred in discharging the rule solely on the ground that the applicant not being a parishioner, and therefore not interested in the performance of the service in the church in question, the case was not one in which the court, having a discretionary authority in the matter of mandamus, ought to issue the writ. It is true that Wightman, J. at the close of his judgment adds that Lord Campbell and Lord Chief Justice Erle concurred in thinking that the rule should be discharged; but he does not say on which of the two grounds they so concurred, which makes it, to say the least, extremely doubtful whether it was in concurrence with his own view; for there being a difference of opinion between himself and Hill, J., had his own view been borne out by the opinion of the other two judges, or either of them, it may reasonably be inferred that he would have said so. It also appears from the statement of Dr. Stephens, derived from his own recollection of what occurred in the case of Shepherd v. Bennett, before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and which is fully borne out by the shorthand notes, that in the latter case Sir William Erle disclaimed having acted on the ground taken by Wightman, J. To which we may add that we have been recently informed by Sir William Erle that he did not authorise Wightman, J. to say more on his behalf than that he concurred in discharging the rule for a mandamus. It is true that in the Newport Bridge case (2 E. & E. 377), which occurred in the same year, Crompton, J. expresses his concurrence in the view taken in the previous case by Wightman, J.; but it is to be observed that Crompton, J. had not been a party to the judgment in that case, or to the discussion which had been held upon it. The same question came again before this court, in the case of Mr. Bennett, on an application for a mandamus to the Bishop of London, a report of which case have been published, and from which it no doubt appears that a strong intimation was thrown out, in the course of the argument, as well as in giving judgment, by Lush J., of concurrence in the view of Wightman, J., in the Bishop of Chichester's case, founded mainly, however, on what we cannot but believe to have been a mistake—viz., that Lord Campbell and Erle, L.C.J. had concurred in discharging the rule in that case on the ground taken by Wightman, J. It became, however, unnecessary to decide as to the construction of the statute in Mr. Bennett's case; and Lush, J. and the other judges expressly disclaim all intention of doing so; inasmuch as, there being already a proceeding pending against Mr. Bennett, under a commission issued by the bishop in respect of similar doctrines contained in a former publication, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, refused to grant the mandamus as unnecessary and uncalled for. In this state of uncertainty we feel ourselves at liberty to form our own judgment as to the construction to be put on the enactment in question; the more so as, for reasons which will be explained further on, the ground on which the opinion of Wightman, J. was founded appears to us open to serious question. The question turns on the true sense of the term, "it shall be lawful" (as used in the 3rd section of the Church Discipline Act)—a term frequently used in statutory language, perhaps, owing to its ambiguity, too frequently, as it is one which admits of no less than three different meanings, in all of which it occurs in this very statute: (1) It may be used to confer a right or privilege, to be exercised for the benefit of others or not, at the option of the party to whom it is given; (2), it may be used to confer a power or authority, to be exercised for the benefit of himself at the discretion of the party on whom it is conferred; or (3), while it confers a power or authority, it may, at the same time, impose the duty of exercising the power or authority so conferred. Besides which the general sense of these words is sometimes restricted by some qualifying expression, such as "if he shall think fit," "if it shall appear to him right," or the like, which plainly indicate that the exercise of the power is to be subject to the discretion of him who is authorised to exercise it. In the absence of any such qualifying expression, the meaning of the words must be sought in the context of the particular enactment, or of the other sections of the statute, or by reference to its general purpose, and the alteration in the existing law which it was intended to effect, as also in certain canons of construction applicable to this and similar expressions in statutes of a particular class. In the statute before us the term "it shall be lawful" occurs, and that more than once, in the several meanings in which it can thus be used. It is used to confer a right or privilege, to be exercised at the option of the party, in the 4th section, which provides that "it shall be lawful for the party accused, or his agent, to attend the proceedings of the commission, and to examine any of the witnesses;" and again, in the 15th section, which provides that "it shall be lawful for any party who shall think himself aggrieved by a judgment pronounced by the bishop, or in the Court of Appeal of the province, to appeal from such judgment." It is used in the sense of conferring a discretionary power or authority in the 6th section of the Act, where it is said that where proceedings have been commenced under the Act "it shall be lawful" for the bishop, the written consent of the clerk accused and of the party complaining having been first obtained, to pronounce sentence without further proceedings. Three instances occur in which the words are used as imposing a duty. Thus, when in sect. 4 it is said that "it shall be lawful for the commissioners to examine on oath or solemn affirmation, and that such oath or affirmation shall be administered by them to all witnesses who may be tendered to them, either in support of the charge or by the party accused, as well as to all witnesses whom they may deem it necessary to summon, for the purpose of fully prosecuting the inquiry," there can be no doubt that the duty of so examining the witnesses is thereby imposed; and the same observation applies to the use of the same words in sect. 17, which has reference to the evidence of witnesses and documents in every stage of the inquiry. Equally clear is it that when by sect. 9 it is provided that, when the commissioners shall have reported that there is sufficient prima facie ground for instituting proceedings, "it shall be lawful for the bishop, by writing under his hand, to require the party to appear, by himself or his agent, to make answer to the articles," a judicial duty is cast upon the bishop which he has no alternative but to discharge. Three instances occur in which the effect of these words is restricted by qualifying expressions. Thus sect. 13

REG. v. BISHOP OF OXFORD.

provides that "if it shall appear to the bishop that great scandal is likely to arise from the party accused continuing to perform the services of the church, or that his ministration will be useless while the charge is pending, it shall be lawful for the bishop to inhibit the clerk from performing any service till the sentence shall have been given." It is obvious that the exercise of the power here given must depend on the view taken by the bishop. So when, in sect. 13, where it is provided that "it shall be lawful" for the bishop, "if he shall think fit" at any time before articles are filed, instead of hearing and deciding the cause under sect. 2, "to send the case by letters of request to the Court of Appeal of the province, to be there heard and determined according to the law and practice of that court," it is obvious that this is a discretionary power. These instances show that the framers of this Act were sensible of the necessity, where the authority conferred was intended to be discretionary, of appending words of limitation to the phrase in question. Of this a still more striking instance is to be found in the very section which we are called upon to construe, which, after providing that "it shall be lawful for the bishop to issue a commission on the application of any party complaining," proceeds to add, "or, if he shall think fit, of his own mere motion." Here the words "if he shall think fit" would appear to be have been introduced for the purpose of preventing the preceding words, "it shall be lawful," from precluding the exercise of the discretionary power which in the alternative it was intended to confer on the bishop. We now proceed to consider the rules of construction to be applied in determining the sense in which the words "it shall be lawful," in the 3rd section of the Church Discipline Act, are to be taken. In doing this we start with a settled canon of construction, that in statutes of a certain class, of which the statute under consideration is one, these words have acquired a settled meaning, unless controlled by the context of the particular enactment, or by the sense in which they are used in other parts of the statute, or, on the purview of the statute, by what is its apparent purpose; in determining which, the prior state of the law, and the end which the statute was intended to effect, may no doubt have to be considered. Whether or not these words are to be considered as simply conferring a discretionary power, or as imposing the duty of exercising the power conferred, when its exercise is called for, must depend in the first place on the subject-matter of the statutory enactment. In the ordinary run of statutes these words import, generally speaking, a faculty or power, to be exercised at the option or discretion of those on whom it is conferred; and such, it seems, is to be taken to be their primâ facie meaning where the subject-matter will admit of it, or where the exercise of the power may depend on contingencies on which a judgment has first to be formed. Thus, in the case Re Newport Bridge (2 E. & E. 377), which was an application for a mandamus under 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 2, which, with reference to county bridges, enacted that where any such bridge was narrow and inconvenient, it should be lawful for the justices of quarter sessions to order the same to be widened and improved, Crompton, J., after saying that "the meaning to be attributed to the phrase 'it shall be lawful' in a statute must depend on the subject-matter in every instance," goes on to say: "Primâ facie those words import a discretion, and they must be construed as discretionary unless there be anything in the subject-matter to which they are applied, or in any other part of the statute, to show that they are meant to be imperative." "In the present statute," he says, "not only does it not appear that the Act was intended to be compulsory upon the justices, but it appears from the subject-matter that it was intended to be left to their discretion. It seems to me that the Legislature must have so intended when I consider the nature of the court which has to decide whether the act shall be done, and the many questions of expense and expediency which may arise before the act can be prudently determined on." Hill, J. dwells more fully on the circumstances to be thus taken into consideration. Blackburn, J. says: "The words 'shall and may be lawful' are to be taken in their primary sense as permissive, and not compulsory, unless there be anything in the subject-matter of the enactment requiring that they shall receive a different construction. For a time I thought that the present enactment did require that the imperative construction should prevail, and that the object of the Legislature was that upon the one fact appearing that the bridge was narrow and inconvenient, it should be widened as a matter of course. I now, however, agree in what has fallen from my brother Hill—that the justices have other matters, such as he has pointed out, to take into consideration, besides the narrowness of the bridge, before they decide whether or not to order it to be widened. That being the case, it is quite clear that the Legislature must have intended to leave them the discretion which the language of the statute primâ facie imports." In statutes, however, of the class to which the Church Discipline Act belongs a different rule has prevailed for a very great length of time. So long ago as the year 1693 it was decided in the case of Rex v. Burlow (2 Salkeld 609), that when a statute authorises the doing of a thing for the sake of justice or the public good, the word "may" means shall; and that rule has been acted upon to the present time. In Bacon's Abridgment tit. "Statute, i.," the rule is so laid down, as also in Dwaris on Statutes, p. 264. Speaking of facultative words, it is there stated that where a statute directs the doing of a thing "for the sake of justice" or "for the public benefit," the word "may" shall be construed as "shall" or "must," and, of course, the same rule will apply to the words "it shall be lawful." Such a construction was put on these words by the Court of Common Pleas in the case of McDougall v. Paterson (11 C. B. 755), in which it was held that the word "may" in the County Courts Extension Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 61) which provides that in certain cases the court, or a judge at chambers, may by rule or order direct that the plaintiff shall recover his costs, is not used to give a discretion but to confer a power, and that the exercise of such power depends not upon the discretion of a court or judge, but upon the proof of a particular case out of which such power arises. In that case Jervis, L.C.J. says: "When a statute confers an authority to do a judicial act in a certain case, it is imperative on those so authorised to exercise the authority when the case arises, and its exercise is duly applied for by a party interested and having the right to make the application." "For these reasons," continues the Chief Justice, "we are of opinion that the word 'may' is not used to give a discretion, but to confer a power upon the court and judges; and that the exercise of such power depends, not upon the discretion of the court or judge, but upon the proof of the particular case out of which such power arises." A similar construction was put on the words "it shall be lawful" in the case of Morisse v. The Royal British Bank (1 C. B. N. S. 67), in which it was held that these words, in the 13th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113, the Joint Stock Bank Act, were compulsory, and left no discretion to the court or judge. The case of Orake v. Powell (2 E. & B. 210) is to the same effect. But it is unnecessary to multiply cases in support of this position. "It has been so often decided," says Coleridge, J., in the case of R. v. The Tithe Commissioners (14 Q. B. 459, 474), "as to have become an axiom, that in public statutes words only directory, permissive, or enabling may have a compulsory force where the thing to be done is for the public benefit or in advancement of public justice." It may, however, be satisfactory to observe that the same sense has been ascribed to these words in the courts of the United States. In the case of The Supervisors v. United States (4 Wallace's Reports, p. 446), Swayne, J., in delivering the judgment of the Superior Court, after referring to the English and American cases, says as follows: "The conclusion to be deduced from the authorities is that where power is given to public officers, in the language of the Act before us, or in equivalent language—whenever the public interest or individual rights call for its exercise—the language used, though permissive in form, is, in fact, precatory. What they are empowered to do for a third person the law requires shall be done. The power is given, not for their benefit, but for his. It is placed with the depositary to meet the demands of right, and to prevent a failure of justice. It is given as a remedy to those entitled to invoke its aid, and who would otherwise be remediless." Now, the statute we are considering unites both the properties which have been referred to. It has reference to the administration of justice in the matter of ecclesiastical offences; and, as it relates to the maintenance of the doctrines and ritual of the established religion, for upholding the uniformity of which so many Acts of Parliament have been passed, it cannot be held to be other than matter of national interest and concern. Moreover, it is the undoubted right of every inhabitant of every parish in the kingdom, desirous of frequenting the parish church, to have the services of the church performed according to the ritual of the Church, as established by law, without having his religious sense shocked and outraged by the introduction of innovations not sanctioned by law or usage, and which may appear to him to be inconsistent with the simplicity of the Protestant worship, and to pertain to a religion which he believes to be erroneous, and the ritual of which is not that of the Church of England. It cannot admit of doubt that a statute, by means of which a right so important to the general sense of mankind was alone to be capable of being enforced and upheld—since it abolished the previous jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in the matters of clerks in orders—is one of general interest and concern, in the construction of which the rule referred to would be applicable. This being so, we have next to see whether we find anything in the language or purpose of the statute which shows that the words were intended to have a less authoritative meaning. So far from this being the case, as regards the language of the 3rd section, we find, as has already been pointed out, that between that part of it which relates to the power of the bishop to issue a commission on a complaint addressed to him, and which enacts that it shall be lawful for him so to do, and that part which enables him to do so of his own mere motion, independently of any complaint, the words "if he shall think fit" are interposed. It is here obvious that if the words "it shall be lawful" had been intended to confer a discretionary power, as these words would, in the absence of the words "if he shall think fit," have governed and controlled the whole sentence, the latter words would have been wholly superfluous. They can only have been introduced, therefore, for the purpose of qualifying the previous expression. Taken as a whole, it therefore seems to us from the collocation of the words that the passage affords the key to its own interpretation, and indicates the sense in which the words in question are to be taken. It was suggested on the part of the bishop that the words "if he shall think fit" in section 3 should be rejected as superfluous. To this we answer that in so doing we should violate a settled canon of construction—namely, that a statute ought to be so construed that, if it can be prevented, no clause, sentence, or word shall be superfluous, void, or insignificant (Bac. Abr.; tit. "Statute" I. sub-sec. 2). But this is not all. The words are significant, as indicating the sense in which the words "it shall be lawful" in the preceding part of the section had been used by the framers of the Act. They would in any point of view have been idle, if not introduced to qualify the effect of the words, "it shall be lawful," as imposing a duty. Wightman, J., it is true, in Reg. v. The Bishop of Chichester, arrived at the opposite conclusion, derived from the enactments of the section in question. His opinion was founded on the ground that the power to issue a commission in the 3rd section applied equally to a case of scandal or evil report of having offended against the ecclesiastical law as to one of an offence charged to have been actually committed; and he argues, ab inconvenienti, that it cannot have been the intention of the Legislature to put it in the power of a prosecutor to call upon a bishop to issue a commission, and so initiate proceedings on what may turn out to be unfounded rumours; the more so as, according to the learned judge, as the law before stood, "the office of the judge could only have been promoted in the case of some direct and positive charge of an offence against the laws ecclesiastical, and no proceeding upon the ground of scandal or evil report of having offended against these laws would have been admissible." But, in the latter assumption the learned judge is, we cannot but think, in error. Public report or scandal was a ground of accusation in the ecclesiastical procedure, not only in the proceedings by inquisition, when the proceeding was taken by a bishop or an archbishop, ex officio mero. Here the articles, Oughton tells us ("Ordo Judic." tit. 141, sect. 1), were to contain "Tam causas conventionis (i.e., in jus vocationis) quam famam publicam." Again, he says (Ib. n.f. 22), "Et si reus non tenetur respondere positioni criminosa, tenetur tamen respondere positioni contenti famam publicam criminis articulati. Igitur in his articulis famam publica objecti criminis est alleganda et obijcienda." Nay, so material was public scandal or evil report deemed to be as founding a charge against a party, that the judge was bound to summon and examine the fellow-parishioners of the accused as to its existence. "Si reus negaverit criminem objectum et famam," says Oughton ("Ordo Judic." tit. 145, sect. 1), "tunc, si crimen objectum fuerit notorium et publicum, ac de eodem publica vex et fama, iudex producere et examinare curabit parochianos rei, vel alios quosunque, ad famam probandam, eosque ad perhibendum testimonium, si rogati recusaverint per censuras ecclesiasticas compellere." Even though the proof of the alleged offence failed, if the evil report was established the accused might be sentenced to clear himself by purgation—that is, by producing a certain number of compurgatores, who were to swear they believed the report to be unfounded. "Si fama confessata vel probata fuerit," says Oughton (tit. 144, sect. 7), "iudex potest purgationem indicere." If the accused failed in his purgation, he might be enjoined to do public penance (Ib. 147, sect. 2). The same thing occurred on presentments by churchwardens (see tit. 152) termed by the civilians Denunciatio. Here again, as appears from Conset, Oughton, and the 115th canon, public scandal and report became part of the inquiry, it being, according to the old law, part of the duty of the churchwardens to present those against whom, whether ministers or parishioners, such scandal or report prevailed. Nor was this confined to the proceedings by inquisition or by presentment. On an accusation by a party promoting the office of the judge, the articles in like manner alleged the publica fama of the imputed offence; and here again it is laid down (Oughton, tit. 149, sects. 7 & 8), "Si actor probaverit famam publicam, vel præsumptiones vehementes, ob quas purgatio parti reæ indicta fuerit, vel indicii possit et debuisset, quamvis non probaverit crimen objectum, tamen obtinebit sententiam purgationem esse indicendam, et reus est in expensis illius litis condemnandus. Nam reus, negando famam, causavit actorem litigare, et expensas facere circa probationem ejusdem." It thus appears that public scandal or report did play an important part in penal suits in the ecclesiastical courts, and was of itself sufficient to place the party against whom it was brought forward under the necessity of clearing himself by oath; and it is, we think, going too far to say that if a strong case of public scandal had been brought before the judge as the ground for allowing the office of the judge to be promoted, the application would have been refused. We think it not unlikely that the intention being, as we shall presently more fully show, to leave the substantive law as it stood, changing only the method of proceeding, these words were introduced as applicable to the cases in which public report might have formed matter of judicial inquiry. At all events, we think the argument afforded by the fact that in the passage in question the words "if he shall think fit," give, as seems to us, the key to the words "it shall be lawful" in the earlier branch of the sentence, the inference arising from the collocation of the words is far stronger than any which can be drawn from the supposed intention of the Legislature, which, after all, can only be matter of surmise. The language of the section, though it might have been more explicit, is, we think, too clear to warrant us in speculating on the legislative intention. It is, moreover, obvious that if it had been the intention of the Legislature that the issuing of a commission should be at the discretion of the bishop, nothing would have been easier than to say so, as has been done in the Public Worship Act. By placing the words "if he think fit" in an earlier part of the sentence, immediately after the words "it shall be lawful," all ambiguity would have been removed. We proceed to consider the purpose of the statute as a whole. On the purview of it, especially when looked at by the light of the report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commissioners, which preceded it, and of the preamble, which is confined to the recital that "the manner of proceeding in causes for the correction of clerks required amendment," it appears plain that it has reference, not to the substantive law, but simply to the procedure applicable to a suit against a clerk in orders for an ecclesiastical offence. It leaves the law as to what shall constitute an offence under that law as it stood before. It nowhere professes to abridge or interfere with any existing right of instituting proceedings against a clerk in orders for an ecclesiastical offence. It is the method of proceeding alone with which the statute deals. Thus, by the effect of the 23rd section, it takes from the bishop the power of instituting proceedings by way of inquisition, as was held in the Dean of York's case (2 Q. B. 1), and make it necessary for the bishop, if he desires to prosecute ex mero officio, either to issue a commission under sect. 3, if he desires to prosecute the suit in his own court, or to send the cause in the first instance to the metropolitan court by letters of request under sect. 13. And whereas, in a penal suit instituted by a party promoting the office of the judge, leave to promote the office must first have been applied for and obtained in the court of the bishop, and, leave to promote the office of the judge having been obtained, articles would have been at once exhibited and the suit proceeded with—a matter generally involving much expense, and sometimes the vexatious harassment of the defendant—the statute, on an accusation of an ecclesiastical offence being brought forward, requires a complaint to be addressed to the bishop himself, and, except in the case just put, where the bishop thinks proper to exercise the power vested in him by the 13th section, and, dispensing with any preliminary inquiry, sends the cause at once by letters of request to the court of the province, interposes, before the suit can be further prosecuted, a preliminary inquiry as to the facts by means of a commission, on whose report whether a prima facie case for further proceedings has been made out it depends whether the suit shall proceed—an institution analogous to the finding of a grand jury on a bill of indictment. In other respects, when the commissioners have reported that there is prima facie ground for further proceedings, the jurisdiction of the bishop remains very much as it was before, except that he may have to exercise the functions of a judge himself, instead of the cause being tried before his appointed judge. If the party admits the truth of the articles, the bishop, or his commissary appointed for the purpose, may at once pronounce sentence. If the facts are denied, the bishop can either try the cause himself, with the assistance of three assessors specially qualified under the Act, and himself determine it, this mode of trial being substituted for the trial in the diocesan court by the bishop's judge; or, the bishop, as he might have done before, on a suit being instituted in his own court, may send the suit by letters of request to the metropolitan court. In all this there is manifestly nothing which affects the right to institute proceedings, though the mode of initiating the suit is changed, and the party desirous of prosecuting a clerk in orders for an ecclesiastical offence, instead of obtaining leave to promote the office of the judge, must now prefer a complaint to the bishop, and, unless the bishop thinks proper to send the case at once to the provincial court, must abide by the report of a commission as to whether the suit shall be proceeded with. But, subject to this, the statute does not profess to deal with the right to prefer a charge against a clerk in orders, if the offence charged amounts to an offence against the ecclesiastical law; and it therefore becomes material to consider how the law stood in respect of the right of instituting proceedings against a clerk in orders prior to the passing of the statute. Two conflicting views have been pressed upon us: the one that though, in order to promote the office of the judge, it was necessary to obtain leave of the court, yet that this was, practically speaking, merely matter of form, and that the leave could be claimed as of right, provided the offence proposed to be prosecuted was one of ecclesiastical cognisance, and the promoter was of ability to pay costs if defeated in the suit. On the other hand, it was contended that to allow the office of the judge to be promoted was not matter of form, but one on which the judgment of the judge had to be exercised; from which it was argued that, in the present statute, it must have been intended to leave a like discretion to the bishop. In support of the first proposition, the old authorities, Conset and Oughton, are cited. Thus, Conset ("Practice," part 7, c. 2) says: "If any hath committed any crime (whereof the Spiritual Courts have cognizance) and is not detected, denounced, or presented for the same, or if the bishop or archdeacon have not proceeded against him by way of inquisition, yet any person (who offers himself ready to pay the party to be convened his charges, if he doth not prove the matters objected) hath interest voluntarily to implore and promote the office of the judge, and may call the delinquent to answer articles, and may administer articles to him when he appears, in the name of the judge, and of his office promoted, and may accuse the delinquent." So Oughton, following Conset, says ("Ordo Judiciorum," tit. 150):—"(1) Siquis crimen, ad fori ecclesiastici cognitionem spectans, commiserit, et de oedem non fuerit detectus, denunciatus, vel preentatus, vel Episcopus, vel Archidiaconus non processerit contra eum per inquisitionem; quælibet tamen persona (si fuerit solvendo expensæ parti convenientes, si objecta non probaverit) habet interesse (quoniam Reipublicæ interest ut delicta puniantur) et Judicis officium implorare, et voluntarie promovere; et delinquentem, ad respondendum articulis, ex officio Judicis promoti, ministratis, in just vocare potest, et parti comparenti articulos (nomine Judicis, et ex ejus officio promoti) objicere, et ministrare, et delinquentum accusare." That this principle continued to be acted on appears from several dicta of ecclesiastical judges. In Argar v. Holdsworth (2 Cases temp. Lee, 515) Sir George Lee says: "A clergyman may be prosecuted by anyone for neglect of his clerical duty." In the case of Procurator-General v. Stone (1 "Consist." 424) Sir William Scott says: "This is a prosecution originating in a citation in the name of the Bishop of London, though the bishop might be personally ignorant of the existence of such suit. It is the constant style of the court; and it is not in the power of the bishop by any intervention on his part to refuse the process of the court to any one desirous to avail himself of it in a proper manner." In Turner v. Meyers (1 "Consist." 414) the same learned judge had said: "The criminal suit is open to every one; the civil suit to any one showing an interest." These dicta were, however, only incidentally made, and were not necessary to the decision of the cases in which they were pronounced. What was said by Sir John Nicholl in Carr v. Marsh (2 Phill. R. 198, 204) is more directly to the point. The suit being in personam, in which the office of the judge was promoted, against a clergyman, for officiating in a chapel licensed by the bishop, but without the consent of the incumbent of the parish, it was urged that, the defendant having acted with the sanction and approbation of the bishop, the promoter ought not to be allowed to promote the office of the judge in the bishop's own court. Sir John Nicholl, however, says: "It is said that there is a discretion in this case, and that the court should not allow the office of the judge to be promoted in such a cause. But the cause must be tried before we arrive at this conclusion, otherwise we enter on the merits prematurely. Application is always made to the judge before a citation issues in a cause in which the office is promoted; but that is not for the purposes of considering the merits of the case, but from the nature of the suit, whether it be of ecclesiastical cognisance or the fitness of the person to be made responsible for costs to the other party. But dicta of an opposite tendency are brought forward on the other side. Thus, in Muidman v. Malpas (1 Consist. 205, 209), Sir William Scott, speaking of a suit in which the office of the judge is promoted, says: "The leave of the court should be first obtained, since it is a part of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction which is not to be exercised without discretion or to be left entirely to the judgment or passions of private persons." In Lee v. Mathews (3 Hagg. Eccl. R. 169), which was a case of brawling in a vestry, Sir John Nicholl certainly uses language which tends to show that it is in the discretion of the judge in certain cases to allow his office to be promoted or not as he may think right. "This being," he says, "a case of office, the whole transaction should have been fairly and candidly stated at once in order that the judge might have an opportunity of considering whether both parties being involved in pari delicto he ought to allow his office to be promoted." "Had all the facts appeared in the articles," he continues, "I doubt whether, considering that the promoter is not a disinterested officer of the parish proceeding in his official capacity, non publicam vindictam, but a private individual proceeding for an offence committed against himself, I should have allowed the case to have gone on." It is, however, here to be observed that this by no means shows that if the suit had been promoted by a proper party and in publicam vindictam the office of the judge could have been properly withheld. The language of the same learned judge in Carr v. Marsh would lead us to think that under such circumstances the permission to promote the office of the judge would have been granted as of course. In Sherwood v. Ray (1 Moore P. C. 353), in a civil suit instituted by a father to annul the marriage of his daughter as incestuous, and which came before the Judicial Committee on appeal, the objection having been urged that the father had no civil interest to enable him to maintain the suit, Parke, B. in delivering the judgment of the court, of which Sir J. Nicholl had been a member, as a ground for holding that the possibility of having to support the offspring, if legitimate, under 43 Eliz. c. 2, was a sufficient interest to entitle him to sue, observes that "this may be the only form in which any individual can question the marriage as matter of right." "For," says the learned judge, "to promote the office of judge in a criminal suit requires the authority and consent of the court; and though this is obtained without difficulty in ordinary practice, it cannot be demanded ex debito iustitie." But it is here to be observed that this was not the point to be determined in the cause, nor had it been adverted to in the argument, but appears to have been resorted to by the court as a technical, certainly not being a substantial, ground for holding that the very remote possibility of having to maintain the issue, if legitimate, furnished a sufficient interest to sue to annul the marriage. Though, technically speaking, it might be true that the office of the judge could not be claimed as of right ex debito iustitie, no one can doubt that it would have been allowed as of course to a father seeking to set aside the incestuous marriage of his daughter. Moreover, one is at a loss to see how the absence of a right to sue criminally could be any reason for holding that the party had a civil interest entitling him to sue. Lastly, in Elphinstone v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 245, 254), also a case before the Judicial Committee, it is said by Sir Robert Phillimore, in delivering the judgment of the court: "It was decided by their Lordships in the case of Sherwood v. Ray, which was one of great importance, and very carefully considered by the eminent judges who sat upon it among whom was Sir John Nicholl—perfectly acquainted with the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts—that the promotion of the office of the judge, though generally permitted as a matter of course, cannot be demanded ex debito iustitie." There is here, we cannot help thinking, some mistake. As has been observed, the point was not decided in Sherwood v. Ray, it was only thrown in by way of argument; but the language of Sir Robert Phillimore shows that he—himself an eminent authority—and the other members of the Judicial Committee who sat in Elphinstone v. Purchas, took the same view of the question as had been incidentally expressed in the former case. Looking to these authorities, it appears to us that neither of the conflicting propositions thus put forward is tenable to the full extent to which it has been urged. The result of the authorities as to the former law appears clearly to be that although, as may be gathered from Maidman v. Malpas and other cases, it was necessary for a party desirous of proceeding in a penal suit in an Ecclesiastical Court to obtain leave to promote the office of the judge, yet if the charge involved an offence against the ecclesiastical law, and there was no reason for doubting the bona fides of the complaint, and the complainant was a proper person to institute the suit, and of ability to pay costs if he failed in it, the leave was never withheld, but, on the contrary, was always granted as a matter of course—we had almost said of right—without any precognition of the case as to its intrinsic merits, or reference to the position of the accuser, whether parishioner or otherwise, beyond his fitness to carry on the suit. Theoretically it may be correct to say that leave to promote the office of the judge could not be claimed ex debito iustitie, and that if it had been refused the party would have been without redress—at all events, so far as the remedy by mandamus was concerned. But it is, nevertheless, plain that to refuse it, except in very special cases, would have been a denial of justice, to which we may presume that no ecclesiastical judge would have been a party. This being so, we do not feel warranted in assuming, in the absence of positive enactment, that, in transferring the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court to the bishop, the Legislature can have intended to place a party desirous of prosecuting a clerical offence in a less advantageous position than he would have been in before the statute. We find nothing in the provisions of the statute which has or, so far as appears, can have been intended to have the effect of taking away the right of instituting a suit against a clerk in orders where it existed previously, all that the statute does being to alter the mode of proceeding. Instead of obtaining leave to promote the office of the judge from the bishop's court, the prosecutor must now apply directly to the bishop, who, under the terms of the 3rd section, would have to see, as the judge had before, that the complaint involved an offence of ecclesiastical cognisance, it being to such only that the enactment applies. But with this limitation we see nothing that alters or affects the right of a party desirous to prosecute, or which debars him from calling upon the bishop, thus substituted for the judge, to set the law in motion by either issuing a commission under the 3rd section or at once sending the complainant to the court of the province under the 13th section. It is difficult to suppose that if the intention of the Legislature had been so to modify the right of a party desirous to prosecute as to make it contingent on the will of the bishop, it would not have said so in clear and unambiguous terms. Of course nothing would have been easier than to do this. The transposition of the words "if he shall think fit" in the 3rd section so as to make them govern the whole instead of prefixing them to the action of the bishop ex proprio motu, would obviously have had that effect, whereas their present collocation leads strongly to the opposite conclusion. But we are invited to follow the history and origin of this legislation in order the better to apprehend the meaning and intention of the enactment in question. It is true that the Ecclesiastical Courts Commissioners, in their report of 1832, having pointed out the evil of the great delays and expenses attendant on the pro-section of penal suits in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and which had been strikingly exemplified in certain recent suits which had caused considerable scandal, recommended that the proceedings in the prosecution of offences against clerks in orders should be transferred to the bishop. But they further proposed as part of their scheme, as a protection against vexatious suits, that there should be a preliminary inquiry on oath before the bishop, with a view to his allowing or disallowing the suit to proceed, with, in case of his disallowing it, an appeal to the archbishop. The first part of this recommendation was adopted, but not the remainder. It was not till some years afterwards that—in 1840—the Government carried through Parliament the Church Discipline Act, in which, for the preliminary hearing before the bishop recommended by the commissioners, was substituted, the commission to be appointed under sect. 3, by whose report the bishop, except where he chose at once to institute proceedings by letters of request, was to be guided as to allowing the suit to proceed. We see nothing in the circumstances under which this statute was passed to lead us to think that it was intended to do more than to afford the accused clerk the protection of the preliminary inquiry by the commission. For the discretion proposed by the report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—to be given to the bishop to be exercised, it must be remembered, after inquiry on oath—was substituted the inquiry by the commission, upon whose decision the further prosecution of the suit was to depend. It is also, perhaps, not altogether beside the question to observe that the suits to which the commissioners were referring were for the most part suits against clergymen for immorality. The movement in the Church with respect to doctrine and ritual of a Roman Catholic tendency had not then as yet arisen, and it may well be doubted whether, if that movement could have been foreseen, the Legislature would have placed any additional restraint on the right of parishioners to bring innovations of such a nature to the test of legal decision. Far, therefore, from affording any proof of the intention of the Legislature to give an absolute and unfettered discretion to the bishop, the prior state of the law and the origin of the statute have rather a contrary tendency. But, instead of speculating on the legislative intention by reference to extraneous circumstances, we think it safer to found our view on the internal evidence afforded by the statute itself. Now, finding nothing in the enactments or language of the 3rd section or other parts of the Church Discipline Act which should have the effect of controlling or qualifying the words "it shall be lawful," but, on the contrary, finding the language of the section pointing, as it seems to us, the other way, we can see no ground which would justify us in giving to those words any other than the meaning which the established canon of construction had ascribed to them. With this rule before us, we do not deem ourselves called upon to enter into the subject of the inconveniences on which the Lord Bishop dwelt in his argument as likely to result from withholding from a bishop the free exercise of his discretion. These considerations, if well founded, might be well worthy the attention of the Legislature, but they cannot prevail against the Act as it stands. Moreover, it might be thought that any such inconveniences would be outweighed by the object to which so much legislation has been directed—namely, the maintenance of uniformity of doctrine and ritual in the Church. It should be observed that this construction of the statute will not take from the bishop the discretion which the judge previously exercised of judging whether the facts complained of constitute an ecclesiastical offence or not. For, as we have said, it is only to complaints of such offences that the Act relates; and the constitution of the commission, one member of which must be the bishop's officer, and the rest are to be of his own selection, will insure a careful consideration of the case, and protect clergymen against frivolous and vexatious charges. When it is said on the part of the bishop that if he is not invested with the discretionary power for which he contends he must issue a commission in every case in which it is applied for, no matter how frivolous or vexatious the proceeding may be, the answer is that no such consequence will follow; for if the application be of the character alluded to, this court, in the exercise of its discretion, would refuse to issue a mandamus. And that this court has the right to exercise such discretion cannot be doubted. (See Rees v. The Bishop of Chester, 1, T. R. Rep. 396-408, and Reg. v. The Bishop of Winchester, 2 E. & E. 209-223). On the whole, therefore, the only conclusion at which we can arrive is that a duty is here cast upon the bishop, where complaint is made of that which constitutes in a clerk in orders an offence against the ecclesiastical law, of issuing a commission, unless he thinks proper—and herein he undoubtedly has a discretion—to send the case at once by letters of request to the provincial court. The view we take of the enactment in question is confirmed by the opinion of the late Dr. Lushington, we need not say a great authority in all matters of ecclesiastical law. His opinion on this point appears from a report of a case of Ditcher v. Denison, a proceeding against the Dean of Taunton, in which Dr. Lushington acted as assessor to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and which was cited by Dr. Stephens on an application to this court for a mandamus to the Bishop of London in the case of Mr. Bennett. Referring to the 3rd section of the Act, Dr. Lushington there says: "It is perfectly clear that if a bishop under this statute thinks fit, he has a discretion which he is entitled to exercise whether he will himself of his own mere motion direct proceedings to be commenced. It is not so with reference to an application made to the bishop, and for various reasons. If it were so, the ancient law of the Church would have been subverted by this statute, which there was no intention to do." Having cited the judgments of Lord Stowell and Sir John Nicholl with respect to the former state of the law, Dr. Lushington proceeds: "What would be the consequence, if the archbishop or bishop had a purely discretionary power to order the commencement of the proceedings according to his own judgment, or, I might also say, according to his fancy? Why, in every bishopric within a province or within the whole kingdom of England, it would rest entirely in the power of a single bishop either to permit a prosecution against any ecclesiastic for any alleged unsound doctrine or immoral conduct, or, according to his own mere opinion, he might prevent any discussion taking place and any charge, however serious, from being considered. The consequences of which would be that the uniformity which now happily prevails among the clergy of this country would be destroyed or subverted." In this view we entirely concur, and it is materially confirmed by the fact that the uniformity on which Dr. Lushington congratulated his hearers has unhappily ceased to exist. If the construction contended for by the bishop should prevail, looking at the wide differences of opinion prevailing among the clergy in reference to rites and ceremonies, it might well be that in a short time uniformity in the realm might disappear, and diocesan uniformity take its place, which again would be liable to vary with each succeeding ordinary. Whereas, if the law is to be enforced, any doubtful or disputed question of doctrine or ritual may be brought to the test of legal decision, if necessary by the appellate tribunal in the last resort. This being, in our opinion, the construction to be put on the Act of 1840, the question already adverted to presents itself, whether this statute has not been virtually abrogated by the Act of 1874, commonly called the Public Worship Regulation Act, the two statutes being in pari materia, and apparently inconsistent with one another. That the two statutes are in pari materia as regards offences relating to ritual is clear. Both were passed for the purpose of establishing a new method of proceeding in the trial of offences committed by clergymen in substitution for the previously existing procedure; the only difference in this respect being that, while the earlier Act refers to "any offence against the laws ecclesiastical" committed by any clerk in holy orders, the later statute enumerates the particular offences to which it is applicable—viz., "firstly, where any alteration in, or addition to, the fabrics, ornaments, or furniture of a church without lawful authority, or any desecration forbidden by law, has been introduced into it; secondly, where the incumbent has within the preceding twelve months used or permitted to be used in a church or burial-ground any unlawful ornament of the minister of the church, or neglected to use any prescribed ornament or vesture; or, thirdly, where the incumbent has failed to observe, or to cause to be observed, the directions contained in the Book of Common Prayer relating to the performance, in such church or burial-ground, of the services, rites, and ceremonies." It is, therefore, plain that, so far as relates to offences committed in the observance of the established ritual, both statutes apply to the offences which form the subject-matter of the complaint in the present instance. If the enactments of the two statutes are inconsistent, the rule would apply that where two statutes are in pari materia, and their enactments cannot stand together, the later statute shall prevail, as being the later exponent of the legislative will. Now when we turn to the later statute we find an entirely new and different system and scheme of proceeding. Though the charge is still to be addressed to the bishop in the form of a representation, it can no longer, unless when it is preferred by the archdeacon or a churchwarden, be made by a single individual, whether a parishioner or not, but requires the concurrence of three parishioners, or, in case of cathedral or collegiate churches, of three inhabitants of the diocese. The commission of inquiry, which was at once the creation and the distinctive feature of the Act of 1840, is entirely superseded, while an absolute discretion is given to the bishop, who is required to further the suit in the manner prescribed by the Act, "unless he shall be of opinion, after considering the whole circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken on the representation;" in which case he is to state in writing the reasons for his opinion, which statement is to be deposited in the registry of the diocese, apparently without any ulterior consequences, thus making the bishop the sole judge and arbiter whether the suit shall proceed, not merely with reference to the nature of the offence charged, or the facts on which the charge may be founded, but enabling him to take into account collateral circumstances, in themselves affording no answer to the accusation, or satisfaction to the parishioners complaining that the public worship is conducted otherwise than according to the ritual of the Church as by law established. It seems at first sight difficult to conceive, in the face of so entire a change in the system of proceeding, that the Legislature can have intended that the two statutes should stand together and the two modes of proceeding remain equally open to parties desirous of prosecuting such a suit, or that while three parishioners are needed under the later Act to set the bishop in motion, who then has an arbitrary discretion to determine whether the suit shall proceed or not, under the earlier Act it shall still remain open to a single individual, whether parishioner or not, to compel the bishop, however unwilling, to put the statutory process in motion. We should therefore have been disposed to hold, with reference to the rule just referred to, that the earlier statute was virtually repealed, and, consequently, that it was not open to the complainant to insist on its application in the present instance. But we are met by the positive enactment contained in the 5th section of the later statute, "that nothing in this Act contained, except as herein expressly provided, shall be construed to affect or repeal any jurisdiction which may now be in force for the due administration of ecclesiastical law." Now, not only was the jurisdiction given by the Church Discipline Act in force when the Public Worship Act passed, but, with the exception of the appellate jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in ecclesiastical suits, to which this saving provision can scarcely have been intended to apply, it was the only jurisdiction in penal matters then in force. And the 18th section of the later statute is conclusive, for it expressly provides that where sentence has been pronounced against an incumbent for an offence under the Act of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, he shall not be proceeded against under this Act, and where any judgment has been so pronounced under this Act, he shall not be liable to be proceeded against under the former statute, thereby conclusively indicating that an offence within the Public Worship Act may still be proceeded against under the earlier statute. This apparently conflicting legislation may, however, be reconciled. The purpose and effect of it appears to be this: The proceeding by commission and the cumbrous procedure by articles in a formal suit being deemed too dilatory in cases of flagrant ritualistic excesses, a more expeditious mode of proceeding and a simpler procedure were made available, subject, however, to more rigorous conditions. If the more expeditious process of the Public Worship Act, in which preliminary inquiry is dispensed with, is invoked, the strictor conditions of the Act as to the number of the complainants and their subjection to the absolute discretion of the Bishop must be complied with. But it still remains open to a party who is willing to adopt the more elaborate process to claim under the former Act the remedy which it affords. All that remains to be considered is whether, the writ of mandamus being a discretionary writ, we should, in the exercise of the discretion which we are undoubtedly at liberty to exercise, decline to issue the writ in this instance. We cannot but be sensible of the apparent incongruity which is involved in the interference of a temporal court between a bishop and one of his clergy, in a matter of ecclesiastical discipline. But it must be remembered that there is a third element in the case which must not be lost sight of. In these questions of doctrine or ritual the laity are interested, and deeply interested, as well as the clergy. As an institution endowed and maintained by the State, the Church exists for the benefit of the laity. It is the right of the latter, being members of the Church, to take part, under the ministrations of the clergy, in the public worship, as well as to have the benefit of the various rites and services of the Church, according to the ritual of the Church as by law ascertained and established. One of their most sacred and valued rights is infringed when they are driven to abandon their churches by the introduction of a ritual which is not that of the Church, and which appears to them to be an advance towards a religion which is not that of the Reformation. It is unnecessary to express any opinion as to the decision which was come to in this respect by this court in the case of Reg. v. Bishop of Chichester, further than that, as it must be taken to be clear that prior to the passing of the Church Discipline Act a stranger would have had no difficulty in obtaining permission to promote the office of the judge in such a suit, as one of the public, in a matter of so much concern to the community as the maintenance of the public worship of the Church as by law established, if the case of a stranger applying for a mandamus should again occur, we might think it necessary to reconsider the matter before we should be prepared to follow the precedent set in that case. But in this case we have no such difficulty as there presented itself. We have here a parishioner, who, as such, has an undoubted right to have the services of the Church performed in the church of the parish to which he belongs, according to the law of the Church as established by the rubric, the canons, and the Acts of Uniformity, complaining that by reason of unlawful practices introduced into the Communion service, his religious sense is so offended that he cannot conscientiously take part in the administration of the Sacrament and demanding inquiry. There cannot be a doubt that a person so circumstanced would, prior to the Church Discipline Act, have been admitted to prosecute as of right, or that his application to promote the office of the judge, the bona fides and substantial character of his complaint not being open to doubt, would have been granted as matter of course. We are of opinion that under such circumstances we have no alternative but to grant the writ. It would be a very different thing if the bishop had declined to grant a commission on the ground that the complaint was frivolous and vexatious, or that it had been prompted by sinister or unworthy motives. Under such circumstances we should have felt ourselves justified in refusing the writ; but nothing of the kind exists here. It is admitted that there has been such a substantial departure by the incumbent from the established ritual as amounts to an offence against the ecclesiastical law. It is not denied that the practices complained of were such as might give offence to the religious conscience of a member of the Established Church, and deter him from partaking in the service of the Communion when thus administered. The refusal of the commission by the bishop was founded, not on the nature of the complaint, or the claim of the applicant to redress, but on collateral and extraneous circumstances which do not alter or affect the offence, but are founded on considerations of expediency, or such as have reference to the person of the party against whom the application is made. Now, not only do we think that, on the construction of the statute, the bishop had no discretion in this matter, but we are further of opinion that the purpose of this legislation being to maintain uniformity of doctrine and ritual, and it being the right of the parishioners to have the services of the church performed according to the law of the Church, even if the bishop had discretionary authority in such a case, he ought, having here a judicial, or, at all events, a quasi-judicial duty to discharge, to have used it to allow an inquiry to take place. We do not think, therefore, that we should be justified as matter of discretion in withholding the writ. But it was suggested that the Public Worship Act having made the concurrence of three parishioners necessary to found a complaint to the bishop, we ought not, in the exercise of our discretion, to give effect by mandamus to the complaint of one. But the obvious answer is that if the Legislature had intended that any change in this respect should be made in the Church Discipline Act, which it advisedly keeps alive, it could have introduced such a provision in the later Act. If it was incumbent on the bishop to entertain the complaint on the application of a single parishioner—and we think he had no discretion in the matter—it cannot be open to us as a matter of discretion to withhold the redress which the applicant seeks at our hands. The rule for a mandamus to the bishop to issue a commission, or send the case at once to the Court of Arches by letters of request, must therefore be made absolute.

APPEAL FROM REVISING BARRISTER.

Parliament—County vote—Late notice of claim—Power of overseers to waive irregularity—6 Vict. c. 18, ss. 4, 5, 37, 40.

shall on or before the 20th July give notice of claim to the overseers. By sect. 5, "the overseers shall, on or before the last day of July in every year, make out a list of all persons who, before the 20th day of July then next preceding, shall have claimed as aforesaid." A claim was delivered to the overseers on the 25th July; the overseers inserted the name of the person claiming in a list of voters which they published on the 29th of the same month.

Held, that the overseers had power to waive the irregularity, and that the list prepared by them was conclusive as to the claim having been duly made.

Davies v. Hopkins (3 C. B. N. S. 376; 30 L. T. 152) followed.

APPEAL from the decision of the revising barrister for the county of Gloucester.

At the revision of the list of voters for the parish of Stapleton, the appellant objected to the name of the respondent being inserted in the list.

The following facts were established by the evidence: That the claim of the respondent to be inserted in the said list of voters for the parish of Stapleton was not delivered or sent to the overseers of the said parish until after the 20th July last, but was delivered to the said overseers on the 25th July last. That the said overseers published the said claim on the 29th July last. That the respondent attended at the said court and duly proved his qualification.

Ten other persons delivered claims to be inserted in the said list under similar circumstances, and such claims were published by the said overseers on the said 29th July, and they also attended at the said court and duly proved their qualifications.

The revising barrister decided that the names of the respondent and of the said ten other persons should be inserted in the said list.

If the court should be of opinion that the decision was wrong, the register of voters for the western division of the county of Gloucester is to be amended by erasing therefrom the names of the respondent and of the said ten other persons.

C. Bowen for the appellant.—By 6 Vict. c. 18, sect. 4, every person desiring to make a claim to vote "shall, on or before the said 20th of July, deliver or send to the said overseers a notice signed by him of his claim, according to the form of notice," &c. And by sect. 5, "the overseers of the poor of every parish and township respectively shall on or before the last day of July in every year make out, according to the form numbered (3) in the said schedule (A.), an alphabetical list of all persons who on or before the 20th of July then next preceding shall have claimed as aforesaid, and in every such list," &c. By sect. 40, "where the name of any person inserted in any list of voters shall have been objected to by the overseers, or by any other persons, and such other person," &c., the "revising barrister shall then require it to be proved that the person so objected to was entitled on the last day of July then next preceding to have his name inserted in the list of voters in respect of the qualification described in such list, and in case the same," &c. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Davies v. Hopkins (3 C. B. N. S. 376; 30 L. T. Rep. 152) in principle governs this case.] It is submitted that that case was wrongly decided.

Anstie, for the respondent, was not called upon.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XI.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the revising barrister was right, and should be affirmed. What may be the power of the court to reverse its own decision I decline to say, because the decision on which I base my judgment is, in my opinion, a right decision. In the present case the objection raised against the claimant is that he did not claim within the day specified in the sects. 4 and 5, and the counsel for the appellant has argued that the claimant must be one who makes a claim within the provisions of the Act, for that if the claimant does not follow the provisions of the Act, he is not a claimant within the meaning of the Act, and consequently has no right to be on the list. No doubt, on the words of sect. 5 there is plenty of ground on which to found such an argument, and, if that section stood alone, there would be considerable force in the argument; but there are other sections, especially sects. 37 and 40, which throw light on that section by showing, first, what the revising barrister has to do when the claimant is not on the list and is objected to; and, secondly, what he has to do when the claimant is on the list and is objected to. Sect. 37 deals with the case of a claimant who is omitted from the list. There the revising barrister is ordered to call on the claimant to show that he is rectus in curia, and that before he is entitled to be placed on the list he has fulfilled all the conditions of the various Acts of Parliament; the revising barrister has, in the words of the section, to see "that such person gave due notice of such his claim to the said overseers," words which are omitted in sect. 40. But when we come to look at sect. 40 and see what is ordered to be done when persons are on the list and are objected to, then all that we find the revising barrister is entitled to require is proof that the claimant was entitled on the 31st July then next preceding in respect of his qualification described in such list to have his name inserted in the list. Changing the collocation of the words, that is the sense of the section. This appears to me to be a strong argument to show that the duty of making the claim and the power of the overseers are correlative, and that the overseers are only concerned with the directions of sect. 5. Such being my opinion with regard to these sections, I find that in Davies v. Hopkins (ubi sup.), a case in which all these sections were before the court, the same conclusions were come to, and I have therefore merely to say that I think Davies v. Hopkins was perfectly well decided, and, on the authority of that case and the construction there placed on the Act, I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was right, and should be affirmed.

GROVE, J.—I am also of opinion that the judgment of the revising barrister must be affirmed, and I base my judgment on Davies v. Hopkins (ubi sup.). That case is admitted to be identical in principle with the present. I was struck with the argument of the appellant's counsel founded on sect. 5 of the Act; and I am not prepared to say that I should have decided against his contention without hearing counsel on the other side if it were not for the decision in Davies v. Hopkins. The strength of the argument is lessened by sects. 37 and 40, which seem to point to the 31st of July as the date to which the revising barrister has to look when considering the qualification of the claimant, and on which the public are informed of the names of the persons on the list and the claimants. But the argument has not satisfied me, on any view of these sections, that Davies v. Hopkins (ubi sup.) was wrongly decided, and I gather from Hadfield's case (L. Rep. 8 C. P. 306), that we must be satisfied the previous decision was clearly and manifestly wrong before we reverse it. I am of opinion, therefore, that the decision of the revising barrister was right.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The claim ought to have been sent in before the 20th July, instead of which it was sent in on the 25th July. This was wrong, and the claimant not having claimed in time had no right to be on the list; so far the case is clear. The question then arises, had the overseers power to receive the claim though not sent in in time? Davies v. Hopkins (ubi sup.) decides that they had, and on a careful review of the sections of the Act, and especially sect. 37, I agree with the conclusions there arrived at, and I am of opinion that, though the claimant had no right to be on the list, yet that his sending in the claim late was an irregularity which the overseers had power to waive.

Decision affirmed with costs.

SMITH v. WOOLSTON. (a)

APPEAL FROM REVISING BARRISTER.

Parliament—County vote—Description of qualifying property—Power of amendment—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 40—28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, s. 6.

A revising barrister has power to amend the description of a voter's qualifying property by striking out such portions of it as he has parted with, and, if what remains is of sufficient qualifying value to confer the franchise, the voter is entitled to remain on the list.

APPEAL from the decision of the revising barrister for the Northern Division of the county of Northampton.

The case stated was as follows:—

At the revision of the list of voters for the parish of Wellingborough, the respondent duly objected to the name of the appellant being retained on the list. The objection was grounded on the third column of the register, and the objection related to the nature of the interest of the appellant in the qualifying property. The name of the appellant was on the list of voters for the parish of Wellingborough.

Christian Name, &c.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, &c., where the Property is situate.
Smith, Henry	33, Norfolk-st., Strand, London.	Freehold land.	Plots 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 176, 177, 178, 179, 175, 475, 476, Victoria Estate.

It was admitted the appellant had parted with all the plots mentioned as above in the fourth column, except plot 476, and that plot 476, which he retained, was freehold land, and of sufficient qualifying value to confer the franchise. The revising barrister was of opinion that the freehold land mentioned in the third column was not the freehold land now possessed by the appellant, and that he had no power to amend the fourth column, as requested by the appellant, by striking out the plots which he had parted with as aforesaid. The revising barrister, therefore, held that the appellant was not entitled to be retained as stated upon the list of voters, and expunged his name from the list of voters. If such decision was correct, such list as revised was to remain without alteration; if such decision was incorrect, the name of the appellant, with his address and particulars of his qualification, was to be added to the revised list of voters for the parish of Wellingborough, in the northern division of the county of Northampton.

Gibbons for the appellant.—The notice of objection was to the third column, where the nature of the qualification is described as freehold, which is admitted to be correct. But, before the revising barrister, an objection was taken to the fourth column, which was not objected to in the notice, that the appellant had parted with fourteen plots out of the fifteen therein mentioned, although the remaining plot was sufficient to qualify him. The revising barrister was wrong to expunge the name from the list on that ground. He had power to amend the description by striking out the surplus plots:

Registration Act, 6 Vict. c. 18, sect. 40. (a)

[He was stopped by the Court.]

Horace Smith for the respondent.—First, where the objection is to the third column, both it and the fourth column must be looked at to ascertain the voter's right to be on the register (Hitchins v. Brown, 2 C. B. 25); and in Howitt v. Stephens (5 C. B. N. S. 30, 39; 32 L. T. Rep. 162), which was a case of an objection to the third column. Byles, J. says, "I read the third and

(a) 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, sect. 40, is, as far as is material, as follows: "That the revising barrister shall correct any mistake which shall be proved to him to have been made in any list, and shall expunge the name of every person whose qualification, as stated in any list, shall be insufficient in law to entitle such person to vote, and also the name of every person who shall be proved to him to be dead; and wherever the christian name, or the place of abode, or the nature of the qualification, or the local or other description of the property of any person who shall be included in any such list, and the name of the occupying tenant thereof, shall be wholly omitted in any case where the same is by this Act directed to be specified therein, or of any person whose name is included in any such list, or his place of abode, or the nature or description of his qualifications, shall, in the judgment of the revising barrister, be insufficiently described for the purpose of being identified, such barrister shall expunge the name of every such person from such list, unless the matter or matters so omitted or insufficiently described be supplied to the satisfaction of such barrister before he shall have completed the revision of such list, in which case he shall then and there insert the same in such list. Provided always that, whether any person shall be objected to or not, no evidence shall be given of any other qualification than that which is described in the list of voters or claim, as the case may be, nor shall the barrister be at liberty to change the description of the qualification as it appears in the list, except for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the same, and where," &c.

fourth columns together." Second'y, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, sect. 4, enacts that the overseers shall every year publish a notice requiring all persons entitled to vote in respect of any property within the parish who shall not be upon the register, and also all who "being upon such register shall not retain the same qualification . . . as described in such register, and who are desirous to have their names inserted in the register about to be made," to give to the overseers notice in writing of their claim. The appellant had parted with the greater portion of his land, and did not "retain the same qualification as described" in the register, and should therefore have made a new claim :

Burton v. Gery, 5 C. B. 7.

[Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Had the appellant parted with only one plot, could the amendment not have been made?] No; he ought to make a fresh claim, that attention may be called to the diminution of his property, and, if it be insufficient, objection may be made. Otherwise one whose actual qualification was doubtful might, by causing it to seem sufficient on the register, prevent valid objection being taken. Williams, J., in Burton v. Gery (ubi sup.), says: "The qualification on the list which has stood the test of public inquiry and investigation having ceased on the voters ceasing to occupy the land, upon principle as well as upon the plain natural meaning of the words of the Act, the new occupation required a new claim."

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case I am not quite certain whether the objection which appears on the case as having been taken before the revising barrister was the objection which has been argued before us. The revising barrister says that the objection "was grounded on the third column of the register, and related to the nature of the interest of the said Henry Smith in the qualifying property." But the third column is "freehold land," and the objection to the nature of the interest would seem to have been, therefore, that the land was not freehold, but copyhold, or some estate other than freehold. If so, that objection entirely fails, the barrister himself saying that the nature of the interest is rightly described as freehold. I am strongly of opinion that it is not the duty of a revising barrister, if one objection is pointed out by notice, to allow another objection to be taken before him; because the voter may come prepared to meet the one objection, and then be surprised by another for which he is not prepared. But it appears that the real objection was not to the tenancy, but to the description of the qualification in the fourth column; the description there specifies fifteen plots on the Victoria estate, and in fact fourteen of them had been sold. One remained in the voter's possession, and that one was sufficient to confer the right to vote. The revising barrister was asked to amend the fourth column by striking out the numbers of the plots sold. He considered that he had no power, but, if his decision was wrong, he thinks that the list should be so amended. We are, therefore, to determine whether the revising barrister had power to make the amendment asked for, and I am of opinion that he had. This is not a case where tricks have been played on the register, as Mr. Horace Smith, in his very able argument, suggested might sometimes happen. If there were any reason to suppose that the voter had put a quali-cation of nine-tenths on the register, when he possessed only one-tenth, and then an objection having been taken, he asked that the correction should be made, and those circumstances were brought to the barrister's notice, I should think it very doubtful whether he ought to exercise the power of amendment. But this case is admitted to be perfectly bonâ fide. I think it is difficult to draw a precise line as to the cases in which the power of amendment should be exercised; but I am of opinion that it should have been in this case. When, in the course of the argument, I put the case of one only of these plots having been sold, Mr. Horace Smith, in order to be logical, was forced to say that the revising barrister could equally not have struck out the one. It is, as I have said, extremely difficult to draw the line within which the power of amendment ought to be exercised, but I think that where no fraud exists, and where the person objected to retains property sufficient to entitle him to a vote, that then anything inserted in the fourth column beyond what he actually possesses may be struck out as surplusage. I am of opinion that the amendment asked for was within the power of the revising barrister, and should have been made. This decision must therefore be reversed.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case finds that "the objection was grounded on the third column of the register, and the objection related to the nature of the interest of the appellant in the qualifying property." My attention has just been called to 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, s. 6, which provides that no notice of objection given under the provisions of the 7th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, "shall be valid unless the ground or grounds of objection be specifically stated therein; and this provision shall be deemed to be sufficiently satisfied by naming the column or columns of the list on which the objector grounds his objection; provided always, that if the objection be grounded on the third column, then it shall be necessary to state in the notice whether the objection relates to the nature of the voter's interest in the qualifying property, or to the value of the qualifying property, or to both; and each of such last-mentioned grounds of objection shall be deemed a separate ground of objection, as well as any objection grounded on any one of the other columns." There seems, therefore, to have been no valid notice of objection in this case. Then as to whether the case falls within sect. 40 of 6 & 7, Vict. c. 18. In Bendle v. Watson (ubi sup.), Willes, J. says: "It is impossible to say this is a description of another qualification; it is an insufficient description of the claimant's qualification, not a description of another qualification; it is the old description, which at one time was true. Then, as respects the exception, 'except for more clearly and accurately defining the same,' the same test applies; it would be a true description to a person who had left the street several years back, and a false one to a person who only knew the new state of things. Then, as to the words 'change the description of the qualification,' there, I think, 'qualification' must mean the nature of the qualification—e. g., freehold—while the object of a number is to individualise, and perhaps, in that sense, describe. I think that throughout, the word 'his' governs the meaning, and as the qualification is the same, and the description one which might in one sense be true, inasmuch as it might indicate the house to some people, and there was no falsification or intention to deceive, the revising barrister ought to have amended." Assuming here that there was no falsification or intention to deceive, and that the qualification remained the same, namely, freehold, the one plot retained by the appellant was sufficient to qualify him. Had the revising barrister power to strike out the plots which were erroneously appended to the description of the appellant's qualification? I think that he had. To put the case suggested by the Lord Chief Justice, suppose the voter had disposed of an insignificant part of his land, could not the barrister have amended? If so, the amount of land disposed of cannot alter his power of amendment, although it might affect the exercise of his discretion.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, determines the first point. Then there remains the point as to whether power is given to the revising barrister by sect. 40 to make the amendment asked for. Looking at that section, I think that the revising barrister would have no power to make an amendment affecting the identity of the property. Here the claimant described the nature of his qualification rightly, viz., as freehold land; he misdescribed, or rather over-described, the amount of land, but there is no change in its identity. That being so, I think the revising barrister had power to amend, and was not restricted by the words of sect. 40, "that he shall not be at liberty to change the description of the qualification as it appears in the list, except for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the same." The mistake amounts, in my judgment, to a mere misdescription. The land is described as Victoria Estate, which in fact it is, and if it has been altered by addition or subtraction, yet the land remains the same, and it appears to me the amendment might in either case be made.

Decision reversed without costs.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Dec. 6, 7, and 9, 1878, and March 22, 1879.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BIPHOSPHATED GUANO COMPANY (LIMITED). (a)

Highway—Agreement to dedicate to public—No actual dedication—Purchaser for value without notice—Lessee—Evidence of dedication—Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50).

B., who was in possession of certain land under an agreement for a lease, entered into an agreement with the vestry of the parish in which the land was situate, whereby the vestry consented to a proposed diversion by B. of a public footpath which crossed the land on condition that he should make a certain new roadway and throw it open to the public. The footpath was diverted (an order authorising its diversion having been obtained from the court of quarter sessions in accordance with the provisions of the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, but the proposed new roadway was not mentioned to the court) and the new roadway was made.

A lease of the land was subsequently executed to B., the land being described in the lease by the reference to a plan, on which the roadway was marked "private road," and being devised "subject to the existing rights of way" over it. B. assigned the lease to a company, and it afterwards became vested in W., as an assignee for value without notice of the existence of any public right of way over the land, and from him it passed to the defendants, whom the present information and suit sought to restrain from obstructing the new roadway:

Held, that, if there had been an actual dedication of the roadway to the public (which the court held on the evidence there had not been), the public would have been entitled to have kept it open against all persons, whether they took with notice of the existence of the highway or not; that the making of the new road could not, under the provisions of the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), be made a condition of the diversion of the old footpath, and the public could not be parties to the arrangement made between B. and the vestry of the parish, and that, although there was a moral obligation on B. to make and throw open the new roadway to the public, and an animus dedicandi on his part, that could lead to no inference of an actual dedication so as to bind a purchaser for value without notice.

Cour. adv. vult.

March 22.—THESIGER, L.J. now delivered the following written judgment of the court.—The defendants to this information and bill are the occupiers of certain lands situate in the parish of East Greenwich, under an agreement for a lease made between one Christopher Weguelin and certain persons carrying on business as guano merchants under the firm of Messrs. Mockford and Co., and the benefit of which agreement was in Nov. 1873 transferred by Mockford and Co. to the defendants, the Biphosphate Guano Company. Weguelin himself was entitled to the lands, as assignee from the Agra Bank (Limited) and Wilkinson Dent, of a lease dated the 14th May 1866, by which the trustees of Morden's College let the lands to Theophilus Alexander Blakely for eighty years from the 25th March 1864. That lease was assigned by Blakely to a company called the Blakely Ordnance Company (Limited), and by that company to the Agra Bank and Dent. The object of the information and suit is to restrain the defendants from obstructing a certain road made upon the lands occupied by the defendants, and communicating at one end with the river Thames, and at the other with a public footpath, and which road it is alleged is either a public highway or road which the defendants, by virtue of their privity in estate with Blakely, the original lessee, were bound by agreement to keep open to the public. Upon the hearing before Fry, J., he decided, first, that there had been no dedication of the road to the public; and, secondly, that assuming an agreement such as was alleged between the vestry of Greenwich and Blakely to have been proved, and to be valid, it could not be enforced against the defendants, on the ground that neither the Blakely Ordnance Company nor the Agra Bank and Dent were affected with notice of the agreement, and consequently that Weguelin, even if he himself had notice, took his assignment unfettered by the agreement. Judgment was accordingly given for the defendants. Upon the appeal it has been objected by the appellants that, looking to the pleadings, the fact of notice was not put in issue by the defendants, except as regards Weguelin, and that the learned judge was not justified in deciding the case upon the want of notice to persons prior in title to Weguelin. We are of opinion that the objection is a well-founded one. The defence of a purchase without notice is one which ought to be specifically alleged as well as proved by those who rely upon it. In this case, on the contrary, the defence as alleged in paragraph 37 of the answer is strictly confined to Weguelin's want of notice, and while Weguelin himself made an affidavit in verification of that defence, no attempt was made on the part of the defendants to carry their evidence further. The objection, too, is one of substance, for the absence from the pleadings of any issue as to notice, except as regards Weguelin, would naturally put the informant and plaintiff off their guard, and prevent their offering any evidence beyond that bearing on the question raised by the pleadings. And, indeed, it would appear that the evidence in relation to this point was limited on both sides to the question so raised. But although we think that the particular grounds taken by the learned judge upon this part of the case were not properly open to him, we are of opinion at the same time that his judgment on this branch of the case may be supported upon the ground of want of notice in Weguelin. The way in which it is attempted to affect him with notice is by showing that upon the plan prepared for the sale by auction, and by reference to which he purchased, the road in question appears as terminating at the river Thames at a point marked "Ferry from

Blackwall Stairs," and it is contended that this indicated to all intending purchasers that the road leading to the river was in whole or in part a public one. But the answer to this contention is, first, that no ferry in the legal sense of the term, and no regular ferry in the popular sense of the term, really existed; secondly, the road, a part of which is claimed as public, is marked generally in the plan as a private road, and consequently there is nothing to indicate to the purchaser anything more than that a private road existed, and that persons entitled to use it might be ferried across the river to and from Blackwall. We would add that the lease to Blakely, if inspected by the purchaser, would give still less indication of any public right having been created over the road in question, for upon the plan attached to that lease the very part of the road claimed as public has written upon it the words "private road." Consequently, although the lease was made subject to all rights of way, and a purchaser might be held affected with notice of ways, not shown on the plan, but really existing, he could hardly be said to be affected with notice that a road, which at the date of the lease was a mere paper road, and marked on the plan as private, was, in fact, public. Being of opinion that Mr. Weguelin was a purchaser without notice, it becomes unnecessary to consider whether or no the vestry of Greenwich were compelled to contract, and did in point of fact and law, contract with Captain Blakely for the formation by him of the road in question. But the question remains: was there a dedication of the road to the public; for, if so, the public are entitled to have it kept open against all persons, whether they took with notice of the existence of the highway or not. This question appears to have been almost passed over in the court below, where the agreement was made the foundation of the present appellants' claim, and the subject of the learned judge's decision. In this court it has formed the prominent feature of discussion, and being sufficiently, although not very definitely, raised by the pleadings, must be decided upon. The argument has raised an important point of law with reference to the power of a lessee to dedicate, at least as against himself and his assignees, a highway to the public; but that point can only, as a matter of necessary decision, arise after the court is satisfied that the evidence establishes such a contract on the part of the lessee on the one hand, and the public on the other, as would if the lessee were an owner in fee amount to proof of dedication in fact. We proceed, therefore, to consider the evidence, but before doing so would first call attention to the allegations of the parties in their respective pleadings. In paragraph 11 of the amended information and bill of complaint, the appellant's case is thus alleged: "In pursuance of the said order (the order made by the court of quarter sessions on the 6th April 1865), and in part performance of the said agreement in that behalf, the said Theophilus Alexander Blakely diverted, turned, and stopped up the said public highway or footway in the manner proposed and agreed as aforesaid, and he caused a new footway, not less than five feet in width, to be made as shown on the said plan, in lieu of so much of the said old public highway or footway as was stopped up, turned and diverted as aforesaid; and he erected and built, or caused to be erected and built upon the said piece or parcel of land so agreed to be demised to him as aforesaid, and over part of the site of the said public footpath, a factory, an engine and boiler house, a smith's shop and office; and in pursuance of his said agreement in that behalf, he caused a new road forty feet in width to be made on and over the said land to the waterside between the places marked with the letters D and E respectively on the said plan, and threw open and dedicated such new road to the public as he had agreed to do, and the said new road was thenceforth, that is to say from the year 1865, used by the parishioners of the said parish of East Greenwich and by the public generally, as a public highway to and from the river Thames without interruption, until it was obstructed and blocked up by the above-named defendants, the Biphosphate Guano Company (Limited)."

That case is met by the defendants in paragraph 19 of the answer, which is as follows: "We cannot say to our knowledge, information, belief, or otherwise, whether the said Theophilus Alexander Blakely did or did not cause a new road, and whether or not forty feet in width, to be made on and over the said land to the waterside, between the places marked with the letters D and E respectively, on the said plan. However, speaking to the best of our knowledge, information, and belief, we deny that, if this was the case, he did so in pursuance of any such agreement as in that behalf alleged in the said information and bill, or that he did in fact throw open or dedicate such new road to the public, as he is alleged to have agreed to do, or that the said alleged new road was thenceforth, that is to say from the year 1865, or from any other time, or in fact has been used by the parishioners of the said parish of East Greenwich, or by the public generally, as a public highway to and from the river Thames without interruption until it was obstructed and blocked up as in the said information and bill in that behalf alleged, for we say that no other road than such private road as herein mentioned has ever existed over the premises, and we insist that, having regard to the limited interest of the said Theophilus Alexander Blakely, he could not, without the consent of both the said trustees of Morden College, and also the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, dedicate any such road to the public, and in fact he did not make any such dedication. However, we admit that a private road has, as aforesaid, for some time existed from the entrance to the property to the river side, in or nearly in the direction marked in the said plan, but the defendants, the company, insist that they have a right to stop up and put a fence across any such part of the same private road as is north of the ditch mentioned in paragraph 5 of our answer, provided that they do not interfere with the pathway, A D C" (a footway). These being the allegations of the parties, the evidence for the informant and plaintiffs was as follows: In the first place, the proceedings between Captain Blakely and the Vestry of Greenwich in 1864, were proved, and from those proceedings it appears that in the clearest and most unmistakable terms Captain Blakely, as an inducement to the Greenwich vestry to consent to the deviation inland of a public footpath, which ran along or near to the bank of the river Thames, had stated that he proposed and intended, if the old footway were stopped up and diverted in another line proposed by him, to give and make a new roadway to the waterside forty feet in width between the places marked with the letters D and E respectively on a certain plan referred to, and to throw the same open to the public. The vestry, in equally clear and unmistakable terms, made their assent to the proposed diversion of the old footway subject, amongst other things, to the proposed new roadway being formed and thrown open to the public, with free access to and from the river Thames to the full extent of the said width of forty feet. This fact is undoubtedly a most important starting point for the appellants. It establishes, at the very least, a moral obligation upon Capt. Blakely to make and throw open to the public the road in question, and it indicates in the strongest manner that could well be conceived, the existence on his part at the time of the animus dedicandi. It tends, therefore, to strengthen and give point and force to any evidence of use by the public of the road when made. But it must not be pressed too far. The public were not and could not be parties to the bargain. The making of the road, though an inducement to the vestry to consent to the diversion of the footpath, was not and could not, looking to the provisions of the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), be made a condition of such diversion. The arrangement was not even put before the court of quarter sessions, which under the Highway Act had to approve, and did approve, of the diversion solely upon the consideration of the advantages of the substituted footpath, and those advantages the public have attained. The bargain between Capt. Blakely and the vestry may, in short, explain doubtful acts, but it cannot remove the necessity of proof that the road in question has been in fact thrown open to the public and used by them, for without such proof the existence at one time of the animus dedicandi, however clearly established, can lead to no inference of a dedication. [His Lordship examined the evidence upon the alleged dedication of the road to the public and the public user of the road, commenting upon its vagueness and insufficiency, and then proceeded:] It seems to us that the result of the evidence fully accounts for the little reliance placed in the court below upon proof of any dedication to the public. We cannot think that, giving the fullest weight to the intention to dedicate evinced in 1864, when the arrangement with the vestry was made, it is reasonable to hold upon such vague and unsubstantial evidence as that adduced on the part of the appellants that such intention was actually carried out. In order to constitute a dedication binding upon the owner of the land, it is not necessary to prove that the parish in which the road alleged to be dedicated is situate has taken to the road so as to be liable to repair it; but, looking to the importance attributed in 1864 to the promised road by the vestry of East Greenwich, an additional argument against any dedication having existed in the present case is to be found in the fact that after 1864 the parish never repaired or interfered in any way with, and as far as is shown by the evidence, never raised in any shape or form the question of the road which their officer now claims for the public. The affidavits of Alfred David Lewis, William Henry Welch, Henry Johnson, Benjamin Wood, and John Wm. Atkins, filed on behalf of the defendants, explain the character of such user as there has been of any way from the Thames over the defendants' land, and further strengthen the view that neither as regards the certainty of the way used or the persons using it, has there been any such user as is properly required to create a public right of way. Such rights have been held in some cases to have been acquired by user of not many years' continuance, but in those cases the way itself has been clearly defined and the character of the user left no doubt as to the intention to dedicate by the owner of the land over which the way ran, and the assertion of right on the part of the public; but here everything is left vague and uncertain. Time, place, termini, extent of user, persons using, and all matters requiring clear proof, are either scarcely proved at all, or are even proved in a manner unfavourable to the inference of the existence of a public right, and we are of opinion that the appellants have failed to make out any title to relief, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

JAMES, L.J.—The question whether there can be a dedication of a highway to the public by a lessee we have left untouched, to be dealt with when it arises.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

HOYLE (app.) v. HITCHMAN (resp.). (a)

Adulteration—Quality—Prejudice of purchaser—Sale to inspector—38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, s. 6.

The offence created by sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, viz., the sale of an article which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, does not depend upon any pecuniary or personal prejudice to the purchaser, but is committed in the case of a sale to an inspector appointed under sect. 13 to carry out the provisions of the Act, if an ordinary customer would have been prejudiced by such a sale to him.

THIS was a case stated by a metropolitan stipendiary magistrate for the opinion of the court under 21 & 22 Vict. c. 43.

The respondent Hitchman was summoned on the complaint of Hoyle, an inspector, under the Sale of Food Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), for that he "on the 13th Sept. 1878, within the metropolitan police district, did sell, to the prejudice of the said John Hoyle, a certain article of food—to wit, milk, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the said John Hoyle, contrary to the statute 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63."

On the 4th Oct. last the case was heard by Sir James Ingham, the chief magistrate of the police-courts of the metropolis.

The appellant was the inspector of nuisances of the Board of Works for the St. Giles's district, in the county of Middlesex, and was also the inspector duly appointed under the 13th section of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875. He went on the 13th Sept. last to the respondent's shop and asked for half a pint of milk, and upon being told that the price was 1½d. he paid that sum out of money belonging to the said board, for which he had to account, and took possession of the milk. Directly after the purchase was completed he told the respondent's shopman that he was an inspector of nuisances and an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, and that it was his intention to have the milk analysed by the public analyst, whom he named. He then offered to divide the milk into three parts, and did, in fact, so divide it, and sealed up such parts, as required by the Act. One part he delivered to the shopman, and the remaining two parts he took away with him, and delivered one of them to Dr. Redwood, the public analyst, and produced the third part on the hearing of the case. The milk so purchased was found by the public analyst to contain 76 parts milk and 24 parts water, which water had been added to the milk after it came from the cow. On cross-examination by the respondent the appellant stated that he was not prejudiced, and that no injury had been done to him personally.

The respondent submitted that no offence had been established under the 6th section of the Act, as the milk sold was not sold to the prejudice of the purchaser. The magistrate found that the appellant demanded milk; that the article sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded, as it was, in fact, milk and water, and not milk; that the appellant at the time when he purchased the milk had no knowledge as to whether the milk which the respondent sold to him was adulterated or not; that no notice of any kind was given to him that the article sold was milk and water and not milk. Had the purchase in this case been by one of the ordinary customers of the respondent, the offence mentioned in the Act would, in the magistrate's judgment, have been committed. He, however, dismissed the summons, because he thought that, although the appellant did not get the article he paid for, the sale was not, in the circumstances mentioned, a sale to the prejudice of the purchaser within the meaning of the Act, as the milk was purchased by an inspector for the purpose of analysis only.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the magistrate was right in point of law in dismissing the summons.

By the sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 3, the mixing of ingredients injurious to health in any article of food with intent to sell the same, and the sale of the same, are made offences.

Sect. 4 deals in the same way with the mixing of ingredients, so as to affect the quality or potency of drugs.

Sect. 5 exempts from conviction under the two previous sections, when absence of knowledge is proved.

By sect. 6:

No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser.

The provisoes do not apply to this case.

HOYLE (app.) v. HITCHMAN (resp.).

By sect. 13:

Any medical officer of health, inspector of nuisances, or inspector of weights and measures, or any inspector of a market, or any police constable under the direction, and at the cost of the local authority appointing such officer, inspector, or constable, or charged with the execution of this Act, may procure any sample of food or drugs, and if he suspect the same to have been sold to him contrary to any provision of this Act, shall submit the same to be analysed by the analyst of the district or place for which he acts; or if there be no such analyst then acting for such place, to the analyst of another place; and such analyst shall, upon receiving payment as is provided in the last section, with all convenient speed analyse the same and give a certificate to such officer, wherein he shall specify the result of the analysis.

By sect. 14:

The person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis, shall, after the purchase shall have been completed, forthwith notify to the seller or his agent selling the article, his intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst, and shall offer to divide the article into three parts, to be then and there separated, and each part to be marked and sealed, or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit; and shall, if required to do so, proceed accordingly, and shall deliver one of the parts to the seller, or his agent.

By sect. 17:

If any such officer, inspector, or constable, as above described, shall apply to purchase any article of food or any drug exposed to sale, or on sale by retail on any premises or in any shop or stores, and shall tender the price for the quantity which he shall require for the purpose of analysis, not being more than shall be reasonably requisite; and the person exposing the same for sale shall refuse to sell the same to such officer, inspector, or constable, such person shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 10*l*.

March 26.—Poland for the appellant.—The question here raised involves the whole object of the statute. If the magistrate's decision is upheld the legislation on this subject must be a dead letter. The words "to the prejudice of the purchaser" were inserted, as clearly appears from the various sections, merely to protect a tradesman who sells an article different in nature, substance, or quality from that demanded, but of equal or greater value, so as not to prejudice the purchaser. [LUSH, J.—Sects. 13, 14, and 17 expressly provide for sales to an inspector. MELLOR, J.—Let us hear what can be said on the other side.]

Morton Smith for the respondent.—This case was stated in deference to a remark ascribed to the Lord Chief Justice during the argument of a case concerning the adulteration of whisky, which, although it appears in some of the daily and weekly papers, is not contained in either of the legal reports of the case (Sandys v. Small, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. Div. 449; 39 L. T. Rep. N.S. 118); and the magistrate's decision is supported by the majority of five out of seven judges of the Scotch Court of Justiciary in a case of alleged adulteration of cream (Davidson v. McLeod, Cases decided in the Court of Justiciary 1877-8, 4th series, vol. 5, part 22; also reported in the Justice of the Peace of 19th Jan. 1878), in which, although other points are discussed, two at least of the judges based their decisions on the ground of the impossibility of an inspector being prejudiced by such a sale. They were of opinion that the sections relating to sales to inspectors applied only to sales under sects. 3 and 4 of articles injurious to health. [LUSH, J.—It surely cannot be that sect. 17 applies only to sales under those two sections. The words are "to purchase any article of food or any drug exposed to sale."] These words "to the prejudice of the purchaser" appear here for the first time in the legislation on this subject; and this same Act for the first time compels sales to inspectors; it may be therefore that it was intended to enable an inspector to procure a conviction only for the sale of deleterious compounds. [LUSH, J.—Your contention must extend to the purchase of an article, not injurious to health, by an ordinary customer, for a charitable or any other than a personal purpose.] Possibly: but the words "to the prejudice of the purchaser" do not convey the meaning suggested by the appellant, and some weight should be given to them. [LUSH, J.—Without these words, it might be said it was an offence to sell a superior article to that demanded.] A bonâ fide purchaser might be prejudiced even then, if he got an article of a nature he did not want.

March 27.—Poland in reply.—The decision of this court in Sandys v. Small does not involve this point, and there is nothing in the judgments relating to it. There is another case of Sandys v. Markham (41 J. P. 52) in which an adulteration of mustard was discussed before Mellor and Lush, JJ. The case was remitted to the justices on another point, but the prejudice to the inspector was there assumed. So it was in a case of lard, before Kelly, C.B. and Pollock, B. (Book v. Hopley, L. Rep. 3 Ex. Div. 209). The effect of Davidson v. McLeod is merely that the tradesman, having sold cream when cream was demanded of him, could not be convicted under this section, because his cream was not the richest kind of cream. The majority of the judges, although they overrule the conviction, were opposed to the contention that an inspector could not be prejudiced under this section. Cur. adv. vult.

March 28.—MELLOR, J.—In the special case stated by Sir James Ingham, which has been argued on the last two days, concerning a question as to what is an offence within the 6th section of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, we are now prepared to deliver our judgment. The question for us is a very narrow one, for it is found expressly in the case that, had the purchaser of the milk therein described been by one of the ordinary customers of the respondent, the offence created by this section would have been committed. The magistrate also finds that the purchaser was duly constituted as the inspector under the 13th section for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Act; but he dismissed the summons because he thought that, the milk having been purchased by the inspector for the purpose of analysis only, the respondent did not sell it to the prejudice of the purchaser within the meaning of the section. Therefore, it seems that the only ground on which the magistrate had dismissed the complaint was, that the purchaser was not "prejudiced" by the sale of the milk to him. That gives rise to the question whether the "prejudice" contemplated by the 6th section is a pecuniary prejudice. Such a view of the Act would, in my judgment, absolutely nullify its beneficial effect. For if the meaning of the enactment is that the offence cannot be complete without its being "to the prejudice of the purchaser," it is hardly possible that the offence should be brought home to anyone. And this observation, in my view, goes far to show that this construction cannot be the right one. So far as authority is concerned,

HOTLE (app.) v. HITCHMAN (resp.).

there is no direct decision in favour of such a view, and indeed, in the English courts, there is hardly any authority upon the point. For, in the first of the two cases in this court referred to, the 'mustard case' (Sandys v. Markham), my brother Lush distinctly said that, in his view, if the article were adulterated, it must be presumed that it was "to the prejudice of the purchaser," and I could not have dissented from that opinion or I should not have concurred in sending the case down to be re-stated on the other point. And as to the other case (Sandys v. Small), no doubt in the course of the argument the Lord Chief Justice made some such remark, but not by way of a decided dictum, and rather by way of query or suggestion, and the decision went upon the other point, so that there is no authority in the English courts in favour of the view now presented. There is, however, the decision of the Court of Session in Scotland (Davidson v. McLeod), and if the judges had concurred in that view we should have been reluctant to give a decision contrary to their judgment. But, out of seven judges, two of them dissented from the decision altogether, and two more appear to have declined to adopt this view, so that the majority of the Court do not appear to have entertained the view now presented to us, and (if I may presume to say so) I am not prepared to hold that their actual decision upon the case before them was erroneous; indeed, the inclination of my mind is to go along with the majority of the Scotch judges in the conclusions they arrived at. But two, at least, even of the majority who concurred in the decision, appear to have dissented from the view that pecuniary prejudice to the purchaser is essential to constitute the offence, and one of them said that such a view would nullify the operation of the Act. Therefore, in this diversity of opinion as to the meaning of the words "to the prejudice of the purchaser," it cannot be said that the weight of judicial authority is against, and I rather think it is in favour of, the view which we have arrived at after the best consideration we can give to the question as to the true construction of the enactment. It is quite general in its terms, and its terms are very large, nor is there anything to limit them—"if any one shall sell, to the prejudice of the purchaser, any article of food not of the nature, substance, or quality of the article demanded by the purchaser." There is nothing to limit the application of the enactment (as some of the Scotch judges seem to have supposed) to articles deleterious in their nature. And in several of the sections (13 to 17) provisions are made for purchases by public officers for the purposes of analysis and prosecution, assuming that if the article is found to be adulterated the offence will have been committed. It would be strange indeed if all these provisions were to be made nugatory by a construction which would, in effect, come to this—that proceedings could only be taken by private individuals. Here the purchase was made by the inspector under those sections; but surely the case must be treated as though the purchase had been by a private individual. Now, in the case of a private individual no one could dispute that in such a case as this the offence would have been completed; and the magistrate has so found in fact. That being so, what difference can it make as to the nature of the offence that the purchase was by an officer on behalf of the public and furnished with public money for the purpose? If the purchaser asks for a certain article and gets an article which by reason of some admixture of a foreign article is not of the nature or quality of the article he asks for, he is necessarily "prejudiced;" and how can the fact that the purchase is not with his own money at all affect the question of the commission of the offence? The offence intended to be prevented by the Act was the fraudulent sale of articles adulterated by the admixture of foreign substances which would necessarily be to the "prejudice of the purchaser;" and those words were inserted only to require that such an adulteration should be shown to have been made. Taking all these matters into consideration, I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that in such a case as this the offence is less complete merely because the money with which the purchase was made was not the money of the purchaser, which must be wholly immaterial to the seller, and cannot affect the offence he has committed. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the magistrate was wrong in dismissing the case on that ground, and therefore, that the case must be remitted to him to be determined on the evidence as to the offence alleged to have been committed.

LUSH, J.—The 6th section of this Act has given rise to a judicial difference, which has materially crippled the effect of this useful law. The magistrate had high authority for his decision in the judgments of the Justiciary Court in Scotland in the case referred to, although the only dictum in the English courts suggested in its favour is that of the Lord Chief Justice, which does not appear in the Reports. What appears in my Lord's judgment in Sandys v. Small I entirely concur in. He says: "The provisions of the Act were intended to apply to adulterations of a clandestine character, which operate to the prejudice of the purchaser. The provisions of the 6th section seem to me to apply to cases where a seller professes to sell to the purchaser an article as being of a certain denomination, whereas the article has been altered by an admixture of some other ingredients, and it seems that when the article is so altered, this must be considered to have been done to the prejudice of the purchaser, unless it is duly and sufficiently brought to his knowledge." This does not at all imply that an inspector could not under any circumstances be prejudiced. In Sandys v. Markham, I seem to have expressed an opinion that it is a matter of no consequence with what object an article is purchased, and unless we entertained that opinion we should scarcely have sent the case back to the justices. I have carefully studied the Scotch case, and I think myself that the majority of the judges arrived at a correct conclusion, but I must differ from many of the reasons they give. The cream sold in that case was poor, but it was really cream; here milk was demanded, and the article sold was milk and water. This of itself is sufficient reason for our not deciding this case as that was decided. But some of the judges thought that this 6th section could not apply to a purchase by a public officer, and in this I cannot concur. The object of the Act is to prevent adulteration, and for that purpose a machinery is provided for the detection of offences. Sects. 13, 14, and 17 relate to an official buyer, who is to act in the interest of the public; he is to go to tradesmen's shops as a buyer, and is to take proceedings for an offence. Now, what is the offence for which he is to proceed? Why, the sale of the article to this very man; yet it is said that such a sale is not an offence. To my mind, it is unquestionably clear that the words "to the prejudice of the purchaser" cannot exclude from the operation of the Act a sale to an inspector. It is stated by one of the judges in the Scotch case, that these sections as to a public buyer apply only to sects. 3 and 4; but there are no words so to limit them, and I cannot think it was intended to do so. The words "to the prejudice of the purchaser," or some others like them, were necessary here to protect a seller from committing an offence who gave a purchaser something better than that demanded of him. The offence under the 6th section consists not in selling something different from that which is asked for, but in fraudulently handing over to the buyer something to his prejudice; and it matters not who the buyer is, nor what is his object. This is, in my opinion, the clear effect of the Act, and we must remit the case to the magistrate for his further consideration.

REG. v. VICAR AND CHURCHWARDENS OF TOTTENHAM. (a)

Vestry meeting—Summoning authority—Hour of meeting—Right of parishioner.

The vicar and churchwardens of a parish declined to enter upon the notice paper of a vestry meeting a notice of motion by a parishioner that future meetings should be held in the evening.

Held, upon a rule for a mandamus to compel them to do so, that the summoning authority had power to fix the time of each vestry meeting; and that there was no duty to allow notice of a motion which could not have any effect.

THIS was a rule nisi obtained at the instance of Mr. Edward Maitland, a resident and ratepayer of the parish of Tottenham, Middlesex, calling upon the Rev. A. Wilson, the vicar of the said parish, and the churchwardens to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, directed to them, commanding them or such of them to whom the same should of right belong to cause notice of the following motion to be inserted in the notice paper of the next vestry meeting of the said parish, that is to say, "To be moved by Mr. Edward Maitland, that the hour for holding the meetings of the vestry of the parish of Tottenham be 7 o'clock in the evening."

It appeared from the affidavit of the applicant that it had been usual to hold the vestry meetings in this parish at seven o'clock in the evening until the 8th Nov. 1877, on which occasion there was a disturbance, and the vicar, who occupied the chair, adjourned the vestry. The adjourned meeting was held on the 22nd Nov., at eleven o'clock in the morning.

In answer to a letter from the applicant, asking to have the vestry meetings held as before at seven in the evening, the vicar wrote on the 28th

Feb. 1878 that he had come practically to the conclusion that morning vestry meetings were much more conducive to order and despatch of business than the latter.

Subsequently, at a meeting of the ratepayers, it was resolved that it was desirable all future vestry meetings should be held at seven o'clock in the evening; and a deputation was appointed to wait upon the vicar and churchwardens.

On the 23rd March 1878 the vicar declined to receive the deputation, on the ground that the speakers at the meeting seemed to have prejudged the question of the proper authority for calling vestries and regulating their proceedings.

A requisition was afterwards made to the churchwardens by the ratepayers to summon a vestry meeting to consider the question, but no notice was taken of it.

On the 20th July 1878 a formal request was made to the vestry clerk by several ratepayers to insert in the notice paper for the next vestry meeting a notice of motion in the words mentioned in the rule; to which the vestry clerk answered that the request had been submitted to the vicar for insertion, and rejected by him.

On the 7th Dec. 1878 the applicant wrote to the two churchwardens asking why this notice of motion was not included in the notice paper for the vestry meeting held on the 26th Sept., or for that to be held on the 12th Dec. In answer to these letters, one of the churchwardens referred the applicant to the vicar; and the other said the vicar claimed the right of framing the notices of vestry, and therefore he (the churchwarden) had no voice in the matter.

After some further correspondence, on the 19th Dec. 1878, the vicar wrote a letter to the applicant's solicitors, in which he said: "I claim as of right to name the day and hour for holding vestries, and determining agenda: Mr. Maitland claims that the right belongs to the parishioners. This is the issue." He also mentioned in this letter that he had received a memorial signed by a very large number of influential parishioners requesting him to accede to the request for evening vestry meetings.

Phillimore, on behalf of the vicar and churchwardens, showed cause.—The 1st section of 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, requires three days' notice on the church door of the place and hour of holding a meeting of the inhabitants in vestry, of or for any parish, and of the special purpose thereof; and the 2nd section recognises the right of the rector or vicar to preside. By 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 45, s. 3, "no such notice of holding a vestry shall be affixed to the principal door of such church or chapel, unless the same shall previously have been signed by a churchwarden of the church or chapel, or by the rector, vicar, or perpetual curate of such parish, or by an overseer of the poor of such parish." The case of Rees v. Archdeacon of Chester (1 A. & E. 342), is an authority that a chairman of a vestry meeting may appoint a convenient place for taking a poll; and Lord Denman said, at p. 345, "But those who summon a meeting of this kind must necessarily lay down some order for the proceedings." In another case, Reg. v. D'Oyly (12 A. & E. 139, 158), Lord Denman said: "Stat. 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 1, requires notice of the vestry to be given, but does not say who is to give it. We are of opinion that the rector is the fit person; he is at the head of the parish for this purpose." These statutes and authorities go far to show that the persons who have a right to summon a vestry meeting must be competent to fix the time for its assembling; and although it may be that a parishioner is entitled to have a notice of motion in the agenda paper, the vicar and churchwardens are competent to disallow notice of any proposed resolution which would, if passed, be of no effect.

Charles, Q.C. and Oumyngame supported the rule.—The question raised by the rule is whether a majority of a vestry meeting may not fix the hour for a future meeting; and this right, if it exists, can only be exercised upon notice of motion. It may be admitted that no single parishioner can claim to fix the time of a vestry meeting, but when assembled, he can introduce a discussion as to future meetings. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Is it not a fallacy, upon which such a contention must be based? A vestry is not in continuous existence, it is summoned by the act of the vicar or churchwardens. How can one vestry determine at what time another vestry shall meet? The stat. 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 1, relates to a "vestry or meeting of the inhabitants in any vestry or for any parish," which seems to assume the continuous existence of the body which is to meet at a vestry. According to Dawe v. Williams (2 Add. 130), vestries are to be called by the churchwardens with the consent of the minister; and in Butt v. Fellowes (3 Curt. 680) on referring to Dawe v. Williams, it was said at p. 696, that it "does not establish that if any other person calls a vestry, it is not a legal meeting." In the argument of Reg. v. D'Oyly, at p. 148, it was said that a chairman had no right to order the adjournment against the declared wishes of the meeting itself. "Stoughton v. Reynolds (2 Str. 1045) has never been overruled; the best report is in Fortescue (p. 168), and there it is said, 'At the common law anciently, the sheriff could not adjourn the county court; for the suitors, not he, were judges of it, though now the law has put that power in him. But in this case, the law has not placed it in anyone, wherefore we have not the power to take it from those who have it to place it in those who have it not. And even supposing the vicar had a power of presiding, it does not follow that he has the power of adjourning.'" In the same way, the discretion which prima facie exists in the vicar and churchwardens as to the time of meeting may be limited by a direction of the inhabitants as to their future meetings.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It seems to me this rule must be discharged. It is necessary that a vestry meeting should be duly summoned; but whether by the incumbent alone or by the churchwardens alone, or by both together, it is not material for us now to consider. I think we ought not to grant a mandamus for the purpose asked, because the summoning power must, as it seems to me, include the right to fix the time for meeting. It may well be, when once assembled, that it is within the competence of the vestry to adjourn to any hour fixed by the majority, even in opposition to another hour proposed by the vicar and churchwardens; but we are asked to compel the vicar to give notice of a resolution which would distinctly deprive the summoning authority of the power which they must possess, and would abrogate their legal right.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Charles admits that a vestry must be summoned every time it assembles; and this must be by the same persons. In my opinion this admission is enough to preclude the applicant from obtaining this rule. We cannot compel notice of a resolution which, if passed, could not be carried out.

Rule discharged.

NEW RIVER COMPANY (apps.) v. ISLINGTON ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE (resps.). (a)

Metropolitan rating—Valuation list—Increased value of hereditaments—Supplemental list—32 & 33 Vict. c. 67, ss. 43-47.

The second Metropolitan quinquennial valuation list under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, s. 43, came into force in April 1876. During the year following some new houses were built, to which the appellants' mains in existence before the beginning of the year were connected by means of service pipes belonging to the owners of the houses.

Held, upon a case stated, that the increased rents thereby receivable by the appellants constituted an alteration which had taken place in the matters stated in the valuation list within sect. 46, so as to increase the valuation list for the following year.

THE Governor and Company of the New River duly appealed against the Supplemental Valuation List for the parish of St. Mary, Islington, which was made and deposited on the 31st May 1877 under the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), and the Court of General Assessment Sessions, held at the Guildhall, Westminster, on the 14th Feb. 1878, on the trial of the appeal, ordered the said supplemental list to be altered by reducing the gross value of the company's property in the said parish from 23,250*l.* to 22,612*l.*, and the rateable value from 20,700*l.* to 20,100*l.* subject to the opinion of the High Court of Justice (Queen's Bench Division) on the following case:

1. In 1875, pursuant to the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act 1869, the overseers of the parish of St. Mary, Islington, duly made their second quinquennial valuation list in which the land occupied by the water mains, pipes, and reservoirs of the said New River Company in the parish of St. Mary, Islington, were assessed as follows:

Gross value as estimated by overseers, and finally determined by assessment committee	232,500
Rate of deduction per cent.	11½
Rateable value	20,000

2. That list duly came into force on the 6th April 1876, and the company have since paid the rates made in conformity with such list.

3. Between the 6th April 1876 and the 6th April 1877 a certain length of new mains had been laid by the company.

4. Between the 6th April 1876 and the 6th

(a) Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div.] NEW RIVER COMPANY (apps.) v. ISLINGTON ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE (resps.). [Q.B. Div.]

April 1877 a number of new houses had been built, many of which had, in that interval, been connected by means of service pipes with mains in existence prior to the 6th April 1876.

5. The service pipes from the mains to the houses belong to the owners or occupiers of the houses.

6. All houses in the parish of Islington are supplied with water by the New River Company, which is empowered by Act of Parliament to charge the occupiers at the rate of 4l. per cent. upon the annual value of the respective houses.

7. A large number of new houses are built and connected with the mains every year within the said parish.

8. In Feb. 1877 the overseers of the parish made, pursuant to sect. 47 of the said Act of Parliament, a provisional valuation list containing the gross and rateable value of the company's property as increased in value, being 23,250l. gross and 20,700l. rateable.

9. The company in due course objected to such provisional valuation list, but the assessment committee confirmed it.

10. On the 31st May 1877, the supplemental valuation list now in dispute was made and deposited by the overseers pursuant to sect. 46 of the said Act, and in it was embodied the provisional valuation list referred to.

11. The company also duly objected to the supplemental valuation list, which objection was however disallowed, and the list finally approved by the assessment committee.

13. The figures of the supplemental valuation list show an increase of 750l. upon the gross, and of 700l. upon the rateable value.

14. A portion of this increase, viz., 112l. gross, and 100l. rateable value, relates to the rating of the land occupied by the new mains, and is not now in dispute.

15. The remainder represents the increased value of the water mains, pipes, and reservoirs derived from the connection of the mains existing prior to the 6th April 1876 with houses built between the 6th April 1876 and the 6th April 1877.

16. It was arranged between the parties that the General Assessment Sessions should not be asked to settle the amount of the assessment to be entered in the supplemental valuation list, but simply to determine the basis upon which such amount should be calculated, as the parties would have no difficulty after the decision of the question of law in agreeing to the amount thereof.

17. The company contend that they are not liable to have their assessment increased by reason of the increase of their gross receipts in the parish arising from the additional water rentals derived from connections of new houses with mains which were in existence prior to the year which the supplemental list of 1877 was made to cover, and that the mains being in existence before the 6th April 1876, the assessment of the company could not be increased by reason of such mains being made to supply additional houses between the 6th April 1876 and the 6th April 1877.

18. The assessment committee contend that the rateable hereditaments of the company had under the circumstances mentioned increased in value by reason of the mains being connected with the new houses during the year which the supplemental valuation list in dispute was made to cover, viz.: from the 6th April 1876 to the 6th April 1877; and that a tenant would pay more for the company's property after such connections had been made than before; and, further, that there had been a structural alteration in the property during the said year ending 6th April 1877 by tapping the mains in front of the houses for the purpose of connecting the pipes from the houses with the mains; that there was both an alteration in the company's property and an increase in the value thereof within the meaning of sect. 47, and that the increase of the assessment was not to be limited to the value of the new mains put in the land since the commencement of the year (6th April 1876) which the supplemental list in dispute was made to cover.

The Court of General Assessment Sessions decided in favour of the company, and ordered the supplemental valuation list to be reduced as before-mentioned.

The question for the opinion of this court was whether the increase in the value of the company's property by reason of the increase in the gross receipts derived from the new connections mentioned in paragraph 4 is such an increase as is within the meaning of sections 46 and 47 of the said Act.

If the court shall answer this question in the affirmative, then the order of sessions is to be quashed and the supplemental valuation list to remain as originally approved by the assessment committee or to be altered as agreed between the parties.

If the court shall answer this question in the negative, then the order of sessions is to be confirmed.

By the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), s. 43:

The valuation list as approved by the assessment committee, and if altered on any appeal under this Act to any sessions or a superior court, as is altered, shall come into force at the beginning of the year (commencing on the 6th April) succeeding that in which it is made, and shall last for five years, subject to any alterations that may be made by any supplemental or provisional list as herein-after mentioned.

By sect. 45:

The valuation list for the time being in force shall be deemed to have been duly made in accordance with this Act and the Acts incorporated herewith, and shall for all or any of the purposes in this section mentioned (amongst them, for all rates made in the metropolis on the basis of value) be conclusive evidence of the gross value and of the rateable value of the several hereditaments included therein, and of the fact that all hereditaments required to be inserted therein have been so inserted.

By sect. 46:

Every valuation list shall be revised in manner directed by this Act, and such revision in every period of five years (the first of such periods beginning with the 6th April 1871) shall be conducted as follows:

1. In each of the first four years of such period, a supplemental list shall, if necessary, be made out, in the same form as the valuation list, and shall show all the alterations which have taken place during the preceding twelve months in any of the matters stated in the valuation list, but shall contain only the hereditaments affected by such alterations.

4. A supplemental list and a new valuation list shall come into force at the beginning of the year succeeding that in which they are respectively made, in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as the valuation list made in the first year after the passing of this Act.

5. In each of the last four years of such period the valuation list which was in force on the day before the commencement of each such year, together with and as altered by the supplemental list, if any, which comes into force at the commencement of such year, shall be the valuation list which is in force during that year.

By sect. 47:

If in the course of any year the value of any hereditament is increased by the addition thereto or erection thereon of any building, or is from any cause increased or reduced in value, the following provisions shall have effect:

1. The overseers of the parish in which such hereditament is situate may, and on the written requisition of the assessment committee, or of any ratepayer of the union, or of the surveyor of taxes for the district, shall send to the assessment committee a provisional list containing the gross and rateable value, as so increased or reduced, of such hereditament.

8. A provisional list, signed as aforesaid, shall have operation from the date of the service by the clerk of the assessment committee of a copy of the list and notice on the occupier, and shall continue in force until the first list (supplemental or other) which is subsequently made, comes into force.

10. A provisional list during the time that it is in force shall be deemed to form part of the valuation list for the time being in force, and shall (so far as is necessary) be substituted for so much of that valuation list as relates to the same hereditament, and every rate and tax in respect of which the valuation list is conclusive, which are respectively made or charged after the provisional list comes into force, and the proportion of the current rate charged as before provided in this section, shall be levied accordingly.

A. Wills, Q.C. and Clerk, for the respondents, the Assessment Committee, were stopped by the Court.

Webster, Q.C. and Russell Griffiths, for the appellants, the New River Company.—The valuer at the commencement of each quinquennial period ought to take into consideration the probable increase of value during the period in those hereditaments which continue without alteration. We do not dispute the increase upon the new mains; but the connection of service pipes to the old mains is not "an addition thereto or erection thereon of any building" in the words of sect. 47, which justifies an increase in a provisional or supplemental valuation list. The whole object of a quinquennial valuation list will be lost if every alteration in the value of unaltered hereditaments is to affect the rateable value; and the inconvenience in arriving at the probable rent of the hypothetical tenant must be greatly increased thereby.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We need not trouble Mr. Wills again. Mr. Webster has given us a very ingenious argument, and has pointed out the inconveniences of a plain construction of the statute. We cannot, however, provide for the consequences of the manifest aim of the Legislature, and cannot avoid the effect of the words which have been used. The provision is clear; the supplemental list is to be made to "show all the alterations which have taken place during the preceding twelvemonths in any of the matters stated in the valuation list;" it is, indeed, more intelligible than such provisions always are. It must be intended that injustice should be remedied, if by extraordinary or unlooked-for circumstances any great addition or reduction of value may take place. Not, perhaps, that every minute detail need be considered when the question of retaining or altering the valuation is to be determined; but if there be a substantial change in the value of a hereditament, such as there is found here to be the case with respect to these mains, then effect must be given to it in the valuation for the remainder of the period. There is but one interpretation for the words of the 46th section; and the 47th merely affords a means by which the 46th is to be carried out.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I can only give the 46th section the interpretation which my Lord applies to it. There is no other possible meaning to the words.

MELLOR (app.) v. DENHAM (resp.). (a) School Board—Bye-laws—Attendance of children employed in factories—7 & 8 Vict. c. 15, s. 31—33 & 34 Vict. c. 75—37 & 38 Vict. c. 44, ss. 6 & 15—39 & 40 Vict. c. 79, ss. 5, 6, 7.

By the Factory Act 1844, s. 31, it is enacted that it shall be lawful to employ any child ten hours in a factory on alternate week days, provided (inter alia) that on the other alternate days, the child shall attend school for five hours a day, except Saturday.

By the Elementary Education Act 1870, s. 74, school boards may make bye-laws provided (inter alia) that no bye-law shall be contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour.

The respondent was summoned for breach of a bye-law made by a school board requiring all children to attend school twenty-seven hours a week, his child being employed and duly attending school under the Factory Acts.

Held, that the school board was not entitled to enforce their bye-law in respect of children who, although not obeying such bye-law, were fulfilling and observing the conditions of the Factory Acts; and that the justices were right in refusing to convict the respondent.

THIS was a case stated by four of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the borough of Oldham, in the county of Lancaster, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose as hereinafter stated.

(1.) At a petty sessions holden at Oldham aforesaid, in and for the said borough on the 3rd Oct. 1878, an information preferred by James Mellor (hereinafter called the appellant) against Thomas Denham (hereinafter called the respondent) under the bye-laws of the School Board for the district of the borough of Oldham duly made on the 12th March 1877, and confirmed in pursuance of sect. 74 of the Elementary Education Act 1870, charging that "the respondent, being the parent of a child called Joseph Denham, who was in his custody and not less than five nor more than thirteen years of age, did unlawfully neglect and omit to cause the said child to attend school the whole of the ordinary school hours as required by the said bye-laws, he, the said Thomas Denham, not having a reasonable excuse for such non-attendance," was heard and determined by the said justices, who dismissed the said information.

(2.) The appellant being dissatisfied with this determination upon the hearing of the said information, applied in writing for a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination for the opinion of this court, and duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf.

(3.) Therefore the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, stated and signed the following case.

(4.) Upon the hearing of the said information it was proved on the part of and by the appellant, and found as a fact, that the said child did not attend school during the whole of the ordinary school hours, and that the child was ten years and six months old, and the bye-laws of the said school board, of which a copy was attached to this case, were put in evidence and proved.

(5.) It was also proved on the part of the respondent that the child was employed at the cotton factory of Messrs. Radcliffe and Sons in Oldham, and was attending an efficient elementary school regularly pursuant to the Factory Acts 1833 to 1874.

(6.) It was contended on the part of the appellant that, by virtue of the bye-laws of the board made in pursuance of the 74th section of the Elementary Education Act 1870, the board could, if they thought fit, compel children to attend school during the whole of the school hours; and that this applied notwithstanding that such children were working at a factory and attending an efficient elementary school in conformity with the provisions of the Factory Acts 1833 to 1874; and that there was nothing in the said Acts restraining the powers conferred on the board by the Elementary Education Act 1870, that there was nothing in the bye-laws contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour, and that the Elementary Education Acts 1870 and 1876 controlled the Factory Acts 1833 to 1874.

(7.) The justices, however, being of opinion that, as the child was attending an efficient elementary school pursuant to, and was otherwise fulfilling the conditions and provisions of the Factory Acts 1833 to 1874, the school board could not compel him to attend school during the whole of the school hours under their bye-laws; that the child was within the exemption created by the 5th bye-law; that the language of the Elementary Education Acts 1870 and 1876 keeps in force the provisions of the Factory Acts with respect to the education of children between the ages of ten and thirteen years employed pursuant to those acts; and that the bye-laws with reference to the case before them were ultra vires, gave their determination against the appellant in manner before stated.

(8.) During the hearing of the case reference was made to the bye-laws of the Oldham School Board, which were made under the authority of sect. 74 of the Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75): bye-law No. 5 was in effect the repetition of the proviso contained in that section: "Provided that no such bye-law shall be contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour."

The other bye-laws, all of which formed part of the special case, were immaterial to the point discussed, except bye-law No. 3, which required that the time during which children between the ages of five and thirteen residing in the district were to attend school, should be the whole of the ordinary school hours, being not less than twenty-seven hours a week.

(9.) The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court therefore were:

(1) Are the Oldham School Board able to enforce their bye-laws against children between the ages of ten and thirteen years, who although not obeying such bye-laws are attending efficient elementary schools, pursuant to and otherwise fulfilling and observing the conditions of the Factory Acts 1833 to 1874?

(2) Do the Elementary Education Acts 1870 & 1876 control the provisions of the said Factory Acts regulating the education of children employed in pursuance of the last-mentioned Acts?

(10.) And the court was humbly solicited according to the powers vested in the court by the said statute (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43) to remit the case to the said justices with the opinion of the court thereon, or to make such other order as to the court might seem fit.

By the Factory Act 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 15), sect. 30, it is enacted,

That no child shall be employed in any factory more than six hours and thirty minutes in any one day, save as hereinafter excepted, unless the dinner time of the young persons in such factory shall begin at one of the clock, in which case children beginning to work in the morning may work for seven hours in one day; and no child who shall have been employed in a factory before noon of any day shall be employed in the same or any other factory, either for the purpose of recovering lost time or otherwise, after one of the clock in the afternoon of the same day, save in the cases when children may work on alternate days, or in silk factories more than seven hours in any one day, as hereinafter provided.

By sect. 31, after making provision for the employment of a child in a factory on three alternate days of every week, it is enacted (inter alia) as follows:

Provided always that the parent or person having direct benefit from the wages of any child so employed, shall cause such child to attend some school for at least five hours between the hours of eight of the clock in the morning and six of the clock in the afternoon of the same day on each week day preceding each day of employment in the factory, unless such preceding day shall be a Saturday, when no school attendance of such child shall be required: Provided also that on Monday in every week after that in which such child began to work in the factory, or any other day appointed for that purpose by the inspector of the district, the occupier of the factory shall obtain a certificate from a schoolmaster according to the form and directions given in the schedule (A) to this Act annexed, that such child has attended school as required by this Act.

Sect. 38:

Save as herein otherwise provided, the parent or person having any direct benefit from the wages of any child employed in a factory shall cause such child to attend some school on the day after the first employment of such child, and thenceforth on each working day of every week during any part of which the said child shall continue in such employment, so that on every such day except in the cases hereinafter provided, such child shall attend school during at least three hours after the hours of eight of the clock in the morning and before the hour of six of the clock in the evening: Provided always that any child attending school after one of the clock in the afternoon, shall not be required to remain in school more than two hours and a half on any one day between the first day of Nov. and the last day of Feb., and no child shall be required to attend school on any Saturday.

Q.B. Div.]

MELLOR (app.) v. DENHAM (resp.).

By the Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), sect. 74, Every school board may, from time to time, with the approval of the Education Department make bye-laws for all or any of the following purposes:—(1) Requiring the parents of children of such age, not less than five years nor more than thirteen years, as may be fixed by the bye-laws, to cause such children (unless there is some reasonable excuse) to attend school; (2) Determining the time during which children are so to attend school; provided that no such bye-law shall prevent the withdrawal of any child from any religious observance or instruction in religious subjects, or shall require any child to attend school on any day exclusively set apart for religious observance by the religious body to which his parent belongs, or shall be contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour; . . . Provided that any bye-law under this section requiring a child between ten and thirteen years of age to attend school shall provide for the total or partial exemption of such child from the obligation to attend school, if one of Her Majesty's inspectors certifies that such child has reached a standard of education specified in such bye-law.

By the Factory Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 44), sect. 6, it is enacted that

In a factory to which this Act applies, the children may be employed either in morning and afternoon sets, or for the whole day on alternate days, and the following regulations shall be observed:

(1) When the children are employed in the morning and afternoon sets:

(a) A child who on any day except Saturday is employed before noon, shall not on the same day be employed after one o'clock in the afternoon, or if the hour of dinner be one o'clock, after such hour of dinner; and

(b) A child shall not be employed on Saturday in two successive weeks, nor on Saturday in any week, if on any other day in the same week he has been employed for more than five hours; and

(c) A child employed in the factory shall attend school in manner directed by sect. 38 of the Factory Act 1844; and the provisions of that Act with respect to such attendance, and certificates thereof, shall apply accordingly; and

(2) Where the children are employed on alternate days:

(a) A child may be employed during the same hours, and with the same hours for meals, as young persons and women in a factory; and

(b) A child shall not be employed in any manner on two successive days; and

(c) A child employed in the factory shall attend school in manner directed by sect. 31 of the Factory Act 1844; and the provisions of that Act with respect to such attendance, and certificates shall apply accordingly.

By sect. 15, it is enacted

That after the 1st Jan. 1876, attendance at a school in England, which is not for the time being recognised by the Education Department as giving efficient elementary instruction shall not, in the case of a child employed in a factory to which this Act applies, be deemed to be attendance at a school within the meaning of this Act or the Factory Act 1844.

By the Elementary Education Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 79), sect. 5, it is enacted as follows:

A person shall not after the commencement of this Act take into his employment (except as hereinafter in this Act mentioned) any child—

(1) Who is under the age of ten years; or

(2) Who being of the age of ten years or upwards, has not obtained such certificate either of his proficiency in reading, writing, and elementary arithmetic, or of previous due attendance at a certified efficient school as is in this Act in that behalf mentioned, unless such child being of the age of ten years or upwards is employed, and is attending school in accordance with the provisions of the Factory Acts, or of any bye-law of the local authority (hereinafter mentioned) made under sect. 74 of the Elementary Education Act 1870 as amended by the Elementary Education Act 1873 and this Act, and sanctioned by the Education Department.

By sect. 6,

Every person who takes a child into his employment in contravention of this Act shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings.

By sect. 7,

The provisions of this Act respecting the employment of children shall be enforced: (1) In a school district within the jurisdiction of a school board, by that board; and (2) in every other school district by a committee to be appointed annually by the town council or guardians, such board or committee being referred to in the Act as "the local authority." Provided that it shall be the duty of the inspectors and sub-inspectors acting under the Acts regulating factories, workshops, and mines respectively, and not of the local authority, to enforce the observance by the employers of children in such factories, workshops, and mines of the provisions of this Act respecting the employment of children; but it shall be the duty of the local authority to assist the said inspectors and sub-inspectors in the performance of their duty by information and otherwise.

Hamilton argued for the appellant.—This bye-law, requiring a child to attend school not less than twenty-seven hours a week, is not contrary to the provisions of the Factory Act 1844, that it shall be lawful to employ a child in a factory ten hours on alternate days, provided that the child attends school for five hours on the other alternate week days. The Factory Acts restrict the time for labour, and make even that time conditional upon school attendance. The School Board imposes a further condition of longer school attendance; but the consequent reduction of the hours of labour is not contrary to the Factory Acts. The meaning of these words in sect. 74 of the Elementary Education Act 1870, viz., that no bye-law "shall be contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour," was considered with regard to the provisions of the Workshop Regulation Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 146), in the case of Bury v. Cherrybohn (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 457). By sect. 14 of that Act every child employed in a workshop was required to attend school for at least ten hours in every week; it was held by Bramwell, B., Mellor and Denman, JJ., that a bye-law requiring a longer attendance than ten hours a week was not contrary to this section. The present case was decided by the justices before the operation of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16); but there is nothing in the words used in sect. 23 concerning the education of children to alter the power of school boards over the school time of children employed under that Act.

Aspland for the respondent.—This case really involves the question whether a school board has the power to prohibit juvenile labour within its district. In the case of Bury v. Cherrybohn no one represented the respondent, and the recognition by the Legislature of the educational effect of labour was overlooked in the decision of the court. Throughout all the statutory enactments concerning education there is no provision for altering the school hours of children employed in labour under the Acts on that subject; and at all events in respect of the Factory Acts, the words used in sect. 74 of the Elementary Education Act 1870 cannot be interpreted to abridge the children's hours of labour. Bury v. Cherrybohn is no authority in this case; and the Legislature seems to have recognised the difference between the words used in the Factory Act 1844 and the Workshop Regulation Act 1867, and at the same time to have expressed its disapproval of the decision in Bury v. Cherrybohn, by enacting in the 8th section of the Elementary Education Act 1876, that the words of the former Act are to be substituted in the latter for those upon which that case was decided. It was admitted in the argument of that case that if the Workshop Regulation Act had enabled a parent to employ his child in a workshop, provided that the child attended school for ten hours a week, the bye-law would have been contrary to the provision. Here is a case in which by the Factory Act the respondent is enabled to employ his child in a factory, provided the child attends school for a certain time; the bye-law therefore is contrary to that provision, when it requires a longer time of school attendance.

MELLOR (app.) v. DENHAM (resp.).

Cur. adv. vult.

March 29.—LUSH, J. delivered the judgment of MELLOR, and himself in these terms:—We have gone through the various Factory Acts and the Education Acts, and the result is that we entertain no doubt that the decision of the justices, the propriety of which is submitted to us, was substantially correct. The question in this case, which, undoubtedly, is one of great and general importance, arose out of an information laid against the father of a boy between ten and eleven years old for neglecting to cause him to attend school during the whole of the ordinary school hours, as required by the bye-laws of the School Board for the district of the borough of Oldham. The defence set up was that the boy was employed at a cotton factory at Oldham, and was attending an efficient elementary school regularly, pursuant to the Factory Acts; and this the justices found to be the fact. The bye-laws of the school, which were put in evidence at the hearing, contained an express enactment that nothing therein should have any force or effect in so far as it may be contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour—thus following the words of the proviso in the 74th section of the Elementary Education Act 1870, which prohibits the making of any bye-law which shall be contrary to any such Act. We observe here in passing that the finding of the justices that the bye-laws were ultra vires cannot be sustained. They are, in our opinion, strictly within the powers conferred on the board by the 74th section, inasmuch as they contain the enactment above mentioned, together with the other provisions required by that section. The question is as to the meaning of the enactment above quoted and its application to the state of facts proved and found by the justices. The contention on the part of the school board was that the Education Acts overrode and controlled the provisions of the Factory Acts, and that children employed in factories, though receiving the education provided for and required by the Factory Acts, were in the same position as other children not so employed, and were, like them, compellable to attend school during the whole of the school hours. The argument was that the Factory Acts, which commenced at a time when no scheme of general education existed, are merely restrictive; that they do not enact that children shall or may be employed for a given number of hours in the factory, and while so employed shall receive a certain amount of education;

but that all which they enact is that the children shall not be employed for a longer time in the factory, and shall not during such employment receive less than the given amount of education; and, further, that the policy of the Education Act, which passed long afterwards, was to secure to all children, however employed, a much larger amount of education than the Factory Acts provided; and that it cannot be said to be “contrary to” nor inconsistent with the provisions of the Factory Acts for the School Board to require that all children should attend school for a longer period than factory children had been required to attend, although the effect might and would be to put an end to child labour in factories. What the construction might have been if the Education Acts had made no reference to the Factory Acts it is needless to consider. The meaning of the 74th section of the Education Act 1870, already adverted to, does not appear to us to admit of a doubt. That section says that the school board may make bye-laws for the following purposes, among which purposes is “determining the time during which children are to attend school, provided that no such bye-law shall prevent the withdrawal of any child from any religious observance or instruction in religious subjects, or shall require any child to attend school on any day exclusively set apart for religious observance by the religious body to which his parent belongs, or shall be contrary to anything contained in any Act for regulating the education of children employed in labour.” Placed as a limitation of the power of fixing the time of school attendance, the meaning of this part of the proviso obviously is that the board shall not use the power given to them so as to interfere with the arrangements already made by the Factory Acts, which embrace both the time of working and the time of attending school, each being dependent on the other, and neither of which can be interfered with without disturbing the other. That this was the meaning intended is further shown by the later Acts. The Education Act of 1876 recognises the Factory Acts as an existing code for regulating the employment and education of children employed in factories, and the Factory Act of 1874 gives the Education Department the power to recognise or refuse to recognise a school as a proper school for the education of a factory child, and says in terms in another part of the Act that a child employed in a factory shall attend school in manner directed by the Factory Act 1844. We are therefore of opinion that the decision of the justices was right, and we answer the questions submitted to us as follows:—1. The School Board are not entitled to enforce their bye-law against children between the ages of ten and thirteen years, who, although not obeying such bye-laws, are attending efficient elementary schools, pursuant to and otherwise fulfilling and observing the conditions of the Factory Acts. 2. The Elementary Education Acts do not control the provisions of the Factory Acts regulating the education of children employed in accordance with those Acts.

EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

DEARDS v. GOLDSMITH AND WIFE. (a)

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Turnpike Act, construction of—"Town"—Definition of—Turnpike gate in the town—Exemption of inhabitants of town from toll—Question of fact for the determination of the magistrates—Omission to demand toll for forty years—No right to exemption established thereby.

A Turnpike Act passed in 1815 provided that "no toll should be demanded or taken of or from any of the inhabitants of the town of S. at any toll gate or toll bar to be erected in the said town." In 1838 the turnpike trustees removed a turnpike gate, which since 1815 had stood in the town, to a site without the town, and 1200 yards distant from its old position. At that time and for several years afterwards there was not any house on either side of the road between the old and the new site of the gate; but within the last few years some fifty or sixty detached or semi-detached houses had been built, some on one and some on the other side of the road, between the two sites, but the houses were not contiguous or continuous, there being arable and other fields, and a reservoir, &c., intervening. From 1838 until June 1878 the inhabitants of the town of S. had been in the habit of passing through the gate without paying toll, and on the appellant, an inhabitant of the town, driving through the gate in Aug. 1878, toll was demanded from him by the respondents, the toll collectors, and was paid under protest by the appellant, who subsequently laid a complaint before the magistrates against the respondents for unlawfully demanding and taking toll from him as an inhabitant of the town of S.

The magistrates, after hearing the evidence on both sides and personally inspecting the locus in quo, found, as a fact, that "there was not any collection of houses at the said toll gate, nor a continuous series of houses from the old to the present site of the gate, and that the gate did not, at the time of its erection or of the complaint, stand within the town of S.," and they accordingly dismissed the complaint; and on appeal therefrom it was Held, by the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Hawkins, J.), dismissing the appeal, that the question, whether within a town or not within a town was a question of fact for the determination of the magistrates, and that the magistrates having found that the gate was not within the town, the court were not at liberty to go behind that finding, but must treat it as a question of fact on which the magistrates had jurisdiction to determine, and had determined, for themselves. But the Court also expressed their opinion that, having regard to the facts of the case, the finding of the magistrates was right in point of fact.

Held, also, that the omission of the trustees to demand toll for a period of forty years established no right in the public to exemption, which nothing but an Act of Parliament could create or sanction; nor had the trustees any right or power to exempt any person, or class of persons, from payment of the toll except those expressly exempted by the Act.

(a) Reported by HENRY LEWIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XI.

Per Hawkins, J.: Had the effect of the building operations been such as to bring the toll gate within the "town," though it was not so in 1838, the appellant, as an inhabitant of the "town," would have been entitled to exemption from toll, on the ground that at the time the exemption was claimed, the gate was within the "town," though it was not at the time of its removal. In my opinion a "town" grows with the buildings, and wherever it can be said that the latter have advanced to such an extent as that that which was formerly without is now within the "town," the exemption will apply to such newly added part of the "town." The definition of a "town," given by Russell Gurney, Q.C., Recorder of London, in Reg. v. Cottle (16 Q. B. 412; 20 L. J. 162, M. O.), and by Alderson and Parke, B.B., in Elliott v. The South Devon Railway Company (2 Ex. 725; 17 L. J. 262, Ex.) approved and acted upon.

CASE stated by magistrates for the opinion of the court, at the request of the appellant, on an appeal by him from their decision dismissing his complaint against the respondents for having unlawfully demanded and taken toll from him at a certain turnpike gate under the circumstances set forth at length in the case, of which the following is a statement of so much as is material for the purpose of this report.

The appellant was an inhabitant of the town of Sutton, in the county of Surrey, and the respondents were the collectors of the tolls at a turnpike gate in the parish of Sutton, called the Sutton Lane-gate, on the turnpike road leading from Sutton to Reigate. The complaint against the respondents before the magistrates arose under a Turnpike Act (55 Geo. 3, c. xlviii.), "for repairing the road from Sutton, in the county of Surrey, through the borough of Reigate by Sidlow Mill to Povey Cross, and several other roads therein mentioned in the same county," whereby it was enacted in sect. 32 of the same Act, amongst other things, as follows:

Provided also, that no toll shall be demanded or taken by virtue of this Act of or from any of the inhabitants of the town of Sutton at any toll gate or toll bar to be erected in the said town, or for any horses, cattle, or carriages belonging to such inhabitants passing through the same.

The toll gate in question formerly stood close to a tavern, called the Cock Inn, in the High-street of the town of Sutton. But about forty years ago, namely, some time in the year 1838, the trustees of the said turnpike road, under and by virtue of the powers vested in them by the said Act of Parliament, removed the said toll gate from its then position, which was admittedly within the town of Sutton, to its present site, where it has ever since stood and now stands in Sutton-lane within the parish of Sutton, a distance of about 1200 yards, or rather more than five-eighths of a mile in a southwardly direction from the Cock Inn aforesaid.

At the time of such removal there was not any house between the Cock Inn and the present position of the toll gate in Sutton-lane, but since the said removal, and within the last few years, some thirty-seven detached or semi-detached houses have been erected on the west side of the road, but they are not contiguous or continuous, there being a reservoir with a frontage of 92 feet to the said road, and a large arable field intervening in which there are no houses, and which has a frontage to the turnpike-road of rather more than one-eighth of a mile, and which field is in the market for building purposes; and on the east side of the said road from the said Cook Inn to where the gate now stands in Sutton-lane there are seventeen villas or detached houses, the railway station, and an iron church, but they are not contiguous or continuous, there being on the same side also a field of about six acres, another field of about twenty acres, both having a frontage to the said road, a third field (arable) having a frontage of 107 feet to the said road, and a meadow having a frontage of nearly one-eighth of a mile to the said road, lying between the Cook Inn and the said toll gate.

On the west side of the said road, beyond the said toll gate, there is a row of eleven houses in the parish of Sutton, beyond which the land is all farming land, and on the line of the said road there are new roads being formed on which are already built, or in course of building, nineteen houses in the aggregate. A farmhouse building and premises of a Mr. Burton are near to the said toll gate, on the east side of the said road, but immediately at the rear of and surrounding the said farmhouse and buildings there is nothing but agricultural land, and in fact the said toll gate is surrounded by such land on its north, south, and east sides. The average rental of the houses along the line of the said road from the Cook Inn to the Sutton-lane gate is 70*l.* per annum, and the houses in such line of road are rated at over 3000*l.* Some sixty or seventy years ago the rateable value of Sutton was 5000*l.*, and the population about 800; and while twenty years ago the whole rateable value of Sutton was 8800*l.*, it has now a rateable value of 43,000*l.*, the total rateable value of property on the south side of the Cook Inn alone being upwards of 8650*l.*

In the preamble to the said Act, and in the several sections therein up to and inclusive of sect. 4, the words "Sutton" and "Sutton aforesaid" only are used, without distinguishing the place called "Sutton" from the "town of Sutton;" and in sect. 5 the "town of Sutton" is first mentioned in the words there, "leading from the 12th milestone in the town of Sutton;" and when Sutton is afterwards referred to in the same section it is mentioned as "Sutton aforesaid," and in various other sections, up to sect. 32, the word "Sutton" only is used; and in the before-mentioned proviso in sect. 32 the words "town of Sutton" and "the said town" are again and for the only other times made use of; in all other instances throughout the Act where Sutton is mentioned therein it is referred to as "Sutton" only or "Sutton aforesaid."

Until the month of June 1878 the inhabitants of the said "town of Sutton" had been in the habit of passing and repassing through the said toll gate at Sutton-lane aforesaid without paying toll; and on the appellant driving through the said gate on the occasion in question, the 14th Aug. 1878, toll was demanded from him by the respondent Ann Goldsmith, the wife of the toll collector at the said gate, when the appellant, having first claimed exemption from toll as an inhabitant of the town of Sutton, paid the toll under protest.

On the hearing of the complaint before the justices, it was contended, on the part of the appellant that the "town of Sutton" extended to and beyond the site of the present toll gate in the town by reason of there being houses on both sides of the road, and on adjacent roads, so situated as to constitute a town, and to be part of the "town of Sutton;" and that the present site of the gate was within the "town of Sutton," within the meaning of the exempting proviso in sect. 32 of the said Act; and that the removal of the said toll gate to its present position by the trustees some forty years ago was subject to the rights, remedies, and restrictions imposed by the said statute, and that the removal of the gate from its former site to its present site did not confer upon the trustees the right to impose a toll on the inhabitants of Sutton.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that the words "town of Sutton" in sect. 32 were words of restrictive limitation, and that by using them in that section the intention was to restrict the exemption to inhabitants of the town on passing through any toll gate to be erected in the said town. That it was a question of fact, to be determined by the justices, whether or not the said toll gate was within the "town of Sutton;" that it was not within the said town, and accordingly that the inhabitants were not, nor were the appellants, exempted from the payment of tolls.

The justices inspected the position of the Sutton-lane toll gate, and, upon such inspection and the evidence, they found as a fact that there was not any collection of houses at the said toll gate, nor a continuous series of houses from the Cook Inn to the said toll gate, and that the said gate did not at the time it was erected, nor at the time of the said complaint, stand within the "town of Sutton," and they also, upon the construction of the statute, and of the decisions in the cases cited by counsel for the complainant and the solicitors for the defendants, came to the same conclusion, that the Sutton-lane toll gate did not stand within the said "town of Sutton;" and they accordingly dismissed the complaint, with costs against the said complainant, the present appellant, and, upon his application, they stated the present case, in which the questions for the opinion of the court were:

1. Whether, under the circumstances, the removal of the toll gate from the town of Sutton to the present site outside the town, but within the parish of Sutton, conferred a right on the trustees of the road to exact a toll from the inhabitants of the town of Sutton?

2. Whether the words "town of Sutton" are to be held to be co-extensive with the word "Sutton," as used in the said Act, or must be limited to the exemption clause of the said Act?

3. Whether by custom or usage the inhabitants of the town of Sutton are entitled to exemption from tolls at the said toll gate?

If the court should be of opinion that these questions should be answered in the negative, then our said determination is to be enforced; and if in the affirmative, our determination is to be reversed and our decision quashed.

Kydd, for the appellant, contended that the decision of the magistrates was erroneous, and should be reversed. Three times only in the Act was the "town" of Sutton mentioned: viz., in the 5th section, where the words, "twelfth milestone in the town of Sutton" were, it is submitted, descriptive only, and not words of limitation; and immediately afterwards, in the same section, the place "Sutton" was mentioned as "Sutton aforesaid;" and in all the subsequent sections of the Act, where the place was mentioned or referred to, it was mentioned as "Sutton" only, or "Sutton aforesaid," except in the exempting proviso in sect. 32, on which the question here turned, where the word "town" was again twice used. [HAWKINS, J.—Do you say that the justices as a matter of fact ought to have found that this spot where the gate now stands was town?] The justices have misapprehended the cases cited before them, and the construction of the Act of Parliament, and the proper legal definition of the word "town;" and it is a question for the consideration of the court on the facts as found. The justices, having an anterior or foregone impression in their minds, inspected the locus in quo, and under that impression, and not from any a posteriori reasoning, said, "This is not a town." They have gone wrong in point of law in attempting to define a town as "a continuous series of houses" merely. There is no such thing as a "continuous series of houses" without qualification contemplated by the cases which were cited before the justices, and on which the latter appear to have based their decision. It is the continuous growth of the town, and the gradual extension and expansion of its limits, that is to be looked at, as in Reg. v. Cottle (16 Q. B. 412, 20 L. J. 162, M. C.); where the late Recorder of London, Mr. Russell Gurney, having directed the jury "to consider whether the gate in question in that case was situated within the town of Taunton, and told them that the word 'town' was to be taken in its popular sense of a collection of houses, where people congregate, and that they were to consider whether the spot in question was so surrounded by houses that the inhabitants might fairly be said to dwell together, and that the fact of the houses being separated by gardens would not prevent them from being said to lie together," that direction and definition were approved of by Lord Campbell, C.J. and the rest of the Court of Queen's Bench. Subsequently, also, in the House of Lords, in the case of The London and South-Western Railway Company v. Blackmore (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 504; 39 L. J. 713, Ch.; L. Rep. 4 E. & I. App. 601), the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hatherley, referred to that definition approvingly, and said: "It amounts to this, that where there is such an amount of continuous occupancy of the ground by houses that the inhabitants may be said to be living, as it were, in the same town or place continuously, there, for the purposes of the Railway Acts, and according to the popular sense of the word (not the legal sense, which would not give at all a sensible definition), the place may be said to be a town." In The Commissioners of Milton v. The Faversham District Highway Board (10 B. & S., p. 548, n.), the court intimated its opinion to the justices, in accordance with Reg. v. Cottle, that "the proper definition of the word 'town' was a continuous series of houses not necessarily contiguous, but sufficiently so to form a congregation of human habitations." The description of the locality in the present case shows it to be clearly "town" within the definitions of that word in the above-named cases. Again, the rule of construction of an Act of Parliament like the present one is thus laid down by Bailey, J. in Waterhouse v. Keen (4 B. & C. 425): "Acts of Parliament such as those now in question" (a Turnpike Act) "must be construed with reference to the particular language in which they are expressed; but where there is any ambiguity in the language used the construction must be in favour of the public, because it is a general rule that where the public are charged with a burden the intention of the Legislature to impose that burden must be explicitly and distinctly shown." So also in The Leeds and Liverpool Canal Company v. Hustler (1 B. & C. 425), the same learned judge says, with reference to a question of toll under a Canal Act: "Those who seek to impose a burden upon the public should take care that their claim rests upon plain and unambiguous language." And in Bussey v. Storey (4 B. & Ad. 98; 2 L. J. N. S. 166, K. B.) Parke, B., delivering the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, on a question arising under a Turnpike Act, says: "But as this statute does impose a tax, the usual rule of construction must be applied to it which is adopted in similar cases, and the subject must not be charged unless the intention to charge clearly and distinctly appears." The same doctrine, that there must be no ambiguity in order to make the subject liable to a tax or burden, is laid down in Dwarris on Statutes, 2nd edit., p. 646, and 2 Chitty on Statutes (2nd edit. 1851, p. 531, note b., Highway and Turnpike). The appellant here, therefore, is entitled, it is contended, to exemption if there be any doubt whether this gate be within the town of Sutton or not. But further, for forty years, from 1838 to the summer of last year, no toll was ever demanded at this gate. The trustees, therefore, having stood by and permitted the public to use this gate toll free for so long a period of time, and having thereby caused to grow up in the public mind an idea that they intended to let these inhabitants pass toll free, cannot now impose a toll upon them:

The Surrey Canal Company v. Hall, 1 Scott N. E. 284; 9 L. J. N. S. 329, C. P.
Hill v. Smith, 10 East, 475.

At all events, the trustees not having been reasonably vigilant and diligent, the equitable doctrine of acquiescence will apply as against them.

Fitzgerald (with him was Grantham, Q.C.), for the respondents, contra, supported the decision of the justices. — The only real question here is, whether or not the appellant is within the exempting proviso in sect. 32 of the Act? To bring himself there he must show that the locus in quo is within the town of Sutton, using the word "town" in the popular sense of the term, and that he has not done, and cannot, it is submitted, properly do, having regard to the various authorities on the question. In addition to those which have been cited for the appellants it may be added that, in Elliott v. The South Devon Railway Company (2 Ex. 725; 17 L. J. 262, Ex.), Alderson, B. defines a town as follows: "It is where a great body of people within a township are congregated together in houses. It means land continuously built upon. There can be no doubt that the green of Grosvenor-square is in 'town.'" So a railway passing through the Temple-gardens would be passing through a "town;" and Parke, B., in the same case, says: "It would appear that the word 'town' is not to be understood in its strict legal interpretation as a township having a church or a constable, but a place containing a number of houses congregated together, an inhabited spot where the occupation is continuous." In The Commissioners of Milton v. The Faversham Highway Board, cited on the other side, and which is reported more fully in 81 Justice of the Peace, p. 341, Cockburn, C.J., says: "All that the court can do is to lay down the rule or principle founded upon the definition already laid down, that is, that the houses must be part of a series of houses sufficiently contiguous to form part of the town. The application of this rule raises a question of fact far better determined upon the view by the magistrates than it possibly can be by this court upon any statement." Now here the justices have found as a fact, after hearing both sides and a personal inspection of the spot, that this gate is not within the town, and the court will not interfere with their finding on a matter of fact within their jurisdiction. [He was stopped.]

DEARDS v. GOLDSMITH AND WIFE.

KELLY, C.B.—The question here depends entirely upon the construction of the proviso at the end of the 32nd section of the Turnpike Act (55 Geo. 3, c. xlvi.), and its application to the unquestioned facts of the case. It appears from the case that a turnpike gate formerly stood within the town of Sutton, and close to a very old and celebrated inn in that town called the "Cock," and that, some forty years ago, namely, in the year 1838, the trustees of the Sutton turnpike road, under the powers vested in them by the last-mentioned Act of Parliament, removed that turnpike gate from its then site close to the "Cock" inn, within the town, to its present position in Sutton-lane, within the parish of Sutton, and about 1200 yards, or five-eighths of a mile in a southerly direction from its original position; and the question is whether, under the proviso in the Act to which I have already referred, the inhabitants of the town of Sutton, who were undoubtedly exempted by that proviso from the payment of toll at the gate in its former position, are also exempted from the payment of toll at the gate in its present position? Now the words of the exempting clause of the Act are, that "no toll shall be demanded or taken by virtue of this Act, of or from any inhabitant of the town of Sutton, at any toll gate or toll bar to be erected in the said town. The question, therefore, is whether this new toll gate, erected in 1838, was at the time of its erection, or has since become, and now is, within "the town of Sutton." To arrive at a decision in this matter, we must look, not only to the position of the gate, but to the statements and findings in the case. The gate was, it appears, upon a spot marked upon the Ordnance map as "Banstead Downs," on the high road from Sutton to Reigate and more distant places, within which district roads were to be made or to be preserved, and turnpike gates to be erected under the Act at one place and another, according to the judgment of the trustees. The case finds that in 1838 there were not any houses between the Cock inn and the said toll gate in Sutton-lane; that is to say, there was not a single house to be found on either side of the road for a distance of 1200 yards from the site of the old gate in the town to that of the new gate in Sutton-lane, the town being 1200 yards to the north of the new gate. Further the case finds—[His Lordship here read from the case the description of the locality and the erection of new houses there since the removal of the gate in 1838 up to the present time, and then proceeded as follows:] Now, looking at the definition of a "town" in the various cases that have been cited, I think as the result of the whole it may be said that to constitute a "town" there must be a continuity, though not necessarily an absolute contiguity of buildings; that is to say, a spot to be said to be within a town must, in the language of Alderson, B. in Elliott v. The South Devon Railway Company, be "where a great body of people are congregated together in houses;" or, as Parke, B. said, in the same case, "a place containing a number of houses congregated together, an inhabited spot where the occupation is continuous." Those expressions correspond with the definition of a "town" given by the late Mr. Russell Gurney, the Recorder of London, in the case of Beg. v. Ootile, which was quoted with approbation by Lord Hatherley as Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, in the case of The London and South-Western Railway Company v. Blackmore, in terms which have already been referred to; and surely no one who had to determine the question in this case could say that the description, given in the case of the locality in which this gate is situated, comes at all within either of the definitions of a town as given by either of these learned judges in either of the before-mentioned cases. Clearly this gate is not surrounded by a congregation of houses, nor in point of fact is it surrounded by houses at all; but there are merely here and there a few detached or semi-detached villas throughout a distance of some 1200 yards, with fields of many acres and a reservoir and so forth intervening. I am therefore of opinion that this toll gate was not at the time of its erection at its present site forty years ago, and is not now, within the town of Sutton, and that consequently the respondents are entitled to the judgment of the court. Independently, however, of any conclusion at which we have arrived on this point, I think the cases which have been cited go to show that the question whether a particular spot is within a town or not within a town, is a question of fact to be determined by a jury under the superintendence and with the assistance of a judge, where the case comes before a judge and jury, or by the magistrates where the case comes before them as this case did; and therefore, looking at the terms of this case, and finding that the magistrates, who were a tribunal of judge and jury together, have treated the matter as a question of fact for their consideration, and have found in clear and precise terms that this gate is not within the town of Sutton, I do not think we are at liberty to go further, but that we must treat it as a question of fact, upon which the magistrates had jurisdiction to determine and have determined for themselves. But it has been very acutely and ably argued by Mr. Kyld for the appellant, that there has been a user of this gate, toll free, by the inhabitants for forty years, and so they had acquired a right of exemption from the toll. No length of user, however, even if it were fully and satisfactorily established, can establish a right in any person or class of persons to exemption from tolls unless it be created or sanctioned by Act of Parliament. A duty is imposed by their Act of Parliament upon the trustees to levy the toll on all who pass through the toll gate, and they have no right or power, by negligence or carelessness, or it might be by favour, to exempt any person or class of persons from payment of it, or to grant to any person or any class of persons leave to pass through the gate gratuitously, and therefore their having permitted certain persons to pass through the toll gate without paying toll, even if it were altogether unexplainable, would create no right of exemption known to the law; and it is therefore really an immaterial fact in the case. Under these circumstances, therefore, upon all grounds, and upon all the questions which arise in the case, I am of opinion that the respondents are entitled to the judgment of the court.

DEARDS v. GOLDSMITH AND WIFE.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. By their Act, which was passed in the year 1815, and under which they claim the right to take these tolls, the trustees were at liberty to take the tolls at the toll houses and toll bars duly erected, and they were authorised by another section of the Act to transfer the toll bars then erected to other parts of the road. The toll bar in question, it is admitted, stood in 1815 within the town of Sutton; it is admitted also, and so found in the case, that in the year 1838 the toll bar, which up to that time had stood within the town of Sutton, was transferred to a spot some distance from it, and re-erected at a place without the town of Sutton. Now the appellant is an inhabitant of the town of Sutton, and he claims an exemption from this toll by virtue of a proviso to be found at the end of the 32nd section of the Act. So far as it is necessary to state them here, the words of that proviso are these, "Provided also that no toll shall be demanded or taken by virtue of this Act of or from any inhabitant of the town of Sutton, at any toll gate or toll bar to be erected in the town of Sutton, or for any horses, cattle, or carriages belonging to such inhabitants passing through the same." I have said it is found by the magistrates, and it is not disputed, that at the time this toll bar was removed in 1838 it was removed to a spot, which was then, at all events, without the town of Sutton. The case sets forth the fact, which is beyond all dispute, that since 1838, and chiefly within the last few years, there has been a great deal of building in the neighbourhood between the spot where the old toll bar stood and the place where it was erected in 1838. If the effect of those building operations had been such as to bring the toll bar within the town of Sutton, though it was not so in 1838, I should have been of opinion that the appellant, being an inhabitant of the town of Sutton, was entitled to exemption from the toll, on the ground that at the time the exemption was claimed the toll gate was within the town, although it was not within the town at the time of its removal. In my opinion a town grows with the buildings, and wherever it can be said that the buildings have advanced to such an extent that that which was formerly without the town is now within it, the exemption will apply to that part of the town so newly added. Then comes the question, yes or no, has this toll bar, which avowedly was without the town of Sutton in its new position in 1838, been since brought within the town so as to give exemption to those who claimed it as inhabitants of that town? Now this question is, in my judgment, purely one of fact for the tribunal before whom it is tried. If it had arisen before a judge and jury it would have been a question for the jury to determine under the direction of the judge who tried the case; if the question arises before magistrates, they have to apply the law which is presented to them, or as it exists, to the facts, and they have to determine whether, as a matter of fact, the place is or is not within the town. That was expressly decided by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Reg. v. Cottle. Lord Campbell, C.J., in delivering judgment in that case, says: "We are therefore of opinion that the learned judge was bound to leave the question to the jury whether, when the indictment was found, the gate stood across a road which was to be considered as at that time in the town of Taunton." There are one or two cases in which definitions are given of what is considered to be a town. One case is that of Reg. v. Cottle, to which reference has already been made, which was tried before the late Recorder of the City of London at the Somersetshire assizes, in which the question was whether the locus in quo was within the town of Taunton or not, and the learned judge left that question to the jury as one of fact, telling them that the word "town" in the Act was to be understood in the popular sense of "a collection of houses where people congregate," and that they were to consider whether the spot in question was "surrounded by houses so reasonably near to each other that the inhabitants might fairly be said to dwell together." In my judgment that was a very concise way of stating what constitutes a town. In the case of Elliott v. The South Devon Railway Company, Alderson, B. gave what in substance was his definition of a town as follows: "What the walls of towns were in ancient times, that is, a boundary, continuous buildings are now. By continuous buildings I do not mean buildings which touch each other, but buildings so reasonably near that the inhabitants may be considered as dwelling together. Within the ambit surrounded by such houses is town, and when the railway passes through that ambit it passes through town." That is the definition given by Alderson, B. Lord Campbell, C.J., in his judgment in the case of Reg. v. Cottle, approved very much of Mr. Russell Gurney's definition, and at p. 420 of 16 Q. B. said: "We think there is no misdirection in this case. The learned judge, with much felicity, comprised in a few words all that was material in the language of the Barons of the Exchequer as to the definition of a town in Elliott v. The South Devon Railway Company;" and he added that, "the jury could not be misled" by that definition. I think I need not say more on that subject, except that I entirely concur in the view expressed by Mr. Russell Gurney, and think that his was the true definition. I do not think it is necessary, in order to make a man an inhabitant of a town, that the house in which he resides should be surrounded by other houses; it is quite sufficient if he lives in such proximity to other houses as that his house, with the other houses in its proximity, may be said to form, in point of fact, one congregation of houses. That must be of necessity a question of fact, and it cannot be, as far as I can see, a question of law. In this case the magistrates have found that this turnpike gate, notwithstanding its proximity to a great many houses at the time this toll was demanded, was not within the town, and with that finding, as a matter of fact, I do not think we are at liberty to interfere. The exemption being claimed, and only being claimed, by the appellant as an "inhabitant of the town" by reason of the turnpike gate being also "within the town," the moment it is found and established that the turnpike gate is without the town, the statutory exemption fails, and the appellant is liable to pay the toll, unless he can rest his exemption upon some other ground. Now, I looked with some anxiety to see whether Mr. Kydd would point out any ground upon which he could rest the exemption, because it undoubtedly seems at first sight a little hard that a man who has not for forty years paid any toll should suddenly be called upon to pay it; but I find that the Act of Parliament, in unmistakeable language, imposes the toll upon him unless he can make out not only that he is an inhabitant of the town, but also that the turnpike gate is situate within the town. The claim of exemption fails him altogether. Then Mr. Kydd says that there has been long neglect on the part of those who had the right to take the toll, in collecting it and enforcing payment of it against the inhabitants. I am at a loss to see that that affords any reason why, when the toll is demanded, it should not be paid. There is no Act of Parliament which extends the exemption, or rather, which, to my mind, in the least degree assists the appellant in his contention that he is exempt from the toll. I find no other circumstances which, by the greatest ingenuity of construction, can justify the appellant in refusing to pay the toll. It may be a hardship upon him, but there is the Act of Parliament which imposes the toll, and unless the exemption is conferred upon him by another Act of Parliament, I think he must pay it; that is to say, he cannot resist the collection of it by those who are placed in authority to collect it. As regards the other points which are set out in the case, I do not really think there is anything that calls for observation. "The town of Sutton" I agree is not co-extensive with the word "Sutton;" and then as to the question of whether, by custom or usage, the inhabitants are entitled to exemption, I have already said I cannot see the slightest ground for the claim. I think, therefore, that upon all grounds the decision of the magistrates was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

KNIGHT v. PURSELL. (a)

Injunction—Party wall—Metropolitan Building Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), ss. 3 and 88.

On one side of and against a wall within the boundary of his land, the plaintiff had constructed certain closets. On the other side of and against the same wall, the defendant, whose land adjoined that of the plaintiff, had constructed a shed.

Held, that the wall was a party wall within the Metropolitan Building Act 1855, so far as the structures of the plaintiff and defendant were co-terminous.

(a) Reported by FRANK EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant, claiming an injunction to restrain him from pulling down or building upon or otherwise interfering with a wall belonging to the plaintiff and situate at the back of his leasehold messuages Nos. 6 and 7, Surrey-row, Blackfriars-road, in the county of Surrey, and for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendant to pull down the building already erected by him upon the plaintiff's said wall, and to restore the same wall to its former condition.

The action was tried without a jury, and it appeared in evidence that in 1877 a fire occurred on the premises of the defendant's lessor, and that on the 30th Oct. in that year, the defendant, who was the owner of the premises at No. 172, Blackfriars-road, south of the plaintiff's land, sent to the plaintiff the following notice:

I hereby give you notice, as required by the Metropolitan Buildings Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), that is intended to take down such portions of the party walls or all of the same as may be necessary, which divide your premises from the above, and to rebuild the same according to the provisions of the Metropolitan Buildings Act, such said walls now being in a dangerous condition.

The other facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment of his Lordship.

The question was, whether the wall in question was or was not a party wall within the meaning of the statute.

Fry, J.—The only question which I have to determine is as to the wall. The wall runs east and west at the back of the plaintiff's land. This plot of land was demised to the predecessor in title of the plaintiff. The predecessor left a yard behind his buildings, and at the back of the yard he built a wall well within his own boundary. This wall, no doubt, originally belonged to the plaintiff. It appears to me to be clear from the evidence that, about Sept. 1849, a Mr. Oakey was in occupation of the defendant's land, and constructed, on his side of the wall, a shed or coke-hole. Towards the north of it was a wooden structure supported by beams and covered with feather-edged boards. The roof was a lean-to against the defendant's house. Mr. Oakey's structure was taken down in 1868, and another similar but higher structure was carried up, consisting of a timber weather boarding and a roof, which was made partly of tiles and partly of skylights. In 1877 a fire occurred on the property of the lessor of the defendant. The question which arises is this, Had that wall become a party wall within the provisions of the Metropolitan Buildings Act? By the 3rd section of that Act it is provided that the "party wall" shall apply to every wall used or built in order to be used as a separation of any building "from any other building, with a view to the same being occupied by different persons." Upon that clause several questions arise. The object of the Act is to define the wall as a party wall with reference to its user, and not with reference to the rights of ownership possessed by the proprietors of the adjoining land. It is the object of the Act to limit the rights of private owners for the public good, and the physical condition, position, and user of the wall, not the rights of owners, must be considered. The first question is whether that wall was used as "a separation of any building from any other building." I think it was so used as between the defendant's shed and the plaintiff's closets, which were buildings. These structures were built with the intention that they should be used. Mr. North argued that, because the plaintiff had no view that the buildings on each side should be occupied by different persons, the wall was not a party wall within the meaning of the Act; but I think the words mean that the users of the wall on each side have a "view to occupy it" differently. Mr. North also contended that the construction which I have adopted takes away the control of the wall from the owner of it; but the control of property is often taken away from the owner by Acts of Parliament for public purposes. I consider that this wall is a party wall; and the second question which arises is as to the extent to which the wall has become a party wall. The case of Weston v. Arnold is a distinct authority that a wall may be a party wall for some part only, and cease to be a party wall when the buildings on each side cease to be co-terminous; and I hold this wall to be laterally a party wall to the extent of the two closets only. The third question is, was there anything in the nature of an easement for the support of the buildings of the defendant? Mr. Oakley's building did rest on the wall, and that was so in the building of 1868, which was supported on half of the wall. But it appears that the building which was there at the time of the fire was preceded by a building of Mr. Oakley in 1849, and he has said that that building rested on supports put in the ground, and I believe that statement, as it is supported by other evidence. The conclusion is, that Mr. Oakley is correct as to the earlier building, and Mr. Davis (another witness) is correct as to the later building, which differed in being higher and resting on the wall. I cannot, from the nature of the structure, infer the existence of acquiescence on the part of the plaintiff. The defendant has failed altogether except as to his contention with regard to the part of the wall behind the plaintiff's closets being a party wall. I think that the defendant has interfered with the right of the plaintiff, who is bound to deliver up his land to his landlord at the end of the term in the same condition as when it was originally demised. The injunction must therefore go as to that part of the wall which is behind the plaintiff's closets until the defendant shall have complied with the provisions of the Metropolitan Buildings Act as to dealing with party walls. As to the remainder of the wall, there must be an injunction restraining the interference of the defendant.

REG. v. HERMANN. (a)

Coining—Uttering false and counterfeit coin—Sovereign reduced in weight by filing off the milling—Making a new milling—24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 9.

The prisoner was convicted of uttering two false and counterfeit sovereigns, with guilty knowledge. The two sovereigns were originally genuine, but had been reduced in weight by filing off nearly all the original milling. New millings were then made to them fraudulently, so as to make them resemble genuine sovereigns.

Held, that the two sovereigns when passed in that state were false and counterfeit coins, within sect. 9 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, per Lord Coleridge, C.J., Pollock and Huddleston, BB. (Lush and Fitzjames Stephen, JJ., dissenting).

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of Liverpool.

The prisoner, Robert Hermann, was convicted before me at a sessions held on the 7th Jan. 1879, on an indictment under sect. 9 of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99—"An Act to consolidate and amend the Statute Law of the United Kingdom against offences relating to the Coin," for uttering and putting off two false and counterfeit sovereigns, knowing them to be false and counterfeit.

The evidence of uttering, and of guilty knowledge, was complete; but I desire to submit to the Court the question whether the coins which were uttered could properly be held to be false and counterfeit coins within the meaning of the statute in question.

They were, or had been, real sovereigns, coined at the Mint.

They were both of Her Majesty's reign—one dated 1872, and the other 1875.

They had been fraudulently filed at the edges to such an extent as to reduce the weight by one twenty-fourth part. The effect of the filing was to remove the milling entirely, or almost entirely.

In order to restore the appearance of the coins, a new milling had been made on each coin with tools.

It appeared to me that this was a counterfeit milling, and that a coin upon which any part of the impression was counterfeit, was a counterfeit coin.

The jury convicted the prisoner.

I remanded the prisoner to Her Majesty's gaol at Walton, near Liverpool, without sentencing him until this case shall have been decided.

It may be desirable to add that the prisoner had first been tried under the 4th section of the same Act, and acquitted for want of evidence that the act of lightening or diminishing had been done by himself.

(Signed), JOHN B. ASPINALL, Recorder of Liverpool.

(a) Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

Eyre Lloyd for the prosecution.—The prisoner was guilty of uttering or putting off false and counterfeit coins, resembling, or apparently intended to resemble the Queen's current gold coin, within sect. 9 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99. If it is a question of fact for the jury whether the coin uttered by the prisoner was counterfeit, the case is concluded by the verdict of guilty. But if it is a matter of law, it is contended that the filing off the original millings of the sovereigns, and the making of the new milling with the intention that they should pass for genuine sovereigns makes them counterfeit coins within the Act. The intent in making of the new milling was that they might imitate genuine sovereigns. [HUDDLESTON, B.—Your difficulty arises on the meaning of the words, "false or counterfeit coin" in the interpretation clause, sect. 1.] If there had not been a new milling put on, there would have been greater difficulty in contending that the coins became counterfeit, but the new milling was an act of imitation, and gave them a spurious character [POLLOCK, B.—In construing the words, "resemble, or apparently intended to resemble," does it matter that the coin was once a genuine one?] No. By removing the original milling, the sovereign lost one of its essential attributes—weight; and if of less than the authorised weight it ceases to be a legal tender, and any person may cut, break, or deface it if tendered to him in payment, and the person tendering shall bear the loss (33 Vict. c. 10, s. 7). [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—What does "counterfeit" mean?] A thing made in imitation of another, and intended to pass for the original.

The Judges differing in opinion, the junior judge first delivered his judgment.

FITZJAMES STEPHEN, J.—I am unable to arrive at the conclusion that there was in this case the uttering of a counterfeit coin within the meaning of the Act. The interpretation clause, sect. 1, enacts that "the Queen's current coin shall include any coin coined in any of Her Majesty's mints, or lawfully current by virtue of any proclamation, &c." Now this piece of coin was certainly a gold coin coined in one of Her Majesty's mints, and not a thing made to imitate such a coin. Therefore, it seems to me that we start with this fact that it was a genuine coin; and then the next thing that appears is that it had been lightened in weight by filing off the edges, and so removing the milling, which constitutes an offence under another section (sect. 4) of the Act. And sect. 5 makes it an offence for anyone to have in his possession any filings or clippings of any gold or silver bullion, &c., which shall have been produced or obtained by impairing, diminishing, or lightening any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin. But I do not find any provision in the Act which seems to me to make a genuine coin which has been fraudulently lightened become a counterfeit coin, or to make a person who passes such a coin guilty of the offence of passing a counterfeit coin. If a man had passed a coin, knowing that it had been fraudulently lightened, he would not have committed the offence of passing a counterfeit coin. Then, would a person by putting on a fresh milling to conceal the fact that it had been so lightened, and to pretend that the coin was of full weight, be guilty of passing a counterfeit coin? The whole question is, does it thereby become a counterfeit coin within the meaning of the Act? I think that it does not. It seems to me that this was a genuine coin fraudulently lightened in such a manner as to conceal the fact that it had been fraudulently lightened, and that it was not a counterfeit coin within the meaning of the Act. It is very difficult to describe the statutory meaning of a "counterfeit coin."

HUDDLESTON, B.—I think that this conviction ought to be supported. The conviction was under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 9, which makes it a misdemeanour to put off any false or counterfeit coin resembling, or apparently intended to resemble, or pass for any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit. What the prisoner has been found guilty of is putting off a false and counterfeit coin resembling, or apparently intended to resemble, a sovereign. The evidence was that almost the whole of the milling had been fraudulently removed from a gold coin, and when the milling had been removed that was a coin which no one was bound to take, and in my opinion it then was no longer the Queen's current gold coin. And then in order to make that coin pass for a current coin another milling was put on, so as to make it apparently resemble the Queen's current gold coin. That was an act done to make it resemble, or apparently to resemble, the Queen's current coin, and so it was a counterfeit.

POLLOCK, B.—I think that the prisoner was properly convicted. In dealing with the expression false or counterfeit coin in sect. 9, I think the interpretation clause, in clear and affirmative language, so defines it as to include this case. I agree with my brother Huddleston that when the original milling was taken off for the purpose of deteriorating the coin, the coin ceased to be a current coin; and taking that basis as a starting point, it seems to follow that it becomes something else; and then the putting on a new milling so as to make it pass for a genuine sovereign appears to me to make it a counterfeit sovereign. A person having machinery might take off the milling from a great number of sovereigns and make a new milling so as to make them pass for the current gold coin of the realm. I have no doubt that that would be substantially putting off false or counterfeit coin, apparently intended to resemble the Queen's current gold coin, within the spirit and intention of the Act.

LUSH, J.—I cannot agree with the majority of the Court. In my opinion it would be straining the words "false and counterfeit coin" beyond their legitimate meaning to hold that the prisoner was guilty of uttering false and counterfeit coin within sect. 9 of the Act. Had there been nothing more done to the coins than filing off the original milling, and then passing them in that state the prisoner could not have been guilty of uttering false and counterfeit coin, for they would still have been the Queen's current coin, though deficient in weight. The expression, "false and counterfeit coin" involves the idea of spurious imitation, and the interpretation clause defines that "it shall include any of the current coin which shall have been gilt, silvered, washed, coloured, or cased over, or in any manner altered so as to resemble, or be apparently intended to resemble, or pass for any of the Queen's current coin of a higher denomination. If a farthing had been gilt over so as to be apparently intended to resemble a sovereign, it would have been counterfeit coin within the meaning of that clause. But I think the word "counterfeit" alone is not sufficient to include the present case. The prisoner was tried and acquitted for the offence under sect. 4, of impairing, diminishing, lightening coin with intent that it might pass for the Queen's current gold coin. Another section (sect. 5) makes it an offence to have possession of any filings or clippings obtained by impairing, or diminishing, or lightening any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, but there is no section which makes the attempt to pass off clipped or lightened coin an offence where it is intended to pass for coin of the same denomination. I think that the mere cutting off of the original milling and putting on a new milling, as in the present case, is not sufficient to turn the coin into false and counterfeit coin within the meaning of the Act.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am clearly of opinion that this case is within the meaning of the Act, and am content to rest my judgment on either of the two views. First, I say that the prisoner was guilty of passing a counterfeit sovereign. What he did was this: he filed off the milling from a genuine sovereign, and that being done, the sovereign, reduced below the proper weight, in my opinion, ceased to be a genuine current sovereign; he then made a new milling to it, and in that state passed it as a genuine sovereign. That, in my judgment, was putting off a counterfeit, resembling, or apparently intended to resemble, a genuine sovereign. That view may be wrong, however, and if so, I will rest my judgment on the ordinary sense of the word "counterfeit;" that is, imitation. By the act of the prisoner in removing the original milling, and making the new milling, the coin, which by the removal of the milling ceased to be a current coin or sovereign, was made by the new milling to resemble and pass for a current sovereign, that is in my view a counterfeit sovereign. The interpretation clause adds strength to this view; it says in plain language that the expression "false and counterfeit coin resembling, or apparently intended to resemble, or pass for any of the Queen's current gold or silver coin, shall include any of the current coin which shall have been gilt, silvered, washed, coloured, or cased over, or in any manner altered so as to resemble, or be apparently intended to resemble, or pass for any of the Queen's current coin of a higher denomination." That is an inclusive, but by no means an exclusive definition. It is said only to include such cases as where a farthing is gilt or silvered so as to resemble, or be apparently intended to resemble, the Queen's current coin of a higher denomination. It cannot be limited to mean really imitating a sovereign or coin of higher denomination, because the counterfeit in fact does not imitate them; there are differences in the inscriptions, and other parts of the coins. I think the term counterfeit applies where anyone does anything which shall have the effect of making a coin which is no longer a genuine current coin pass for a genuine current coin. On either of the above views I think the conviction may be supported.

Conviction affirmed.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J. and MELLOR, J.)

HINTON (app.) v. SWINDON NEW TOWN LOCAL BOARD (resps.). (a)

Sanitary authority—Expenses of sewerage and levelling street—Owner at time of completion of work—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 69—21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 2—38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, ss. 150 and 257.

The appellant, in the early part of 1875, was owner of certain premises abutting upon a street which the respondents then gave him, and the other adjoining owners, notice to sewer and level, under sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848; this notice not being complied with, the respondents had the works required executed by contract.

In May 1876 the appellant disposed by sale of the whole of his interest in the premises.

In July 1876 the expenses of this work were duly apportioned upon the adjoining owners, and notice of his apportionment was served upon the appellant.

In Dec. 1876 the final balance for the work was paid to the contractor by the respondents.

Held, upon a case stated, that the appellant was not, in these circumstances, the owner in default under sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, or sect. 150 of the Public Health Act 1875, and that the respondents' remedy under these sections, and sect. 62 of the Local Government Act 1858, or sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875, was only against the owner of the premises at the time when the work was completed.

THIS was a case stated by the Court of General Quarter Sessions of the peace for the county of Wilts, holden at Warminster on Tuesday, 3rd July 1877, for the purpose of obtaining the determination of the High Court of Justice.

The respondents on the 22nd March 1875, in pursuance of sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, gave notice to the appellant, who was then the owner of certain premises at Swindon, within the district of which the respondents are now the urban sanitary authority, to metal, level, channel, curb, sewer, and light the street adjoining or abutting on the appellant's said premises.

This notice not being complied with, the respondents contracted with a builder to carry out the works required; these works were completed, and the final balance was paid to the contractor on the 8th Dec. 1876.

The respondent's surveyor, under this sect. 69, duly apportioned the estimated expenses, and on the 3rd July 1876 the respondents served upon the appellant and other owners notice of apportionment, the amount apportioned to the appellant being 27l. 19s. 4d.

The appellant gave no notice to dispute this apportionment under sect. 63 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98).

On the 15th Dec. 1876 the respondents served upon the appellant notice demanding payment of the sum of money so assessed upon him within fourteen days.

On the 29th May 1877 the respondents made complaint by way of summary proceedings for the recovery of this sum of 27*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.*, and on the 7th June 1877 the justices of Wilts made an order for payment of this amount upon the appellant, the order containing the words, "he being such owner of the said premises before and at the time when the said works were completed.

The appellant did not address any memorial to the Local Government Board in respect of these summary proceedings in pursuance of the 268th section of the Public Health Act 1875; but he duly appealed to the quarter sessions of the county against the said order.

At the said quarter sessions it was proved that the appellant ceased to be owner of these premises by the sale of his interest therein, to one Deacon, before the month of May 1876, and therefore about seven months before the completion of the works and the payment to the contractor of the final balance. The quarter sessions accordingly directed the order of the justices to be quashed with costs, on the ground that the appellant was not the owner, under the facts proved, within the terms of the order appealed against.

Judgment was given by the quarter sessions for the appellant, subject to this special case.

By the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), s. 69, it is enacted

That in case any present or future street, or any part thereof (not being a highway), be not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the local board of health, such board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, or channelled, require them to sewer, level, pave, flag, or channel the same within a time to be specified in such notice; and if such notice be not complied with, the said local board may, if they shall think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor, or in case of dispute as shall be settled by arbitration (having regard to all the circumstances of the case), in the manner provided by this Act; and such expenses may be recovered from the last-mentioned owners in a summary manner, or the same may be declared by order of the said local board to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such in the manner hereinafter provided.

By the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 62:

Where the local board have incurred expenses for the repayment whereof the owner of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred is made liable, either by application of or agreement with the owner, or by the Public Health Act 1848, or any Act incorporated therewith, or this Act, the same may be recovered from the person who is owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred, in the manner provided by the Public Health Act 1848, and such expenses shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred, and shall bear interest at the rate of five pounds per centum per annum till payment thereof. In all summary proceedings by a local board for the recovery of expenses incurred by them in works of private improvement, the time within which such proceedings may be taken shall be reckoned from the date of the service of notice of demand.

Mellor, Q.C. and P. Goldney for the appellant.—Sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848 is in effect repeated in sect. 150 of the Public Health Act 1875, the summary remedy to recover the amount expended being given in both Acts against "the owners in default." There is no liability until the works are completed and the apportionment demanded; the owner in default must therefore be the owner at the time of the demand. [Stopped by the Court.]

Charles, Q.C. and Ravenhill for the respondents.

—The owner in default, under sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, is the owner at the time of notice by the board requiring the premises to be sewered and levelled; this appears not only from the words of the section, which necessarily imply that the default mentioned is the omission to do the work required, but also from the 62nd section of the Local Government Act 1858, which expressly empowers the board to recover from "the owner of such premises, when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred." This provision of the Act of 1858 would be entirely superfluous if the appellant's contention were correct. This section is in effect repeated in sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875, which came into effect on the 11th Aug. 1875, and therefore applies to this case; and it seems from this recent Act, which consolidates the previously existing law on the subject, that boards or sanitary authorities have three remedies for the recovery of these expenses—one against the owner of the premises at the time when notice requiring the work to be done is delivered; one against the owner when the works are completed; and the third against the owner or occupier by instalments over any period not more than thirty years, when the board declare the amount to be private improvement expenses. The respondents in this case claim to enforce the first of these remedies, which by the findings of fact is clearly applicable to the appellant. Although there seems to be no authority on the point, a similar cumulative remedy was recognised under the Metropolitan Acts in Vestry of Bermondsey v. Ramsay, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 247.

Mellor, Q.C. was called upon to continue his argument for the appellant.—There cannot be a default until a payment is due; the owner is not required to comply with the notice to do the work himself; it is a mere condition preliminary to the board's undertaking it.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think we can reconcile these somewhat conflicting sections with common sense and justice. An owner, after he has given up all interest in the premises, cannot be an owner in default; but the further remedy against the owner in possession on the completion of the works may well apply to those premises which had a different owner at the time of the notice requiring the work to be done, and was no doubt intended to supplement the first remedy. I cannot think it was the intention of the Legislature that when a person ceases to be owner he should be liable for work not then done to the premises. The person liable should be the owner after the completion of the work; and I do not think that two owners of different periods can be both liable in respect of the same premises. What seems to be meant by the provisions of the Acts of 1848 and 1858, which are repeated in sects. 150 and 257 of the Act of 1875, is that the usual case of an owner who does not himself do the work required shall be within sect. 150; but, if that owner gives up possession during the time the work is being done by the board, the new owner comes within sect. 257. The two sections can thus, I think, be brought into harmony.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

TAYLOR (app.) v. GOODWIN (resp.) (a)

Highway—Furious driving—Bicycle—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 78.

A bicycle is within the meaning of the words "any sort of carriage" in the 78th section of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

The appellant was convicted of driving a bicycle furiously on a certain highway so as to endanger the lives and limbs of passengers thereon.

Held (upon appeal) that the conviction was right, as the words "any sort of carriage" were wide enough to include a bicycle, although that machine had not been invented at the time the Act was passed.

THIS was a case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

CASE.

At a petty sessions held at Highgate on the 31st day of July 1878, Charles Ernest Taylor, hereinafter called the appellant, was duly convicted for that he did on the 8th day of July unlawfully and furiously drive a carriage called a bicycle in a highway at Muswell Hill so as to endanger the lives and limbs of passengers thereon, against the form of the statute in that case made and provided, and he was adjudged to forfeit the sum of forty shillings, and seven shillings costs, for the said offence.

The conviction took place under the provisions of the 78th sect. of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, which, among other things, enacts that "if any person riding any horse or beast, or driving any sort of carriage, shall ride or drive the same furiously, so as to endanger the life or limb of any passenger, he shall for every such offence forfeit any sum not exceeding five pounds."

In his defence, it was urged on behalf of the appellant that a bicycle was not a "carriage" within the meaning of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, which was passed before the introduction of bicycles. That this Act only applies to carriages of any kind drawn by horses or other animals, but not to such as are automatic, and that other Acts of Parliament referring to carriages shew that this kind of carriages was not contemplated.

The justices considered that the appellant was driving by propelling a bicycle on a highway at a furious rate, so as to endanger the lives and limbs of passengers thereon.

The question for the decision of the court is whether a bicycle on which a person is seated, and which is driven by his propulsion is a carriage within the meaning of the 78th section of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, although it is not drawn by any animal, and had not been introduced (in its present form, although of a similar description with the ancient "hobby horse") at the time when 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, was passed in 1836.

If the court shall be of opinion that a bicycle is a "carriage," and that the propulsion of it by means of the person seated on and carried by it is a "driving of a carriage" within the meaning of the said 78th section of the above-quoted Act, the conviction is to be enforced; if the court shall otherwise decide, the complaint is to be dismissed.

John Boss (Poyser with him) for the appellant. The question for the opinion of the court is whether the words "drive any carriage" are wide enough to include a bicycle. It is clear that machines of this kind were not known at the time 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, was passed. If a bicycle comes within the terms of the Act, everything that goes on wheels might be included, e.g., a wheelbarrow, roller skates, a perambulator, or even a wheel trundled along the street by a coach-builder. Moreover, appellant was riding the bicycle, and not driving it, and a rider is not liable to summary conviction:

Reg. v. Bacon, 11 Cox Cr. Cas. 540.

Paterson (amicus curiæ) referred to Williams v. Evans, L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 277; 35 L. T. Rep. 384.

The distinction between bicycles and ordinary carriages is recognised by the Legislature in 41 & 42 Vict. c. 77, s. 26, where there is a special authority given for "regulating the use of bicycles."

Gorst, Q.C. (O. Bowen with him) for the respondent.—The word carriage is not restricted to a thing on wheels—anything that bears or carries a load is a carriage. In "Hamlet" the word is applied to a small strap. Then, again, the word to drive is an old English word, which signifies to make it move; it is not necessarily applied to animals. Thus an engine-driver causes the train to move, and we have the expression to drive a nail. To drive a carriage, therefore, means in its widest sense to propel or cause to move something on which a thing or person is carried, irrespective of the motive power. That is applicable to bicycles, which are clearly, therefore, within the terms of the 78th section of this Act.

MELLOR, J.—The question we have to determine appears to me to be an exceedingly simple one, and one which scarcely requires to be decided by lawyers. We have to interpret the meaning of the section of the Act of Parliament, and it seems to me that the magistrates were right in the construction they put upon it. After going through a number of provisions, the 78th section says: "If any person riding any horse or beast, or driving any sort of carriage, shall ride or drive the same furiously so as to endanger life or limb," then he is to be liable to a penalty. Now the words "any sort of carriage" is the largest description of the word carriage that can be given, and I confess that I myself think that although the bicycle was probably unknown at the time of the passing of the Act, yet clearly it was the intention of the Legislature to prohibit riding or driving of any carriage of any description whatever in such a manner as to endanger life. It does not seem necessary even that the carriage should be on wheels, for the words are wide enough to embrace anything that might be drawn along a road in the manner of a sledge; but beyond a doubt the words "any sort of carriage" are large enough to include the machine which gives a seat to a person riding on it—which goes on wheels, and which the person on it guides and propels, and therefore drives, just in the way that an engine driver guides and drives a train, although the motive power is supplied from a different source. I do not think it is necessary for us to deal with the numerous cases that have been suggested to us as illustrations to show that a machine of this kind is not within the purview of the Act. The word drive has abundant applications to things similar to that with which we are dealing. I therefore am of opinion that the magistrates were right in holding that the rider of this bicycle was liable under the section—whether a bicycle may be said to be ridden or driven, the mischief is the same. I think that the bicycle was a carriage driven, and driven at such a pace as to endanger life, by the person seated upon it, and therefore that it came within the section referred to. The magistrates therefore were right, and the conviction must be affirmed.

LUSH, J.—I am also of opinion that the magistrates were right. The mischief the Act was intended to prevent was furious riding or driving upon highways, and it was immaterial whether that which was ridden or driven was an animal or a vehicle if it was propelled along the highway at a great pace. Although at the time the Act was passed bicycles were not invented, it is quite clear the Legislature intended to include every kind of vehicle which could do the mischief contemplated by the Act. The words are, "That if any person riding any horse or beast, or driving any sort of carriage, shall ride or drive the same furiously, so as to endanger life or limb, he shall be liable," and those words are large enough, and intentionally large enough, to include every kind of vehicle that could be propelled along a highway. This particular bicycle was going at the rate of fourteen miles an hour, and well might be dangerous to the public—it clearly comes within the description of "carriage"—it carries its rider, and is propelled by the driver—it is utterly immaterial what may be the motive power. It is embraced in the large words of the Act of Parliament, and the conviction must be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

TOMLINSON v. BULLOCK. (a)

Act of Parliament—Commencement of operation of Act—Interpretation—"After the passing of this Act"—Bastardy Act (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 3.

An Act of Parliament which comes into operation upon a given day becomes law as soon as the day commences, and any event which occurs during that day is, in contemplation of law, an event which takes place after the passing of the Act.

This was a case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment below.

Lockwood for the appellant.—The statute 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, must be taken to have come into force at the earliest moment of the 10th Aug. 1872, as that was the day upon which it received the Royal assent. This child, which was born on the 10th Aug., was therefore born after the passing of the Act. If that is not so, it will become necessary to ascertain the exact moment at which the Royal assent was actually given, so as to distinguish which of the two events happened first:

Campbell v. Strangeways, L. Rep. 3 C. P. Div. 105; 37 L. T. Rep. 672.

In Combs v. Pitt (3 Burr. 1434) Lord Mansfield says, "Though the law does not in general allow of the fraction of a day, yet it admits it in cases where it is necessary to distinguish." See also on this point

Chick v. Smith, 8 Dowl. 337;

Maxwell on Statutes, p. 311.

A. Crompton, for the respondent, contended that the law would not take cognisance of the fragments of a day, and that the Act, therefore, only came into operation on the day following that on which the Royal assent was given. He referred to 33 Geo. 3, c. 13, as to the date on which an Act of Parliament received the Royal assent.

Our. adv. vult.

March 27.—The written judgment of the court was delivered by LUSH, J.—This is an appeal from the decision of justices dismissing an application for an order under the Bastardy Act. The application was made on the 5th Sept. 1872, but by reason of the absence of the respondent from England the summons was not taken out till the 26th July, 1878. It appeared on the hearing that the child was born on the 10th Aug. 1872, being the day on which the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65 received the Royal assent. That Act, which came into operation immediately on its passing, repealed the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, and enacted other provisions in lieu thereof. The third section enacts that "any single woman who may be delivered of a bastard child after the passing of this Act, may either before the birth, or at any time within twelve months from the birth of such child, or at any time thereafter, upon proof that the man alleged to be the father of such child has within the twelve months next after the birth of such child paid money for its maintenance, or at any time within the twelve months next after the return to England of the man alleged to be the father of such child, upon proof that he ceased to reside in England within the twelve months next after the birth of such child, make application, &c." The repealing clause excepted anything therefore duly done under the repealed Act, and kept the latter Act alive for the purpose of supporting and continuing any proceeding taken before the passing of the Act in question; but it made no provision as to children born before its passing, and in respect of which no proceeding had been taken, consequently the mother of a child born on the 9th Aug. 1872 had no remedy under the Act then in force (the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101), because that Act was repealed on the following day; and no remedy under the repealing Act, because that applied only to children born after its passing. To supply this defect another Act was passed at the commencement of the following session. The Act 36 Vict. c. 9. The 3rd section of that Act enacts that any woman delivered of a bastard child on or before the 10th day of August 1872 (the day on which the repealing Act was passed), who but for the repeal by the last-mentioned Act would have been entitled to apply for a summons against the putative father of such child, shall be entitled to apply for such summons as follows: "In any case in which she would have been entitled to apply at any time under twelve months from the birth of the child, she shall be entitled to apply at any time within six months next after the passing of this Act." If the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, had not been repealed, the applicant would have been entitled to apply for a summons within twelve months from the birth of the child. She might, therefore, have availed herself of the amending Act by applying within six months after its passing, but she did not do so; and although that Act in the 8th section rendered valid all orders made in respect of children born before the 10th Aug. 1872, it says nothing of pending applications, nor does it say anything in respect of children born, not before, but on the day on which the Act of 1872 passed. It seems to have been assumed on all hands that a child born on the 10th Aug. was not within the Act of 1872, and the justices, upon this assumption, considered that, as the applicant had not brought herself within the remedial Act of 1873, she had no locus standi. If this assumption were well founded, we should be of opinion that the decision was right. But we think that is an erroneous assumption. At common law all statutes passed in a session of Parliament had relation back to the first day of the session, unless some other day was appointed for the Act coming into operation. This relation was productive of the most serious consequences, many instances of which are found in the books. And in the 33rd year of the reign of Geo. III. an Act was passed which required the clerk of the Parliament to indorse on every Act the day, month, and year when the same received the Royal assent, and enacted that such indorsement should be taken as part of the Act, and should be the date of its commencement where no other commencement was provided. The only point of time which this Act makes material is the day on which the Royal assent was given. It thus recognises the well known maxim that the law takes no notice of fractions of a day, and except in cases where there are conflicting rights between subject and subject, for the determination of which it is necessary to ascertain the actual priority, such is the universal rule. An act which comes into operation on a given day becomes law as soon as the day commences. By the operation of the repealing clause of the Act of 1872, the Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101 was repealed, and the new Act came into effect at the first moment of the 10th of August, 1872. Every event which occurred during that day was, in contemplation of law, an event which took place after the passing of the Act. The same maxim it is true applies to the birth of a child. In computing the age of a person, the day, and not the hour, of his birth is regarded, when no conflicting right is in question. A person born on the 3rd Sept. was held to be of age twenty-one years afterwards, without regard to the fractions of the days (1 Lord Raym. 480). But, on the other hand, a fiction of law is not allowed to prevail against the plain intent of an Act. Now it is clear that the Act of 1872 was not intended to deprive the mother of a child born on the day on which it passed of a remedy against the putative father. It intended to substitute another remedy for that which it took away, and if that intent can be effectuated without violence to its language, our duty is so to construe the Act as to carry out that intent. We do no violence to its language by holding that a child born at any time during the 10th of August was born "after the passing of the Act," which, in contemplation of law, took place as soon as the clock began to strike twelve in the night of the 9th of August. We are therefore of opinion that the decision of the justices was erroneous, and we remit the case to them to be determined upon the merits.

Decision of justices reversed.

Inhabited house duty — Act of 1851 — Working men's club.

A working men's reform club, which had never been furnished as a dwelling-house or slept in at night, and which was used in the day time as to the upper floor by an auctioneer for the purposes of his business, and as to the rest of the building for club purposes only, from 9 a.m. to 10.30 p.m., was by the commissioners held liable to be assessed for inhabited house duty.

Held, on case stated for the opinion of the court, that the premises did not constitute an inhabited dwelling-house, and were not liable to be assessed for the tax.

Statutes as to duty on dwelling-houses considered.

CASE stated under part 3 of the statute 37 & 38 Vict. c. 16.

At a meeting of the commissioners for the general purposes of the income tax, and for executing the Acts relating to the inhabited house duties, held at the office of the clerk to the commissioners, Shorrock Ford, in the hundred of Blackburn, county of Lancaster, on the 18th July 1877.

The appellant, on behalf of the Working Men's Reform Club, William-street, in the township of Over Darwen, appealed against an assessment to inhabited house duty for the year ending the 5th April 1877, at 9d. in the pound upon 40l., the annual value of the building occupied by the club.

The appellant claimed exemption on the ground that the building was not an inhabited dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, inasmuch as the place was not and never had been since its erection furnished as a dwelling-house or slept in at night, and was used during the day time for club and trade purposes only. He stated that the upper floor of the building was let to an auctioneer, who used it during the day time as a place for the sale of goods, and contended that the building being a place used entirely for trade and club purposes was not liable to inhabited house duty.

The surveyor of taxes, the present respondent, stated that he had seen the premises, and found the building to consist of two storeys. The ground floor was occupied by the appellants as a club, and contained the usual rooms, namely, billiard-room, newsroom, lavatory, &c. The upper floor was let to an auctioneer, and used by him as a place of trade. The club was open each day from 9 a.m. to 10.30 p.m., and then closed for the night, no person remaining inside the premises. The surveyor contended that the building came within the scope of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, sched. (B.) No. 5, and that it was not necessary for a building to be slept in to render it liable to inhabited house duty. In support of this view he referred to case 2760 decided by the judges on the 15th Feb. 1867 and contended that, as the place was not used for trade, but in the manner above stated, it was not within any of the exemptions contained in the Acts.

The appellant sought to distinguish the present case from the case No. 2760, inasmuch as the present building had never acquired the character of a dwelling-house by reason of its never having been slept in or furnished as such.

The commissioners were of opinion that the club was subject to the duty. The appellant expressed his dissatisfaction with their decision, and requested them to state a case for the opinion of the court, whereupon the above case was stated.

The sections and other portions of Acts of Parliament material to this question are the following:

The 48 Geo. 3, c. 55 (which as to the schedules (A.) and (B.) hereinafter mentioned was repealed by the Acts of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 19, respectively) enacted that there should be assessed, raised, levied, and paid, &c., upon houses, windows, and lights, as set forth in the schedule (A.) to the Act annexed; and upon inhabited houses as set forth in the schedule (B.) to the Act annexed, the several new and consolidated duties respectively inserted, described, and set forth in the said respective schedules; the schedules and rules were to be deemed a part of the Act.

The schedules and rules, so far as material, are as follows:

SCHEDULE (A.).

A schedule of the duties made payable for every dwelling-house within and throughout Great Britain, according to the number of windows or lights in each dwelling-house, and the offices to be charged therewith.

After the rules characterising the mode of charging, follow the Exemptions from the said Duties.

Case 1. Any house belonging to His Majesty, or any of the Royal Family, and every public office for which the duties heretofore payable have been paid by His Majesty, or out of the public revenue.

SCHEDULE (B.).

A schedule of the duties made payable on all inhabited dwelling-houses throughout Great Britain according to the value thereof, and of the offices and lands to be charged therewith.

Here follow the duties.

Rules for charging the said last-mentioned Duties.

1. The said last-mentioned duties to be charged annually on the occupier or occupiers for the time being of every such dwelling-house, being of the annual rent of 5l. or upwards, at the respective rates before mentioned, and to be levied on him, her, or them, or on his, her, or their respective executors or administrators, and in like manner, in case of a change in the occupation thereof, as is before directed in respect of the duties on windows or lights, and in addition to the duties contained in schedule (A.).

4. Every chamber or apartment in any of the inns of court, or of Chancery, or in any college or hall in any of the Universities of Great Britain, being severally in the tenure or occupation of any person or persons, shall be charged thereto as an entire house, and on the respective occupiers thereof.

5. Every hall or office whatever belonging to any person or persons, or to any body or bodies politic or corporate, or to any company that are or may be lawfully charged with the payment of any other taxes or parish rates, shall be subject to the duties hereby made payable as inhabited houses; and the person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, or company, to whom the same shall belong, shall be charged as the occupier or occupiers thereof.

Exemptions.

Case 1. [This exemption is the same as the first exemption to Schedule A. already cited.]

The statute 57 Geo. 3, c. 25, s. 1, after reciting the last-mentioned Act, and also that

It is become usual in cities and large towns, and other places, for one and the same person, or for each person where two or more persons are in partnership, to occupy a dwelling-house, or dwelling-houses, for their residence, and at the same time one or more separate and distinct tenements or buildings, or parts of tenements or buildings, for the purposes of trade, or as warehouses for lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as shops or counting-houses, and to abide therein in the day time only for the purposes of such trades respectively, which have been charged with the said recited duties, although no person shall inhabit or dwell therein in the night time; and it is expedient in such cases to exempt from the said duties such tenements or buildings, or parts of tenements or buildings, as are or shall be solely employed for the purposes herein mentioned, enacted that persons should not be charged by the commissioners in respect of such last-mentioned buildings.

The statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4, after reciting the exemption granted as above mentioned in the last cited Act, enacts that the same shall be extended

To all and every person, or any number of persons in partnership together, for and in respect of any house, tenement, or building, or part of a tenement or building, in the said Act (57 Geo. 4, c. 25, s. 9) described, which shall be used by such person or persons as offices or counting-houses for the purposes of exercising or carrying on any profession, vocation, business, or calling, by which such person or persons shall seek a livelihood or profit, no person inhabiting, dwelling, or abiding therein, except in the day time only, for the purpose of such profession, vocation, business, or calling, such person, or each such persons in partnership respectively, residing in a distinct and separate dwelling-house, or part of the dwelling-house charged to the said duties, provided nevertheless, that the exemption herein authorised shall not extend to any chamber or apartment in any of the inns of court or of Chancery, or to any college or hall in either of the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, now chargeable with any of the said duties.

By the 2nd and 3rd sections of the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 7, certain provisions were made for exempting from the duty houses the building of which was completed or the occupation commenced after the beginning and in the course of the year of assessment, and for the exemption of unfurnished houses occupied only by a caretaker.

By the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, the duties in schedule (A.) of the statute 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, were repealed (those in schedule (B.) having been already repealed by the Act of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 19), and it was enacted that there should assessed, raised, levied, collected, and paid, &c., upon inhabited dwelling-houses in and throughout Great Britain the several duties set forth in the schedule annexed to the Act, payable according to the annual value of such dwelling-houses; the schedule to be part of the Act.

SCHEDULE.

For every inhabited dwelling-house which with the household and other offices, yards and gardens therewith occupied and charged, is or shall be worth the rent of twenty pounds or upwards by the year, . . . where any such dwelling-house shall not be occupied and used for any such purpose and in manner aforesaid (i.e. for the purpose of a shop, licensed for sale of beer, farm-house, &c., &c.) there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of such annual value thereof the sum of ninepence.

It was under the words of this schedule here set out that it was attempted to charge the building in question.

Bush Cooper for the appellant.—The short point raised by the case is, whether or not a building, which has not been used as a dwelling-house, or slept in by the occupier, is chargeable to the inhabited house duty under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36. It is attempted to charge this house under the last part of the schedule to that Act, and in order to see what is the meaning which the Legislature has attached to the term "inhabited dwelling-house," it is necessary to go back to the Act of Geo. 3, by which this duty was first imposed. On referring to the schedules (A.) and (B.) of the Act of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, we find the distinct on drawn between what is properly called an inhabited dwelling-house and an office or place where no person is sleeping, and rule 5 marks that distinction. Schedules (A.) and (B.) refer to dwelling-houses and inhabited dwelling-houses respectively; and the first rule of schedule (B.) makes the duties under that schedule chargeable on the "occupier or occupiers for the time being" of every such dwelling-house. Then rule 5 of the same schedule, charging the owners in certain cases, draws the distinction between that which is properly called an inhabited dwelling-house and an office or other place where no person is sleeping. In the case of an inhabited dwelling-house properly so called, the occupier is the person to be charged. Then, as it was thought that that would leave exempt offices or halls where no one slept, rule 5 provides for that case, not treating them as dwelling-houses, but making them liable to the same tax. The words of the Act of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, are distinct; to come under that statute a house must be an inhabited dwelling-house; it is not even sufficient that it should be built with a view to being dwelt in—it must be actually inhabited, and from rule 5 of the schedule (B.) to the Act of Geo. 3, I say it must be slept in. This house is not, in any sense, an inhabited dwelling-house; no person resides or sleeps in it, from floor to cellar; it is merely resorted to in the day time by the members of the club, and by an auctioneer; and it cannot be brought within the purview of the Act.

Dacey for the respondent.—My first contention is, that this house is an inhabited dwelling-house and comes directly within the Act. On this point my contention is supported by the authority of Bramwell, L.J., in the case of Rusby v. Newsom (L. Rep. 10 Ex. 322). There the question was whether there was exemption from inhabited house duty by reason of the premises then in question being used as to some part of them only (not constituting a separate tenement or house) for trade purposes; the court held they were not exempt. In the judgment of Lord Justice (then Baron) Bramwell, at p. 328, these words occur: "If it is said that our construction is harsh, possibly in one sense it is, but in another sense it clearly is not. The Legislature had said originally that all inhabited houses should be subject to the duty, and it was held, properly, no doubt, that a house which was not occupied at night, but was occupied in the day time for the purposes of trade, was an inhabited house and subject to duty. Very likely it was pointed out that that was in truth taxing the instruments of trade, and perhaps was injudicious as a tax upon machinery or tools, or other means by which trade was carried on; and thereupon the Legislature thought that it was reasonable to exempt buildings which were solely used for purposes of trade and for the other purposes mentioned," &c. I cite it to show what was the view entertained by that learned judge as to the construction that had been put on the statute, and that it was a construction in which he acquiesced, namely, that occupation at night was not necessary to constitute inhabitancy. Further, by dwelling-house is meant any house used for human habitation for any considerable time or the whole day; that is the natural sense of the word, and it appears that the house in question was dwelt in from 9 in the morning till 10.30 at night. It is necessary to refer to the provisions of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, which first imposed the duty, to discover the meaning of these terms, and as it is said that, "the exception proves the rule," so I rely on the exemptions from the tax to show what was the extent of the tax. The first exemption under schedules (A.) and (B.) includes "public offices" which presumably were used as offices only, but which were evidently deemed to be covered by the charging words of this enactment. It is clear from these exemptions that the word "dwelling-house" was used in the Act in a somewhat wider sense than that ordinarily given to it. Further it appears from the recital and first section of the statute 57 Geo. 3, c. 25, which is, I think, the first exempting Act, that "separate and distinct tenements or buildings, or parts of tenements or buildings," occupied "for the purpose of trade or as warehouses for lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as shops or counting-houses" in which persons abode "in the day time only for the purposes of such trades respectively" had been charged with duty under the former Act as dwelling-houses, although no person inhabited or dwelt in them in the night time. The term "dwelling-house," therefore, bore a meaning far more extensive than is ordinarily given to it. This explains and corroborates the statements made by Bramwell, L.J. in the judgment I have cited. The next Act I wish to refer to is the 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4; that section shows that houses or buildings used as offices or counting-houses for business purposes, and in which no person inhabited, dwelt, or abode except in the day time, and for the purposes of such business only, had been taxed as dwelling-houses, although in the ordinary sense of the word they would not be considered dwelling-houses, and that, too, in spite of the former exemption. Again, there are a series of exceptions in respect of warehouses and houses occupied solely for the purposes of trade, all of which are houses. The very question which has arisen in the various cases under the enactments has been, Are those houses occupied solely for the purpose of trade? and they all rest on the assumption that a house may, unless it can come within some specific exemption, be an inhabited dwelling-house even though it is a house used for the purposes of trade, and in fact for the purposes of trade in the day time only. It need not be a house in which a man actually has his residence. No one would say that a house used as a club-house or a coffee-house or an auctioneer's office thereby became a residence; yet the case of a club would go a good deal further in respect of "residence" than the case of a mere office; and yet—and that is my point—offices are distinctly within the purview of the Act. The next Act which I will cite is the 6 Geo. 4, c. 7. Ss. 2 and 3 tend to show that the meaning given to dwelling-house was very wide, and that the test of a dwelling-house chargeable under the Act was the fitness of the house for habitation, and its actual occupancy. See also sect. 7. See also rules 4 and 5 of schedule (B) of the Act of 48 Geo. 4, c. 55. The terms "dwelling" and "inhabited" have different values, and must be considered separately. First I say this is a dwelling-house, for it is a house built for human habitation. It is further an inhabited house, for it is inhabited for more than twelve hours in the day by a large number of persons who resort to it.

KELLER, C.B.—This claim of inhabited house duty by the Crown cannot be sustained. It appears from the case that this house has never been furnished as a dwelling-house, that no one sleeps in it, or has ever slept in it, and it is occupied and used for trade purposes and those of the club only. The effect of the statutes is that what is chargeable is an inhabited dwelling-house within the meaning of those statutes. If the word "inhabited" were there alone, we should have to consider whether there might not be an inhabitancy, and I am not prepared to say that there might not be an inhabitancy, which would make the building an inhabited house within these Acts of Parliament, as far as the word "inhabited" goes. But it appears from all the statutes that in order to be taxable a building must be an inhabited dwelling-house, so that we must put a construction not only on the word "inhabited," but also on the word "dwelling-house." Is, then, any part of this building a dwelling-house? I think it is not. In the absence of any interpretation by Act of Parliament and of any binding authority we are compelled to consider what is the proper meaning of this term. In my judgment the meaning of the word to "dwell" is to live in a house; that is to live there day and night, to sleep there during the night, and to occupy it for the purposes of life during the day. And there is nothing to show that that is not the natural meaning; and there is nothing shown to compel us to put any but this natural and well-established meaning on it. As to the recital in the Act of 5 Geo. 3, c. 25, it would seem that in the cases to which it refers the persons therein mentioned were assessed in respect of the value or rental of those separate buildings, in addition to the rental or value of the house in which they resided and lived; but if it mean anything else we should, I think, be compelled to conclude that the words of the recital, which is not grammatical in its composition, were incautiously used by the framers of the Act, and were misapplied; and it cannot under these circumstances avail to impose the tax which is warranted by no statute and no authority besides. I think the plain and natural meaning of the words in question is to dwell and live in a building day and night, to reside there, and occupy it as a residence, and, as this place has never been so occupied, in my opinion it is not a dwelling-house, and therefore the assessment must be disallowed.

POLLOCK, B.—In my opinion the members of this club are not assessable to the inhabited house duty. If in order to decide this it were necessary also to decide that, to charge a building as an inhabited dwelling-house, some person or persons must sleep in that house as well as occupy it by day, I should pause before I came to that conclusion, for the counsel for the respondent has certainly shown that there are passages in certain statutes, and certain dicta of learned judges, both in England and in Scotland, which are unfavourable to that conclusion. But the present case at any rate is quite different from those in which such a conclusion might possibly be applicable; for this is the case of a club, the members of which use this building not in any sense for the purposes of a dwelling-house. The purposes and object of such institutions, and the character of the occupation, are perfectly well known, and I am clearly of opinion that words should be used which properly and clearly comprehend such a case, if it is intended to bring it within the scope of the tax. When, however, I consider the ordinary meaning of the words "inhabited house," it seems to me that it is altogether a misapplication of language to say that it applies to the case of a club consisting of a great number of persons who simply have a house to carry out the purposes of their club. On these grounds, therefore, I think that the assessment is wrong, and cannot be supported.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Will—Gift of money to trustees of a mechanics' institution—To be applied towards the building fund connected therewith—Charity—Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 38)—Perpetuity—Literary and Scientific Institutions Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 112), ss. 30, 33—Void bequest—Construction.

The Tunstall Athenæum and Mechanics Institution was established and maintained by the donations and subscriptions of its members for the purpose of providing a lending and reference library and reading room and lectures, for the use and mutual improvement of the members. By some of the rules of the institution all the property of the institution was vested in the trustees thereof for the time being, and the institution was not to be dissolved except by the resolution of nine-tenths in number of the members present at a specially called general meeting, to be confirmed by a like resolution at a subsequent meeting of the same character. There was no building fund in connection with the institution, but there was a "sinking fund" established to pay off a mortgage on the premises occupied by, and which was the property of, the institution. A testator having bequeathed a sum of money "unto the trustees for the time being of the institution, to be applied by them towards the building fund in connection therewith," it was Held, by the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Huddleston, B.), that the institution was not a charitable institution so as to bring the case within the terms of the Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36), but that the bequest was void as tending to create a perpetuity.

The cases of Carne v. Long (2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; 2 De G. F. & J. 75; 29 L. J. 503) and Thomson v. Shakespeare (1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 398; 2 De G. F. & J. 399; 29 L. J. 276, Ch.) in point and followed.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the judge of the County Court of Staffordshire, holden at Hanley, Burslem, and Tunstall, on the petition of John Wade Peake and J. Beech, the trustees of the Tunstall Athenæum Mechanics Institution, and the facts of the case were as follows:—The testator, one Thomas Dalton, by his will bearing date the 10th Aug. 1874, after the bequests of divers pecuniary legacies, gave, devised, and bequeathed the residue and remainder of his personal estate, and all his real estate, to his wife and one Allen Beckett Lowndes, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust to get in, sell, and convert the same into money, and to invest the proceeds and pay the annual income thereof to his said wife, for her separate use during her life, and from and immediately after her decease, the said testator gave and bequeathed the capital as well as the income of the said proceeds of his said trust estate, after the payment of the legacies hereinbefore bequeathed, "unto the trustees for the time being of the Tunstall Athenæum Mechanics Institution, to be applied by them towards the building fund in connection therewith," and it was declared that the receipts of the trustees of the institution should be sufficient discharges to the trustees of the said will.

The testator died on the 13th Aug. 1874, not leaving any real estate, but his residuary personal estate amounted to the sum of 431l. 2s. 2d. His wife survived him, and on her death, on the 26th March 1877, disputes and questions arose touching the validity of the above bequest to the trustees of the Tunstall Athenæum, and thereupon the surviving executor and trustee of the testator's will, the said Allen Beckett Lowndes, paid the 431l. 2s. 2d. into the Post Office Savings Bank under the provisions of the Trustee Relief Acts and the County Court Act 1867. Thereupon the trustees of the Tunstall Athenæum and Mechanics Institution, presented their petition praying that the money should be paid to them as such trustees, to be applied by them in accordance with the directions of the testator's will. The surviving executor and the next of kin of the testator were made respondents to and opposed the said petition, which came on for hearing before the County Court judge, when it appeared from the evidence that the institution was founded for the purpose of providing the members of the institution with a library consisting of a library of reference, and a circulating library, and a reading room, and for holding public lectures and classes for mutual improvement. The institution was managed by a committee appointed under rules in accordance with the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act 1854, and occupied a house which was purchased, ready built, by the committee. There was no "building fund," but there was a "sinking fund" formed by a resolution of the committee for the purpose of paying off a mortgage debt on the premises.

The following were the rules relating to the constitution of the society, so far as material to this report:

1. The members of this institution shall consist of (a) Donors of 10l. or upwards in money or books at one time, who shall be invested with all the privileges of class b for life. (b) Honorary subscribers of 1l. and upwards annually, who shall be eligible to any office, and entitled to all the privileges of the institution. (c) Subscribers of 10s. per annum, with 1s. entrance fee, who shall be entitled to all privileges as above. (d) Subscribers of 5s. per annum and 6d. entrance fee, entitling them to the use of the reading room or library separately, as may be determined upon at the time of entering. . . .

4. The institution shall not be dissolved without the consent of nine-tenths in number of the members present at a general meeting to be specially called for that purpose, such consent to be confirmed by the like majority at a special general meeting, to be called within not less than one or more than three calendar months from the passing of such first resolution. . . .

5. The property and effects of the institution shall from time to time be vested in the trustees for the time being in trust for the general benefit of the members. . . .

45. No member, on withdrawing from this institution by forfeiture, expulsion, or otherwise, shall be entitled to claim any share or interest in the property of the institution.

The learned judge of the County Court held that the testator's gift to the trustees of the institution was void under the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, as being a bequest of money to be laid out in land for a charitable purpose, and dismissed the petition of the Athenæum trustees, and directed that the property should go the testator's next of kin.

From that decision the trustees of the Tunstall Athenæum appealed, and a rule nisi was obtained, calling on the surviving executor and next of kin of the testator to show cause why the judgment or order of the judge of the County Court should not be set aside, and an order made in the terms of the petition on the ground that the institution was not a charity, and that the gift was not void for perpetuity, or on the ground that, if the institution was a charity, the gifts was not void under the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, and accordingly

May 10.—Arthur Charles, Q.C. appeared for some of the next of kin and showed cause against the rule.—The question for the court's determination here is, whether or not this is a good and valid trust, or whether the gift to the trustees of the Tunstall Athenæum is or is not a void bequest. There are two grounds on which it is contended on the part of the next of kin that the bequest is void: first, as being a bequest to a charity of money to be laid out in the purchase of land; and, secondly, as tending by the terms of the bequest to create a perpetuity. With regard to the first point, the will contains no direction that land is not to be purchased with this money, nor is there anything in the will to prevent such an application of it, and therefore it is void within the meaning of the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. With regard to the second point, it can hardly be contended on the part of the trustees of the institution that the terms of the bequest do not contemplate the perpetual continuance of the institution, though it is true that by the 4th rule of the institution there is a power to dissolve it if a majority, consisting of not less than nine-tenths of the majority of the members present at a specially called general meeting, resolve that that shall be done. The present case clearly tends to create a perpetuity, and it cannot be distinguished from the decision of Lord Campbell, L.C. in Carns v. Long (2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; 2 De G. F. & J. 75; 29 L. J. 503, Ch.) [He was then stopped.]

English Harrison on the same side, for others of the next of kin, added nothing.

Julian Robins, for the surviving executor and trustee of the testator's will, submitted to abide by the decision of the court.

A. D. Tyssen and Sidney Woolf, for the trustees of the Tunstall Institution, supported their rule.—A gift such as that in this case to an association of this kind in such a way as to make the subject-matter of the gift become part of the property of the association so as to come under their free disposition, as is the case here, is a perfectly good and valid gift. The present case differs from that of Carns v. Long, which was the case of a corporation where there was no right to divide the property. The present association is a voluntary unincorporated body, and may divide the property amongst themselves as co-owners on dissolving the society. They are a mere club. There is nothing in the nature of the association that infringes the rule against perpetuities, the members having a power to dissolve at any moment, as in the case of Brown v. Dale, before the Master of the Rolls (L. Rep. 9 Ch. Div. 78). The present case is within the decision of Wickens, V.C., in Cocks v. Manners (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 869; L. Rep. 12 Eq. Cas. 574; 40 L. J. 640, Ch.), in which the distinction between that case and Carns v. Long was pointed out by the learned Vice-Chancellor, the gift in Carns v. Long being to the trustees and their heirs for ever, and the members there having no power to sell the land the profits of which were given in trust for the benefit of the institution. [KELLY, C.B. refers to The Mayor, &c., of Gloucester v. Wood, 3 Hare, 131; s.c. nom. The Corporation of Gloucester v. Osborn and another, in the H. of L., affirming the decision below, 1 Cl. & Fin. 272.] They cited also and contended that this bequest was not void within the rule against perpetuities, and that the decision of the County Court judge was wrong.

A. Charles, Q.C. in reply.—Nothing that has been urged on the other side has upset the authority of the decision in Carns v. Long, or its applicability to the present case. This money surely could never become the property of the trustees or members of the institution under any circumstances, for the institution comes within and is subject to the provisions of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 112), by the express terms of sect. 33 of the Act, by sect. 30 of which the property on dissolution would go to some other institution, and could not be divided among the members.

Cur. adv. vult.

KELLY, C.B.—This case came before us on appeal from a decision of the judge of the County Court of Staffordshire, and the question we have to decide is, whether a bequest under the will of one Thos. Dalton to the trustees for the time being of the Tunstall Athenæum and Mechanics Institution can or not be supported as valid. Two questions upon which the bequest might be held to be invalid were presented to us in the course of the argument, viz.: first, that it was void under the Mortmain Act as a bequest to a charitable institution; and secondly, that it was void as tending to create a perpetuity. If the bequest should be held to come within either of these two grounds of objection, it would be a void bequest, and the next of kin of the testator would be entitled to the money or fund which was the subject of it. The trusts of the bequest are "to the trustees for the time being of the Tunstall Athenæum and Mechanics Institution, to be applied by them towards the building fund in connection therewith." The first question, therefore, that arises is, what is the nature and character of this Athenæum, and is it a charitable institution? Upon that point, having regard to the terms of the bequest, I think that, if the institution were a charity, this bequest would probably be held to be void under the Mortmain Act. But when we look to the rules of this society, which set out at great length the objects and purposes of the institution, we find that it is in reality a species of club in which a number of people meet together, and agree to occupy and use a certain house and premises for the purposes of mutual literary instruction, amusement, and improvement. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that this institution is not a charitable institution, and that it comes clearly within the decision of Hall, V.C., in the case of Re Clark's Trusts, (45 L. J. 194, Ch.; L. Rep. 1 Ch. Div. 497,) in which the learned Vice-Chancellor deals with the question which arises in the present case, and decides that an institution for mutual benefit is not a charity. But even if this institution were to be held to be a charitable institution, I am by no means sure that this particular bequest would be void. The other and principal question, however, that was argued before us was, whether the bequest was valid, or whether it was void, on the ground that, having regard to its express terms, it tended to the creation of a perpetuity. Now, with regard to that question, I am clearly of opinion that this bequest is certainly void on that ground. The case of Carns v. Long is strongly in point. In that case there was a devise of freeholds to the "trustees for the time being of the Penzance Public Library to hold to them and their successors for ever for the use, benefit, maintenance, and support of the said library," and the Lord Chancellor (Lord Campbell) in his judgment in that case said: "I look upon this as a devise for the benefit of a society of individuals in Penzance. My objection to it is that it leads to a perpetuity, an objection with which the Vice-Chancellor does not appear to have dealt, but which appears to me wholly fatal to the devise. The clear intention of the testator, as expressed by the will, is that there should be a gift in perpetuity to this institution at Penzance. The gift is to the trustees for the time being of the society and their successors for ever, they holding it for the use, benefit, maintenance, and support of the library." Now, without doubt, these are stronger words than those which appear in the bequest in the present case; but nevertheless, looking to the rules and constitution of the society with which we are dealing, it appears to me that there is nothing here to prevent this society lasting for ever, or that should necessarily cause it to cease to exist, and I think, therefore, that, though the bequest in this case does not contain the strong words of the one in Carne v. Long, the principle of that case does and must apply. Lord Campbell then went on to say: "If the devise had been in favour of the existing members of the society, and had they been at liberty to dispose of the property as they might think fit, then it might, I think, have been a lawful disposition, and not tending to a perpetuity. But looking to the language of the rules of this society, it is clear that the library was intended to be a perpetual institution, and the testator must be presumed to have known what the regulations were. By one of these it is provided that the society is not to be broken up so long as the members remain. The devise is for the benefit of a subsisting society, and one which is intended to subsist so long as the members remain, and the property comprised in the devise is therefore to be taken out of commerce, and to become inalienable, not for a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards, but for so long as ten of the members of the society shall remain." On that ground the decision of the Vice-Chancellor in Carne v. Long was reversed accordingly. There are many other cases also, and amongst them that of Thomson v. Shakespeare (1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 398; 1 De G. F. & J. 399; 29 L. J. 276, Ch.) which are in point even more directly upon the present case, and go to show that where by the constitution of a club, society, or other institution, not a charity, there is nothing necessarily to put an end to its existence, so that it may last an indefinite time, and the gift is made in such terms as to make the subject of it an accession to the capital or permanent property of the club, or other institution, and not a sum to be brought into the annual accounts of the institution as part of its yearly income to be disposed of by the then existing members, then there is in such a case a tendency to a perpetuity, and the bequest is void. For these reasons, therefore, I am of opinion that the judgment of the County Court judge was right, that the next of kin are entitled to our judgment, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

EX. DIV.] JONES (app.) v. THE CWMORTHIN SLATE COMPANY (LIMITED) (resps.).

HUDDESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the argument it was almost conceded that this institution was not in any sense a charitable institution, its object being solely social and literary, and that the case therefore did not fall within the Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36). It was, however, urged upon us that the County Court judge was right in holding the bequest to be void as tending to a perpetuity, and I agree entirely with my Lord in holding that that is so. It was contended on the part of the appellants, the trustees of the Athenæum, that there were no words in the present case showing that the testator contemplated anything in the nature of a perpetuity, and that in that respect the case resembled the case of Cocks v. Manners, where there was a bequest to a voluntary association of ladies for pious and charitable purposes, and that there was, as in that case, nothing in the rules of the present institution to prevent the dissolution of the society and the division of the property, and in that respect establishing a great distinction between the present case and that of Carne v. Long. That argument, however, if it were well founded, was met and answered by Mr. Charles on the part of the respondents, the next of kin, who referred to the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 112), and pointed out that that Act, which by sect. 33 is made applicable to all such institutions as the present one, expressly provides by sect. 30 that upon dissolution the property of an institution under the Act shall not be paid to or distributed among the members of the institution, or any of them, but shall be given to some other institution to be determined by the members at the time of dissolution, or in default thereof by the judge of the County Court. I agree with Mr. Charles that it is not necessary that a bequest should contain the express words "for ever" in order to bring it within the rule against perpetuities. The real object of the present testator clearly was to do something which should be a benefit to the institution or society for ever, and so to create a perpetuity; and I am therefore of opinion that the County Court judge's decision was right, and this appeal therefore should be dismissed.

JONES (app.) v. THE CWMORTHIN SLATE COMPANY, LIMITED (resps.). (a)

Property tax—Quarries and mines—Rules under schedule (A.), No. 3, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

Where a slate quarry, originally worked in the open, had for some years been worked by means of levels driven straight into the mountain to a distance of from 250 to 300 yards, and the whole process of quarrying was carried on underground, the commissioners held that the concern was a mine, and came within the 2nd rule of schedule (A.), No. 3.

Held, on case stated for the opinion of the court, (reversing the decision of the commissioners), that the concern was a quarry, and therefore within the 1st rule of schedule (A.), No. 3.

CASE stated for the opinion of the court under part 3 of the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 16.

At a meeting of the commissioners of income tax for the division of Arudwy Uwch, in the county of Merioneth, held at Penrhyndendraeth, on the 28th March 1878,

Mr. Albert Bromwich, as cashier to, and on behalf of the Cwmorthin Slate Company

Ex. Div.] JONES (app.) v. THE CWMORTHIN SLATE COMPANY (LIMITED) (resps.). [Ex. Div.]

(Limited), appealed against a charge of 6373L., made upon the company in the assessment under schedule (D.) for the parish of Ffestiniog for the year 1877-8 in respect of profits as a slate company under rule 1 of No. 3 of schedule (A.) 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

The appellant contended that the concern was a mine, and claimed to be assessed on the average profits of the five preceding years under rule 2 of No. 3 of schedule (A.) 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, as coming within the terms "and other mines."

It appeared that originally the quarry was worked in the open, but for some years the slates had been got by means of levels driven straight into the mountain to a distance of from 250 to 300 yards; those levels are about 5ft. wide and 7ft. high; the whole process was carried on underground.

Mr. Jones, the surveyor of taxes, on the part of the Government, held the concern to be a quarry, and that the wording of rule 1 of No. 3 of schedule (A.) 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, as follows "Of quarries of stone, slate, limestone, or chalk, on the amount of profits in the preceding year," was decisive of the question, and that it was impossible to regard a slate quarry as a mine for income tax purposes.

The commissioners were of opinion that the concern was a mine, and gave their decision accordingly; whereupon the surveyor of taxes, being dissatisfied, requested a case for the opinion of the court, which they stated accordingly.

The following are the rules and schedule of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, referred to in the case.

Schedule (A.) is as follows:

For all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or heritages in Great Britain, there shall be charged yearly, in respect of the property thereof, for every twenty shillings of the annual value thereof, the sum of sevenpence.

No. 3. Rules for estimating the lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages hereinafter mentioned, which are not to be charged according to the preceding general rule.

The annual value of all the properties hereinafter described shall be understood to be the full amount for one year, or the average amount for one year, of the profits received therefrom within the respective times herein limited.

First. Of quarries of stone, slate, limestone, or chalk on the amount of profits in the preceding year:

Secondly. Of mines of coal, tin, lead, copper, mundic, iron, and other mines, on an average of the five preceding years, subject to the provisions concerning mines contained in this Act.

Dicey for the appellant.—The whole question arises under these two rules of schedule (A.), and resolves itself into this, whether a stone quarry ceases to be one on being worked underground, and becomes a mine. The place from which stone is got is prima facie a quarry. A quarry is described in Johnson's Dictionary as a "stone mine," and the burden is on the respondents of showing that it is a mine. Further, the distinction which has been drawn in the two rules is one determined by the nature of the produce; and to say that the words "and other mines" in the second rule comprehend quarries, makes it overlap the first rule, and violates the reasonable construction.

A. L. Smith for the respondents.—The question whether this is a mine is a question of fact, and has already been determined; it is not now open. [KELLY, C.B.—You must take it that the question is whether it is a mine within the meaning of the Act. POLLOCK, B.—Assume in your favour that these workings are such that if they were workings of coal they would be called a mine, is it then a mine and not a quarry when the produce that is got from it is slate?] That question is decided by authority. Whether a working is a mine depends on the mode of working, and not on the nature of the produce:

Duchess of Cleveland v. Merrick, 37 L. J. Ch. 125.

The case of Sims v. Evans, in which the now respondents were defendants, was a proceeding under the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77). That Act does not specify quarries. By sect. 3 it is to "apply to every mine of whatever description other than a mine to which the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872 applies." The proceeding was for non-compliance with the provisions of the 11th section, and the question was whether the Act applied to a slate quarry where the slates were got by underground working. By sect. 41 the term "mine" includes "every shaft in the course of being sunk, and every level and inclined plane in the course of being driven for commencing or opening any mine, or for searching for or proving minerals, and all the shafts, levels, planes, work, machinery, tramways, and sidings, both below ground and above ground, in and adjacent to a mine, and any such shaft, level, and inclined plane, and belonging to the mine." It was held that slate was a mineral, and that this was a "mine," to which the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act applied.

KELLY, C.B.—If we construe the words of these two rules in a popular sense, and put on them the interpretation which in common parlance is given them, we must hesitate in adopting the view of the respondents; for no one ever hears the expression "slate mines," and without very special circumstances we cannot hold that the word "mines" can be extended to comprise quarries. Further, when we look at the precise terms of these rules, we find two distinct descriptions of property given; and if the Legislature, or the framers of the Act, had considered slate quarries to be properly described as mines, and intended to include them in the second class, they would surely have done so. If we look at the popular signification of the word mines we must conclude that it does not include slate quarries, and when we consider the Act of Parliament we must say that its provisions are to bear a natural and popular construction; and we must hold that quarries of slate, limestone, &c., are to be taxed in accordance with the first rule, mines of coal, tin, &c., according to the second. The present case falls entirely within the former rule.

POLLOCK, B.—We have to look at the terms of the Act of Parliament, and considering the whole scope of the Act, discover the intention of the Legislature; always giving such meaning as would best effect the object to be carried out by the Act. Now the cases which have been cited give us little assistance. In the case of The Duchess of Cleveland v. Merrick there was no antithesis between mines and quarries, and, had not the testator's shares in the slate quarries passed under the word mines, the codicil would have failed of its effect with regard to that property. Again, the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, considered in the case of Sims v. Evans, was a statute intended to shield persons from the dangers incident to improper sinking of shafts and carrying of adits and levels. Regulation of the mode of working therefore, and not the character of the materials produced, was contemplated by the statute. See also the interpretation of the word "mines" in the 41st section. Now in the Act before us there is a strong antithesis between "quarries" in the first rule and "mines" in the second, and the distinction is marked by the different products which are got from the quarries and from the mines. And there is a further distinction besides that drawn in the Act, namely, that the workings of quarries are not commenced by shafts, as mines are, and that when they subsequently are worked underground it is not by shafts, but by adits, a process after all more like a deep quarrying than mining.

HILL (Kt.) AND OTHERS v. THE MANAGERS OF THE METROPOLITAN ASYLUM DISTRICT. (a) Nuisance—Metropolitan Asylum District—Erection of smallpox hospital—Injury to adjoining property—Liability of Managers of Asylum District—Poor Law and Local Government Boards—Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 6)—Injunction.

The defendants were a body duly constituted and incorporated by the name of "The Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District" under and by virtue of the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 6), pursuant to an order of the Poor Law Board, dated the 15th May 1867, whereby certain unions and parishes within the metropolis, as defined by the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), including the parish of Hampstead, were "combined into a district termed 'the Metropolitan Asylum District,' for the reception and relief of the poor in the said district infected with or suffering from . . . smallpox . . . to be under a board of management to be constituted for the said district," and in the execution of their duties as such managers, the defendants, under the authority of the said Act of 1867, and with the sanction and by direction of the Poor Law Board, purchased in 1868 a plot of land at Hampstead for hospital purposes, in the north-western district, and thereon by the like direction erected, on a sudden outburst of smallpox in the metropolis, temporary buildings which they opened and used as a smallpox hospital from Dec. 1870 to July 1872. In 1874, by direction of the Local Government Board, who had been substituted for the Poor Law Board, the defendants erected on the site of the said temporary buildings, and in lieu thereof, permanent and substantial buildings specially designed and fitted up by them for the reception of patients suffering from contagious or infectious diseases, and in March 1876 opened the same as a hospital for smallpox patients, from which time to the present large numbers of persons suffering from smallpox had been brought from all parts of the metropolis to, and been received and detained and many still were at, the said hospital, with the consent and by the authority of the defendants.

The plaintiffs, severally owners and occupiers of houses and lands adjoining the hospital, brought an action against the defendants in which they claimed damages in respect of injuries sustained by them from the erection and maintenance of the hospital, which the plaintiffs alleged was a nuisance to the neighbourhood in general, and to the plaintiffs in particular, owing to the probable spread of disease by infection, to the effect of the dead-house, and to the bringing to and from the hospital of the patients in ambulances, and to the visiting of the patients by their relatives; and they claimed also an injunction to restrain the defendants from using their said lands and buildings as a hospital for smallpox or any other infectious or contagious disease; the defendants, on the other hand, denying that the hospital was a nuisance or a source of danger, and contending that, if it were, they were justified and protected from liability in what they had done by having acted bona fide in the execution of duties imposed upon them by the Legislature and in obedience to the orders of the Local Government Board.

The jury having found that the hospital was a nuisance occasioning damage to the plaintiffs per se, and also by reason of the patients coming to and going from the hospital; and secondly, that, assuming the defendants were legally entitled to erect and carry on the hospital, they had not done so with all proper care and skill with reference to the rights of the plaintiffs, it was, after argument on further consideration,

*Held, by Pollock, B., that on the above findings of the jury, and it not having been shown or found that the intention of the Legislature could not have been carried out without necessarily creating a nuisance, it could not be taken that the creation of a nuisance was impliedly, though not in express words, authorised by the statute, and the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to have the verdict entered for them with costs, and also to an injunction restraining the defendants from carrying on the hospital so as to be a nuisance to the plaintiffs or any of them; but, following the course adopted in The Attorney-General v. Colney Hatch Asylum (ubi infra), the issue of the injunction would be suspended for three months, with liberty to either side to apply.*

Held, also, that an authority amounting to a discretion was vested in the managers of the asylum district, and the Legislature could not have intended to make them mere irresponsible instruments to carry out the orders and directions of the Poor Law and Local Government Boards; which orders and directions must be taken with reference to the statutory powers conferred upon those bodies respectively, and cannot be so dealt with as to vary the provisions of the statute, or to enlarge or cut down the responsibility arising out of anything done by the board or the managers.

This was an action by the three plaintiffs, Sir Rowland Hill, knight, Alfred Downing Fripp, and William Lund, severally owners and occupiers of certain dwelling-houses and lands in the parish of

EX. DIV.] HILL (Kt.) AND OTHERS v. MANAGERS OF THE METROPOLITAN ASYLUM DISTRICT. [EX. DIV.]

Hampstead, in the county of Middlesex, against the defendants for an alleged nuisance, created and caused by the defendants, in the erection and maintenance by them of the Hampstead Smallpox Hospital upon land belonging to the defendants, situated in the said parish of Hampstead, adjoining the said houses and lands of the plaintiffs, in which action the plaintiffs claimed damages for the injuries sustained by them from the said nuisance, and also an injunction to restrain the defendants from using their said land and the buildings thereon as a hospital for smallpox or scarlet fever or typhus fever, or any other infectious or contagious disease.

The case, on the part of the plaintiffs, as it appeared from their statement of claim, was, that in 1868 the defendants were owners in fee simple, by purchase in that year, of a plot of land at Hampstead, and that prior to 1868 the plaintiff Hill had been and then was owner in fee and occupier of a dwelling-house and several acres of land adjoining the land of the defendants, the principal entrance to which latter land, at which all the hospital patients afterwards entered, being at the end of a short cul de sac, forming a private road the property of the defendants, one side of which was bounded by the plaintiff Hill's property, and the entrance to whose said house was on the high road adjoining the point where the said cul de sac leaves the high road. That the plaintiff Lund had been, prior to 1868, and still was the owner, in fee of many acres of land and houses built thereon adjoining the said land of the defendants, and had, previously to 1868, let many of the said houses for different terms, and laid out and dedicated to the public divers roads over the said land, and past his said houses, and had from time to time relet divors of the said houses during the times of the occurrences after mentioned, occupying as his own dwelling-house one of the said houses on the said land, the entrance to which was on the high road, out of which the before-mentioned cul de sac turned at a short distance from the turning; and on the date of the defendants' said purchase, and at the time they first began to use the said land as a hospital for infectious diseases, the plaintiff Lund had entered into building agreements for erecting additional houses on the said land, which houses were then in course of erection. That in 1870 the plaintiff Fripp took a lease of the house and land a few yards from the said land of the defendants, and had since occupied the same as a residence and place for carrying on his profession as an artist, and in 1871 built at great cost a studio for that purpose, the sole entrance to the said house and studio being in the high road closely adjoining the said cul de sac, he being at the time he took the said lease unaware that the defendants were about to use their said land for the purpose of a smallpox hospital: (paragraphs 1, 4.)

Between Dec. 1869 and Dec. 1870 the defendants erected on the said land temporary buildings, which in the last-mentioned month they opened and continued to use as a hospital for smallpox patients up to the 20th July 1872 (paragraph 5), during which time large numbers of persons suffering from smallpox were, at the instance and invitation, and with the consent of, the defendants, brought from all parts of the metropolis to the hospital, and there received and detained by the authority of the defendants (paragraph 6); and that during 1876 the defendants commenced, and were still continuing, to erect permanent administrative buildings, with the purpose of using their said land and buildings as a hospital for smallpox, scarlet fever and typhus fever patients and persons suffering from other infectious and contagious diseases (paragraph 7); and that in March 1876 they again opened the buildings for the reception of smallpox patients, from which time to the present large numbers of persons suffering from smallpox had been, at the instance, &c., of the defendants, brought to, and by the authority and invitation of the defendants had been and still were detained at, the said hospital (paragraph 8). Further, that during the time of such use of their land by the defendants, noxious vapours and matters dangerous to health had escaped from the said hospital on to the said lands of the plaintiffs, and rendered their houses and lands unhealthy, and prevented the plaintiffs and their families and tenants from occupying and enjoying the same with safety to their health, putting them to great expense in protecting themselves from illness, and otherwise interfering with their due use and enjoyment of their said houses and lands; and that patients and persons who had been in contact with patients, such patients and persons giving off germs of disease and being liable to spread infection, had, partly with the knowledge and consent and partly by the negligence of the defendants, from time to time got from the defendants' lands on to the lands of the plaintiffs, thereby rendering the lands and houses of the plaintiffs unsafe for occupation, and endangering the health of the plaintiffs, their families and tenants, and preventing their free use and enjoyment of their said houses and lands; and that during the said time a disagreeable and unwholesome smell spread from the said hospital to the lands and houses of the plaintiffs, and seriously interfered with their enjoyment of the said houses and lands: (paragraphs 9, 10, and 11.)

It was further alleged that, in consequence and as the natural result, foreseen by the defendants, of their said use of their land and buildings for a hospital, large numbers of persons suffering or recently suffering from smallpox, and of persons recently in contact with or shut up in vehicles or in the said building with persons suffering from smallpox, all such persons being in a state to spread infection and giving off into the air unwholesome vapours and germs of disease, had, on foot and in cabs, &c., frequented and passed over the said high road and up and down the said cul de sac, and over the said roads of the plaintiff Lund, and cabs, &c., in which smallpox patients had been conveyed, and being in a state to spread disease, had frequented the said roads, &c., the whole to the great danger of persons frequenting the said roads, &c., which had thereby become dangerous and unsafe for persons to walk or drive in; and noxious and infected air and germs of disease had spread into the houses and gardens at the sides of the said high road and other roads and cul de sac, and in particular into the houses and lands of the plaintiffs and their tenants: (paragraph 12.)

The plaintiffs alleged also that persons suffering from smallpox and spreading infection and the germs of the disease in the air around had, at the invitation and with the consent of the defendants, walked and been conveyed to the hospital along the said highway and roads, &c., thereby rendering the said roads, &c., dangerous, and spreading infection into the houses and gardens on each side; and that persons bringing patients to the hospital, and thereby themselves becoming liable to spread infection, had, at the invitation, &c. of the defendants, come along the said roads, &c., to the hospital, and by their orders and consent returned from the said hospital along the said roads and cul de sac, whereby the dangers, inconveniences, and injuries to persons in the said roads and cul de sac, and in particular to the plaintiffs and their property, had been increased; and that friends visiting the patients and others entering the hospital, and the nurses and other servants of the defendants in the hospital, and who respectively were thereby liable to spread infection, and patients who had recovered but were still liable to spread infection, had, with the defendants' consent, gone out of the hospital along the said cul de sac and roads, thus further increasing the dangers, &c., to persons generally, and in particular to the plaintiffs and their property: (paragraphs 13, 14, and 15.)

By reason of the above-mentioned facts the plaintiffs had been prevented from having safe and undisturbed ingress and egress for themselves, their families, visitors, and tenants, to and from their said lands and houses, and persons whom they desired to see for personal and professional reasons had been prevented from coming to them, and the said lands and houses had been rendered unhealthy and unfit for habitation, and filled with noxious air and germs of disease; and by reason of such danger and inconvenience the enjoyment by the plaintiffs and their tenants of their said land and houses had been seriously interfered with, and the value of the said property greatly diminished: (paragraphs 16 and 17.)

That such dangers, inconveniences, injuries, and losses, and each of them, were partly the necessary consequences of the use of the said land and buildings of the said defendants as a smallpox hospital, and had been greatly increased by the negligent and improper manner in which the said hospital had been and was conducted by the defendants, and the absence of rules for the protection of persons living in the neighbourhood from infection, and the want of strictness in enforcing such rules: (paragraph 18.)

The plaintiffs severally claimed damages for the injuries sustained by them respectively from the said nuisance, viz., Sir Rowland Hill, 4000*l.*; Alfred D. Fripp, 2000*l.*; and William Lund, 25,000*l.*; and also an injunction to restrain the defendants from using their land and buildings as a hospital for smallpox, or any other infectious or contagious disease, and also such other relief in the premises as the circumstances of the case might require.

The case on the part of the defendants, as set forth in their statement of defence, was that they were a body of persons incorporated under and by virtue of the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 6) pursuant to an order of the Poor Law Board issued on the 15th May 1867, directing that the several unions and parishes set forth in the schedule thereunto annexed, being all wholly or for the greater part thereof respectively included within the metropolis as defined by the Metropolitan Management Act 1855, should be combined into a district, to be termed "The Metropolitan Asylum District," for the reception and relief of the classes of poor persons, chargeable to some union and parish in the said district respectively, who might be infected with or suffering from fever or the disease of smallpox, or might be insane, to be under a board of management to be constituted for the said district and to consist of sixty members, forty-five of whom were to be elected by the guardians of the several unions and parishes comprised in the district, and fifteen to be nominated by the Poor Law Board.

That the parish of Hampstead was within such district, and the defendants, having been duly appointed, entered upon their duties as imposed by the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867, and, having resolved to provide three fever and smallpox hospitals, two of which were to be to the north and one to the south of the river Thames, appointed in Aug. 1867 a committee of their body to report upon the matter who, afterwards reported that sites he purchased for hospital purposes in the north-east district, in the north-west district, as near as might be found convenient to the Regent's Park, and in the southern district; and the committee subsequently, in Jan. 1868, reported that the most eligible site in the north-western district was the land in question, and the defendants authorised the committee to enter into a contract for the purchase of the said land for hospital purposes at a certain price, subject to the approval of the Poor Law Board, and subsequently, with the sanction and under direction of the said board, the purchase was completed; and the defendants, having purchased also sites at Homerton for the north-east and at Stockwell for the south-east district, employed architects to prepare proper plans for the erection of permanent hospitals on the said three sites; and in Feb. 1869, by direction of the Poor Law Board, they postponed the erection of a permanent hospital at Hampstead, but proceeded with the erection of permanent buildings at Homerton and Stockwell; and the Poor Law Board also directed that in the event of a sudden outbreak of fever the defendants should erect temporary buildings on the site at Hampstead.

That in Nov. 1869, a sudden outbreak of relapsing fever occurring in the metropolis, the defendants, by direction of the Poor Law Board, and for the purpose of providing accommodation for the poor of the north-western district suffering therefrom, erected the temporary buildings referred to in paragraph 5 of the statement of claim; and that until June 1870, when such temporary hospital was closed, a great number of fever patients were to the knowledge of the plaintiffs received therein. That in Nov. 1870 a sudden outbreak of smallpox occurred in the metropolis and, the smallpox and other hospitals being crowded with patients, it became necessary to provide immediate accommodation for the large number of poor persons suffering from the epidemic; and the defendants being directed by the Poor Law Board to utilise the temporary hospital at Hampstead for the reception of smallpox patients, and to erect additional temporary buildings for the like purpose, and being solicited by several boards of guardians of the metropolis to open the said hospital for smallpox patients, they did, as alleged in paragraph 5 of the statement of claim, open and use the said buildings as a small-pox hospital, and early in 1871, the epidemic still continuing, an addition was made by them to their said premises at

Hampstead by the erection, with the sanction of the Poor Law Board, of further temporary buildings for the accommodation of patients; the defendants also said that their acts referred to in paragraph 6 of the statement of claim were done by them bonâ fide in the exercise of their duties as managers of the said hospital, pursuant to the powers conferred upon them by the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867, and by the said order of the 15th May 1867, and pursuant to and in order to comply with divers orders and directions of the Poor Law Board.

That after July 1872 the said buildings were not further used as a smallpox hospital, but the defendants were specially directed by the Local Government Board, who had been substituted for the Poor Law Board, to keep the said buildings in readiness to meet any future outbreak of smallpox; and in 1874 they were directed by the Local Government Board to replace the aforesaid temporary buildings by buildings of a permanent and substantial character, to be specially designed for the reception of patients suffering from contagious or infectious disease. One permanent building was (as stated in paragraph 7 of the statement of claim) erected, but it was erected pursuant to the direction aforesaid, and after a select committee of the House of Commons, appointed to inquire into and report upon the action of the Metropolitan Asylum's Board in respect of the establishment of a fever and smallpox hospital at Hampstead, had, upon evidence taken by them, including the evidence of the plaintiffs by themselves or their agents on their behalf, reported (inter alia) that on the whole there was no reason why this particular district (meaning Hampstead) should claim the interference of Parliament for the removal from it of an inconvenience to which it had been subject by reason of the due execution of a wise and beneficent law.

The defendants also alleged that the plaintiffs were, during the time of the erection of the temporary and also of the said permanent buildings, well aware that they were being erected for the express purpose of being used for the reception of persons suffering from contagious or infectious disease, and were also aware of the alleged directions of the Local Government Board, and from time to time saw the said several buildings being erected; that the defendants have incurred great expense in the erection thereof, and in making the same suitable and fitted for the purpose of receiving such patients, and they submitted that under those circumstances the plaintiffs were not entitled to the relief by injunction claimed by them. The defendants admitted the opening of their buildings in Nov. 1876 for the reception of smallpox patients as stated in paragraph 8 of the claim, there being then a sudden increase in the number of poor persons affected by the disease in the metropolis, for whose provision and reception the defendants, pursuant to their duty in that behalf and to the directions of the Local Government Board, made provision in the buildings aforesaid; and they said that all the acts of the defendants referred to in the said paragraph 8 were done by them bonâ fide in the exercise of their duties as managers of the said hospital, pursuant to the powers conferred upon them by the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 and by the order of 15th May 1867, and pursuant to and in order to comply with divers orders and directions of the Poor Law

Board and the Local Government Board respectively. But they did not admit any of the statements contained in paragraph 9 and the subsequent paragraphs of the statement of claim.

That in the management of the said hospital, during the times mentioned in the statement of claim, they acted bonâ fide in the execution of their duties, and in many things under the direction of the Poor Law and Local Government Boards, by whom rules were from time to time issued for such management, and they craved leave to refer to all orders and directions of the said boards respectively.

That the alleged causes of action of the plaintiffs did not arise from any default or wrongful act of the defendants entitling the plaintiffs to recover damages from the defendants, but arose from the exercise by the defendants and the Poor Law and Local Government Boards of the powers vested in them respectively by the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 and other Acts of Parliament incorporated therewith.

And further, that the alleged causes of action arose from the existence of the smallpox hospital, and not from any neglect or default of the defendants in the conduct or management thereof; that the said smallpox hospital at Hampstead was erected for the public benefit, and at the time of the alleged causes of action was not a nuisance, and any damage which might have resulted therefrom to the plaintiffs did not afford ground of relief either by injunction or otherwise.

At the trial of the action before Pollock, B., and a special jury, at the Michaelmas sittings for Middlesex at Westminster, on the 18th Nov. last, and several following days, evidence was adduced on the part of the plaintiffs in support of their case as hereinbefore stated, and showing the number of patients received into the hospital during the time in question; and numerous medical witnesses were called who stated that in their opinion the existence of the asylum, as carried on by the defendants, was a source of danger to the neighbourhood generally, and to the plaintiffs in particular, owing to the probable spread of the disease by infection, to the effect of the dead-house; and also to the bringing of the patients to and from the asylum in ambulances, and to the visiting of the patients by their friends. &c. Evidence was also given of patients being allowed to walk in the asylum grounds so near to the fence separating such grounds from the plaintiffs' property as to endanger the safety of the latter; of the existence of bad smells from the dead-house; and of the wife of one of the plaintiffs having, shortly after noticing the smell, been attacked by smallpox, but it appeared that about the same time she had examined an empty ambulance standing in the high road, wherein a smallpox patient had been conveyed. On the other hand the defendants, who contended that they were protected from liability by the statute under which they had acted, adduced a large body of medical and other evidence showing that no danger was occasioned to the plaintiffs by the asylum, and that it was built and carried on with all possible care and skill, and so as to avoid any evil consequences.

In summing up the case, the learned Baron told the jury that the question as regarded the alleged nuisance was, whether the defendants had so used their land as materially to interfere with the comfort and enjoyment of the plaintiffs in the use and occupation of their houses and lands, and that, in order to constitute a nuisance, there must be a sensible and real damage done to the property or persons alleged to be injured, something which did in a sensible degree affect the legal rights of the owners. It was (he told the jury) admitted that there might be some things which were inconvenient, and which disturbed the owner of land in his occupation of it, and which might undeniably depreciate its value, and which yet might be no nuisance. That in the present case the Legislature had conferred powers on the defendants and the Local Government Board to do certain things, but gave them no power to make compensation for injuries that might thereby accrue to other persons. In the case of railways powers were given to the companies to compensate owners for land taken, but none for the whistling or noise of the engines, because private interests must yield to the public good. They must treat this case as one between two individuals. If they found that the hospital was de facto a nuisance, it would be no excuse that the defendants did what they did in a fit and proper place, because the Legislature did not say what was a fit and proper place.

The learned judge then left five questions to the jury, which questions, together with the answers thereto, are fully set forth in the judgment; the finding of the jury being in substance, first, that the existence of the hospital was a nuisance and caused danger to the plaintiffs per se, and also by reason of the patients coming to and going from the hospital; and secondly, that there had been negligence in the management of the hospital, proper and reasonable care and skill with reference to the rights of the plaintiffs not having been exercised, and particularly in not disinfecting the ambulances before leaving the hospital. The defendants contended that they had acted under their statutory powers, and that, notwithstanding the above finding of the jury, they were entitled to judgment. The learned Baron, however, reserved his decision as to entering the judgment until the points of law involved in the case had been more fully argued before him on further consideration; and now Herschell, Q.C. (with whom were Bompas, Q.C. and Finlay) moved to enter judgment for the plaintiffs, and argued that there was nothing in the statutory power given by the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867, that allowed the Metropolitan Asylum Board to create a nuisance, or enabled the Poor Law Board to direct them to do so. No Act of Parliament could do that. Proper care should have been taken as to the choice of the site and the access to the hospital, neither of which things had been done here. The erection of a hospital on this spot was not contemplated by the Legislature in the Act of Parliament in question, and, whether it were or not, certainly not so as to be a nuisance and a danger to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, as the medical testimony clearly proved it to be. The defendants' contention, if it be right, would enable them to kill a considerable number of persons outside the hospital for the sake of the patients within it, and would render all the land and houses in the vicinity practically of no value. The finding of the jury was in accordance with the evidence and was right.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XI.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Holker, Q.C.) with whom were Willis, Q.C., Anderson, and Proudfoot, for the defendants, contra, argued that the defendants were protected by the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867, and were merely in all they had done the servants and agents of the Poor Law and Local Government Boards. It had not been proved that there was any infection of the air, or that the health of any one had actually suffered. The germ theory of disease could not be supported, and no effluvia or anything else dangerous to health had been sent from the hospital on to premises of the plaintiffs so as to constitute a trespass. The plaintiffs had had the full enjoyment of their houses and lands, and no rights of theirs had been disturbed or interfered with in any way by the defendants; and, even if they had been, the defendants were protected from liability by having acted under the authority of the Act of Parliament and in obedience to the orders of the Poor Law and Local Government Boards.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 28, 1879.—POLLOCK, B.—This action was brought to recover damages in respect of, and to obtain an injunction against the recurrence of, what the plaintiffs alleged to be a nuisance affecting their rights, by the erection and maintenance of an asylum consisting of several buildings, which were erected and maintained for the reception and treatment of paupers suffering from smallpox. The rights of the three plaintiffs, who occupy land and houses adjoining the land and buildings occupied by the defendants, were independent and differed in their character. For the purpose of this judgment it will be sufficient to refer to them as set forth in the statement of claim. At the opening of the case it was arranged by counsel that, in the event of a verdict passing for the plaintiffs, the amount of the damages should be referred to an arbitrator; and before the case had proceeded far it was further arranged that the question to be tried should be limited to this, viz., whether the asylum was a nuisance occasioning damage to the plaintiffs, either per se, or by reason of the patients coming to or going from the asylum; and, further, assuming that the defendants were entitled to erect and carry on the asylum, did they do so with all proper and reasonable care and skill with reference to the rights of the plaintiffs? The plaintiffs proved that between Dec. 1870 and July 1872 there were 7352 patients admitted into the asylum, of whom 1379 died, and that there were for a considerable period as many as 560 patients under treatment at the same time. They also adduced evidence to show that, during this period, the proportion of small-pox cases in the neighbourhood of the hospital was far larger than in other parts of the parish, and they called a number of medical witnesses who stated that, in their opinion, the existence of the asylum as carried on by the defendants was a source of danger to the neighbourhood in general and to the plaintiffs in particular, owing to the probable spread of the disease by infection, to the effect of the dead-house, and also to the bringing to and from the asylum of the patients in ambulances, and the visiting of the patients by their relatives in cases where death was apprehended. With regard to the plaintiff Sir Rowland Hill, some evidence was also given that patients within the grounds of the asylum were allowed to walk so near to the fence which separated the asylum grounds from those belonging to Sir Rowland Hill, as to interfere with the safety of the latter. With regard to the plaintiff Fripp, he deposed to having perceived when in his own house a bad smell from the dead-house, whereby his family and others were compelled to leave, and that on a particular day in 1871 the smell was specially noticed by himself and his wife, and shortly afterwards she sickened and was attacked by smallpox. He also stated, however, that about the same period Mrs. Fripp had examined an empty ambulance standing in the high road, wherein a patient, suffering from smallpox, had been conveyed. The defendants called a great number of witnesses, consisting of those who had the superintendence and personal management of the asylum, and also medical men, who stated that in their opinion no danger to or disturbance of the rights of the plaintiffs was occasioned by the asylum, and that it was built and carried on with all possible care and skill so as to avoid any evil consequences. At the end of the case on both sides, I left to the jury five questions, which, with the answers to them, were as follows: First, was the hospital a nuisance, occasioning damage to the plaintiffs, or either and which of them, either per se, or, secondly, by reason of the patients coming to or going from the hospital? To which the jury answered that "It was a nuisance and caused damage to each of the plaintiffs per se, and also by reason of the patients coming to and going from the hospital." Thirdly, assuming that the defendants were by law entitled to erect and carry on a hospital, did they do so with all proper and reasonable care and skill with reference to the rights of the plaintiffs? To which the jury answered "No." Fourthly, assuming that the defendants were by law entitled to erect and carry on this hospital, did they do so with all proper and reasonable care and skill with reference to the rights of the plaintiffs? To which the jury answered "No." Fifthly, did the defendants use proper care and skill with respect to the ambulances? To which the jury answered, "No, we consider that the ambulances ought to have been disinfected before leaving the hospital." For the purpose of this judgment, I must assume that the answers thus given are supported in point of fact by the evidence which was laid before the jury; and, further, that the direction given to them was sufficient in point of law, any objection upon either of these heads being available only upon motion before the divisional court. At the further argument of the case, which took place before me during the last Michaelmas sittings, the learned counsel for the plaintiffs contended that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the verdict and judgment entered for them, and also to an injunction, and that the answers of the jury to the first two questions were sufficient to show that a legal cause of action had been established. The learned counsel for the defendants, on the other hand, denied this, and, with respect to the answer to the first two questions, asserted that no case had been made out, for the following reasons: First, they argued that, even were it admitted that the building and carrying on of the hospital were a nuisance, and one which was not authorised and protected by law, yet the defendants were not liable, because in all that they did they had acted simply in obedience to the Local Government Board, whose orders they were bound to obey; and the position of the defendants was likened to that of a constable executing a warrant and officers carrying out the orders of their Government. Secondly, it was argued, on broader and more intelligible grounds, that the defendants were not liable, because in all that they did they acted bonâ fide in the execution of a duty cast upon the Local Government Board, and themselves by a statute which required certain things to be done for the public welfare. Now, before I consider whether either of the points contended for by the defendants can be supported, it is necessary to examine what is the exact position, both with relation to the Local Government Board, and also to the members of the public whose property and rights may be affected by their acts. The statute, by which the defendants are incorporated, and under which they seek to exercise the powers and do the acts complained of, is the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 6). But this statute is only in continuation of a course of legislation, commencing with the Poor Law Act of 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4 c. 76), whereby a Poor Law Board was first established, and power given to such board, amongst other things, by sects. 23 and 25, to direct overseers and guardians to build, hire, enlarge, or alter workhouses according to such plans and in such manner as the board shall deem most proper. Similar powers will also be found in the Poor Law Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101), s. 43, whereby the Poor Law Board is authorised to order district boards to

"purchase, hire, or build, and to fit up and furnish buildings for asylums or schools." The Act of 1867 is limited to the metropolis, and provides, by sect. 5, for the establishment of asylums for the reception and relief of "sick, insane, or infirm paupers" chargeable in the metropolitan unions. This is carried out in sects. 6, 7, and 8 by the formation of asylum districts, and the constitution of a body of managers for the asylum of each district, and by directing that "for each district there shall be an asylum or asylums as the Poor Law Board from time to time by order direct." By sect. 15 "The Poor Law Board may from time to time by order direct the managers to purchase or hire, or to build and (in either case) to fit up a building or buildings for the asylum, of such nature and size and according to such plan and in such manner as the Poor Law Board think fit, and the managers shall carry such directions into execution." And by sect. 16, "The managers shall have the like powers as are for the time being vested in guardians of unions in the metropolis relative to the purchase or hiring of land or buildings." The following sections are also material: Sect. 20 enacts that "The managers shall from time to time provide for the asylum necessary fixtures, furniture, and conveniences, and such as the Poor Law Board from time to time by order direct." By sect. 21, "The mode of admission into the asylum shall be such as the Poor Law Board from time to time by order direct." Sect. 22, "The managers shall have the like powers as guardians for the relief, maintenance, and management of the inmates of the asylum, and shall from time to time provide such medicines, appliances, and requisites for the medical and surgical care and treatment of the inmates, and cause the same to be furnished and used according to such rules as the Poor Law Board from time to time by order direct." Sect. 51 provides that "The provisions of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 69, to "facilitate the conveyance of workhouses and other property of parishes, and of incorporations or unions of parishes in England and Wales" relative to the acquisition of sites or buildings for workhouses, and of all Acts extending or amending the same, shall apply to lands and buildings required to be purchased, hired, or otherwise acquired for any of the purposes of this Act, and shall have effect as if managers under this Act were guardians, and as if an asylum or dispensary were a workhouse." Sect. 53 enacts that "So much of the Lands Clauses Act as relates to the purchase of lands otherwise than by agreement shall not be put in force except for the purchase of lands for the purpose of enlarging a workhouse, hospital, or school existing at the passing of this Act, and then not without a previous order of the Poor Law Board directing such purchase." By the Local Government Board Act of 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 70) the powers and duties vested in the Poor Law Board are transferred to the Local Government Board which was established by that Act. It will be seen from these provisions that the scope and intention of the Act is to create and carry on within the metropolis asylums for the "sick, insane, or infirm," by district managers under the direction and control of the Poor Law Board, much in the same way as workhouses, asylums, and schools have been carried on by the guardians and district boards; and it is observable that the only reference to smallpox is contained in sect. 69, which provides for the repayment out of the common poor fund of certain expenses, including those incurred "for the maintenance of patients in any asylum specially provided under the Act for patients suffering from fever or smallpox." It is under this Act that the defendants were appointed and have acted, and it is under the provisions contained in it, and under the orders of the Local Government Board made in pursuance of it, which were given in evidence at the trial, that the defendants seek to shelter themselves, on the ground that they acted only as the innocent agents of a public board, and in pursuance of their orders carried out what they have done, and therefore are irresponsible. I am unable, upon what seems to me to be a fair construction of the statute and a proper appreciation of its meaning, to arrive at that conclusion. Upon comparing sects. 15 and 16 it is clear that, whereas the former empowers the Poor Law Board to direct the managers to purchase, hire, or build buildings for the asylum, by the latter section the managers alone have the power similar to that vested in guardians of unions or parishes of the metropolis relative to the purchase of lands. So far as I can gather, the policy and provisions of the Poor Law Acts (beginning with the 59 Geo. 3, c. 12, s. 8, and continued and enlarged by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 69, ss. 4 and 5, and the 6 Vict. c. 57, s. 16) have been that, formerly, churchwardens and overseers, and now guardians, should be the persons to acquire and hold lands or buildings required for workhouses, hospitals or other like places, although since the establishment of the Poor Law Board the guardians must exercise their rights under the control of the Poor Law Commissioners. It would appear from these and the other sections of the Act of 1867, that, although the intent is clear that the Poor Law Board are to have, so far as is possible, the ultimate control and to give their sanction to all that is done, yet the managers are the body who have power, subject to the orders of the Poor Law Board, to take and hold land; and it is they who, subject to such orders, are to purchase, hire or build, and to fit up the asylum, to provide the fixtures, conveniences and medicines, and, moreover, they are to have the like powers as guardians for the relief, maintenance, and management of the inmates, and in the appointment, control, and payment of officers. All these provisions appear to show that the asylum managers have authority and power vested in them amounting to a discretion, and that it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to make them mere irresponsible instruments to carry out the orders and directions of the Poor Law Board. It is quite true that each act that was done by the defendants with reference to the promotion of the asylum, and in particular the purchase of the land whereon it was built (which was authorised by an order, dated Feb. 13, 1868), was done by the express directions of the Local Government Board; but these directions must be taken with reference to the statutory powers and duty which are conferred upon those bodies respectively, and cannot be so dealt with as to vary the provisions of the Act or to enlarge or cut down the responsibilities which arise out of anything done by the board or the managers, whose acts must be dealt with as referable to the legal right that is vested in them. The first point made by the defendants is, so far as I can find, wholly new; and, were it tenable, would lead to very serious consequences as affecting the rights of property; for it amounts to this, that a body of managers constituted for the purpose of carrying out a public object under the direction and supervision of a public department, may do acts which are admitted to be a nuisance and injurious to the owner of neighbouring property, and are also admitted to be unauthorised by law, but yet are not to be liable because they did the acts by the mandate of the department under which they act. In dealing with a contention so novel in character and so serious in its consequences, it will be well to examine shortly the only principle and authorities which are said to be analogous. The immunity of ministerial officers for acts committed by them has long been established, and is founded upon the clearest principles of reason and justice, namely, that the officer of a court is bound to obey the writ of a court acting within its jurisdiction, and has no means of ascertaining whether it proceeds upon a valid judgment or not. Moreover, he is punishable if he does not so obey, and it would be unjust that a man should be punished if he does not do a thing, and be liable to an action if he does do it. This was clearly pointed out by Willes C.J. in the case of Moravia v. Sloper (Willes Rep. 30), and in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Andrews v. Morris (1 Q. B. 3; 10 L. J. N. S. 225, Q. B.). In the present case, whether the defendants were bound to obey the orders of the Local Government Board would depend upon the question whether those orders were legal or not, and therefore to say that the defendants were bound to obey such orders is to beg the question. The exemption from liability of officers carrying out Government orders has always been rested upon the ground that their conduct, under such circumstances is an act of state for which, on grounds of public policy, they cannot be made liable. In the present case, assuming that the Local Government Board were not authorised by the Act of 1867 to do the act of which the plaintiffs complain, the defendants were bound to inquire into their legal position, and were also bound to take care that they so exercised their rights as not injuriously to affect the rights of others, and they are in this respect in the same position as all other persons are by whose wrongful acts a nuisance is created. The second ground upon which the defendants rested their case involves a much more important question, namely, whether the defendants are protected in doing what they did by the provisions of the Act of 1867. That there are no provisions in that Act requiring them to build the very hospital, and on the very site, and to carry it on in the very manner in which it was carried on, was admitted. Had this been so, the case would have come within the well-known rule that, if the Legislature authorises the doing of a particular thing, it cannot be wrongful—a rule which is continually acted upon where the construction of roads, railways, canals, or other public works has been authorised by Act of Parliament. But it was said that, looking at the purview and legal intent of the Act, and the fact that it was passed with the view of obviating, or, at least, lessening a great public danger, the statute must be construed in a liberal spirit, and so as not unduly to place difficulties in the way of those to whom its execution is entrusted. With regard to this last argument, if it is meant that this statute is to receive a construction different from that which would be put upon a statute authorising the carrying out of an agreement or public work, I see the greatest difficulty in giving effect to it, for there could not be a more dangerous doctrine, or one more contrary to the true rules of construction, than that which required or allowed a judge to give a different effect to the same words, wider or narrower, in proportion as he might think that the general object of the Act in which they were found was of great or small public importance. The principle which governs these cases is, as was stated by Lord Blackburn (then Blackburn, J.), in delivering the joint opinion of all the judges who heard the argument in the case of The Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, in the House of Lords (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 618; L. Rep. 1 E. & I. App. 112; 35 L. J. 225, Ex.), namely, "that the action is not wrongful, not because it is for a public purpose, but because it is authorised by the Legislature." Moreover, when stress is laid upon the general prevalence of smallpox in the metropolis, and the desirability of removing patients suffering from it to the hospital, it must be remembered that there is nothing in the general scope of the Act, or in any particular provisions of it, that points specifically to smallpox; the class for the reception and relief of whom the Act professes to provide asylums is the "sick, insane, or infirm, or other class or classes of the poor," &c. There is another consideration which also affects the question at issue. The dispute here is not between the Asylum Board and any person or body of persons with whom any relation is established by the statute. It is not as though the persons complaining of the acts of the board were officers of the asylum or patients, in which case it might fairly be said that, if there were two ways of carrying out the intention of the statute, or the orders of the Local Government Board, it must be assumed that a discretion was vested in the Asylum Board to do that which seemed to them best under all circumstances, though not best for some particular person or persons. Here the plaintiffs are strangers to the defendants, and to the whole matter over which the defendants have control; their rights are simply those of owners and occupiers of land, and they assert that they have suffered damage by reason of the defendants acquiring land adjoining, and so using it as to create an actionable nuisance. To meet this, therefore, the defendants must certainly make out a clear case of right; for, if the defendants could at any place and in any manner carry out the requirements of the Act without creating a nuisance, it cannot be supposed that the Legislature armed them with an option so to perform their duty as to create or not to create a nuisance affecting the rights of others, as it might seem to the gentlemen of the Local Government Board fitting and proper with reference to the internal advantage or economy of the asylum. If the principle were once admitted, it is difficult to see where any line could be drawn. A statute justifying the defendants in creating a nuisance to neighbours would seem, by parity of reasoning, to justify the diminution of light or air, and this, although the statute contains no provisions compensating those who might be injured by its operation. The real question, therefore, seems to come to this : Looking at that which was done by the defendants, and which the jury have found to be a nuisance injurious to the rights of the plaintiffs, can it be truly said that the doing of it was, in substance and impliedly, though not in express words, authorised by the statute? Now, no evidence was tendered by the defendants to show, nor was there any finding of the jury, that the defendants could not have carried out what the Legislature intended them to carry out without necessarily creating a nuisance. It is clear from the facts proved that no such conclusion could have been arrived at; for, although to build and carry on the hospital where and in the manner in which it was built and carried on, and with its large number of patients, may have been the most proper and convenient mode of complying with the intentions and provisions of the Act, in so far as the patients, the officers, medical staff, and nurses were concerned, and the least expense to the ratepayers, it cannot be affirmed that, if several small hospitals had been built instead of one large one, or if a larger area around the hospital had been obtained, that which has been found to be a nuisance might not have been avoided. Hitherto I have dealt with the case apart from authority. Several cases were, however, cited in the course of the argument, and so far as these offer any assistance they appear to me to support the view which I have taken. In some of them the nuisance complained of was considered to have been expressly authorised by the Legislature. Thus in the case of the King v. Pease (ubi sup.), where a company was empowered to make a railway according to the deposited plans, and to use locomotives thereon, and the jury found that the engines used were of the best construction known, and that the defendants used due care and diligence in the using of them, the court held that, inasmuch as an unqualified power was given to use the engines on the particular railway, the defendants were not liable to be indicted for a nuisance, and that it must be presumed that the Legislature intended that those of the public who used an adjacent highway should sustain some inconvenience for the sake of the greater good to be obtained by those who used the railway. The same principle was followed in the case of Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company (ubi sup.) in the Court of Exchequer, and by the House of Lords in a Scotch case, The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvie (ubi sup.), and The Hammer-smith Railway Company v. Brand (ubi sup.). Where a nuisance is not shown to be the absolutely necessary consequence of what is authorised to be done by the statute, the courts have been slow to admit of any argument by which it has been contended that the creation of a nuisance must be taken to be implied. This appears from what was said in the case of Reg. v. The Bradford Navigation (ubi sup.), and by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of the Attorney-General v. The Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum (ubi sup.), and in the case of Clowes v. The Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Company (ubi sup.), where Mellish, L.J. dwells much upon the absence of any compensation clause, as indicating that the Legislature could never have intended to justify an injury to a private right. I agree also with what was said by Fry, J. in the case of The Attorney-General v. The Gas Light and Coke Company (ubi sup.), that the full burden of proof in such a case rests entirely upon those who say that they cannot, without creating a nuisance, do a thing which they are bound to do. Whether the proposition be so framed as to assert that the Legislature never intended the act complained of to be done, or to say that those to whom the Legislature has entrusted the carrying out of a public work could do so without doing that particular act, the result is the same. In Geddis v. The Proprietors of the Bann Reservoirs (ubi sup.) Lord Blackburn says, "I take it, without citing cases, that it is now thoroughly well established that no action will lie for doing that which the Legislature has authorised, if it be done without negligence, although that does occasion damage to anyone. But an action does lie for doing that which the Legislature has authorised, if it be done negligently; and I think that, if by a reasonable exercise of the powers either given by statute to the promoters or which they have at common law, the damage could be prevented, it is within the rule of 'negligence' not to make such a reasonable exercise of their powers." I do not think that it will be found that any of the cases (I do not now cite them) are in conflict with that view of the law. My attention was particularly called by the learned Attorney-General for the defendants to the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the case of Hawley v. Steele (ubi sup.), declining to grant an injunction on motion to restrain a general in Her Majesty's army, and the officers under his command, from causing or permitting rifle practice on a common in close proximity to the plaintiff's house, which, as he alleged, was a serious nuisance, and occasioned damage to his property. The principle upon which this injunction was refused has no doubt a material bearing upon the present case, and I in no way differ from what was there stated by the Master of the Rolls. But I cannot follow the course of the argument by which it is submitted that any true analogy exists between the case of lands vested in the Secretary of State for War "for the purpose of the defence of the realm," and a power given to acquire or build an asylum for sick paupers. In the first case it would be extremely difficult to contemplate the user of land for military purposes which does not carry with it the right to fire guns. In the present case I cannot, upon the materials presented to me, draw the inference that an asylum for sick paupers, including those suffering from smallpox, cannot be maintained without the creation of a nuisance. I have thus far dealt with the answers given by the jury to the first two questions. The remaining findings, assuming the legal right of the defendants to erect and carry on the asylum, would raise the question whether the defendants in so doing used all proper and reasonable care and skill with reference to the rights of the plaintiffs. Here, again, I must assume that the jury received a proper direction, and that the findings were not contrary to the evidence adduced; and the only question that remains is, whether that evidence disclosed any legal cause of action? As to this, the counsel for the defendants argued that the evidence for the plaintiffs was too general in its character, and that, although it might establish that some nuisance existed, yet it was not shown that the plaintiffs had sustained any special damage in consequence of it. I cannot think that either of these contentions is established. As to the first of them: some of the plaintiffs' witnesses spoke fairly to the creation by the asylum of a nuisance, not merely affecting the comfort but endangering the healths of the plaintiffs, as to which in their evidence it would be impossible to see to what extent it arose necessarily from the existence of the asylum or from its being carried on in a manner more injurious to the plaintiffs than it might have been. This would and must have been a matter of inference for the jury. Upon the second point the plaintiffs would be entitled to a verdict, and to at least nominal damages, if the jury should think the nuisance created by the defendants rendered the enjoyment of life or property unsafe, although no special damage was proved. The result of the conclusion at which I have arrived, is that the plaintiffs are entitled to have the verdict entered for them, and also to judgment with costs. With respect to the injunction which is sought, I propose to adopt the course which was followed in the case of The Attorney-General v. The Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum (ubi sup.). I therefore grant an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants or agents, from carrying on the asylum so as to be a nuisance to all or any of the plaintiffs, and I suspend the issue of it for three months, with liberty to either side to apply.

THE GOVERNORS OF THE MAGDALEN HOSPITAL v. KNOTTS AND OTHERS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Lease by charitable corporation—Void or voidable—Stat. 13 Eliz. c. 10—Statute of Limitations.

The appellants were the governors of a charitable hospital founded in 1758, and incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1768.

In 1783 the then governors of the hospital granted a lease of certain lands of the hospital to the respondents' predecessors in title for ninety-nine years at a peppercorn rent. In an action to recover possession of the demised premises:

Held, that the appellants being a "hospital" within the meaning of the stat. 13 Eliz. c. 10, as explained by 14 Eliz. c. 14, the lease was void ab initio by virtue of sect. 3 of the former Act, and that the Statute of Limitations ran from the execution of the lease, and that the action could not be maintained.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed, for different reasons.

The appellants in this case were the governors of a charitable corporation founded in the year 1758, and incorporated in 1768 by an Act of Parliament, 9 Geo. 3, c. 31. The action was brought by them with the sanction of the Charity Commissioners, to recover possession of a house and premises known as The Tower public-house, situate in Tower-street, Westminster Bridge-road.

The defendant Knotts was the tenant in occupation of the house, and the other defendants were the landlords, and the mortgagees of Knotts' interest, who severally obtained leave to appear and defend the action.

The action was commenced on 11th July 1876, on the ground that a lease of the premises granted by the corporation in 1783 to one Charles Gilbert, through whom the defendants derived title, for ninety-nine years, at a peppercorn rent, was void under the Act 13 Eliz. c. 10, sect. 3.

That section enacts that

All leases, gifts, grants, feoffments, conveyances, or estates to be made, had, done, or suffered by any master and fellows of any college, dean and chapter of any cathedral or collegiate church, master or guardian of any hospital, parson, vicar, or other having any spiritual or ecclesiastical living, of any houses, lands, tithes, tenements, or other hereditaments, being any parcel of the possessions of any such college, cathedral, church, chapter, hospital, parsonage, vicarage, or other spiritual promotion, or any ways appertaining or belonging to the same, or any of them, to any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, other than for the term of one and twenty years or three lives, from the time as any such lease or grant shall be made or granted, whereupon the accustomed yearly rent or more shall be reserved and payable yearly during the said term, shall be utterly void and of none effect, to all intents, constructions, and purposes, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary anywise notwithstanding.

Down to the issue of the writ in the action, no act had been done by the plaintiffs to avoid the lease.

The defendants demurred to the statement of claim, on the ground that the plaintiffs' right was barred by the Statute of Limitations; but Jessel, M.R. overruled the demurrer, holding that the effect of the statute of Elizabeth was only to make the lease voidable, and that the Statute of Limitations consequently did not begin to run till the issue of the writ. His judgment is reported in 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 139, and 5 Ch. Div. 175.

The action then came on for trial before Fry, J., who gave judgment for the plaintiffs (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 428).

The defendants appealed from both these decisions, and the Court of Appeal (James, Cotton, and Thesiger, L.JJ.) adopting the same construction of the statute of Elizabeth that the Master of the Rolls had done, held that the Statute of Limitations ran against the lessors from the date of the lease, and entered judgment for the defendants (38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 624; 8 Ch. Div. 709).

From this decision the present appeal was brought.

Cookson, Q.C., Davey, Q.C., and Sturges appeared for the appellants, and contended that, assuming that the hospital was within the statute, as explained by the 14 Eliz. c. 14, which must be admitted, the lease was not "void" ab initio, but only "voidable;" many authorities show that the words were interchangeable at the time when this Act was passed, as also appears from the cases in which a distinction has been drawn between such corporations as have a head and such as have not: unless such a lease were voidable, no question as to estoppel by acceptance of rent could ever have arisen. Either the lease was only voidable, or the lessee entered as a stranger without any title, and continued in possession as a tenant at will; in neither case did the statute begin to run till the issue of the writ, which either avoided the lease, if voidable, or determined the tenancy at will if the lease was originally void. They cited

Sir H. Jackson, Q.C. and Warrington (Oozens Hardy and Hilbery with them) appeared for the respondents, and argued that, this being in fact an action of ejectment, and the respondents being in possession, the appellants must show a title on the strength of which they are entitled to succeed. They produce a lease signed by Gilbert, but they must show that Gilbert entered under the lease, and that there is a privity of estate between him and the respondents. It is at least doubtful if such a case as this falls within the statute of Elizabeth, which was intended to restrain improvident alienations ; but, if it does so, then the Act makes the lease absolutely void. Judicial decisions have held that in some cases the actual grantors of such a lease may be estopped in equity from taking advantage of their own wrong, but they do not go further. In this case the right to bring the action accrued as soon as the lease was granted, and the Statute of Limitations began to run from that time. The old line of authorities makes no distinction between void and voidable, but suspends the operation of the Act in certain cases, such as corporations sole and corporations with heads, where such a lease was only held void as against the successor. In other cases it is void at all intents and purposes, and the Statute of Limitations began to run before the demand was made. They cited Oookson, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 5.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, the facts of this case are stated by Thesiger, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, with so much care and accuracy, that I do not propose to repeat them ; but I will at once approach that which is the main question in the case : Is the claim of the appellants to recover the premises known as the "Tower" public-house, in the parish of St. George the Martyr, in the county of Surrey, barred by the Statute of Limitations ? I may in the first place say that I entertain no doubt that the appellants are a hospital within the meaning of the statute 14 Eliz. c. 14, and therefore also of the 13 Eliz. c. 10. Irrespective of the decision in the case of the Attorney-General v. Glyn (12 Sim. 87), it appears to me to be clear that upon the wording of sect. 3 of the latter statute an eleemosynary corporation, like that of the appellants, is distinctly brought within the operation of the enactment. This being so, it is too clear for argument, and indeed it was not disputed, that the lease of Dec. 4, 1783, by the charity of the property in question, is a lease which is rendered invalid by the operation of the statute. So far as anything appears upon the face of the lease, it is an alienation of the charity estate for ninety-nine years, which plainly could not be supported. The question then arises, was the lease voidable or void ? The Court of Appeal, considering themselves bound by an authority in this respect, have treated the lease as voidable ; but, treating it as voidable, have held that the right to enter and avoid it accrued to the hospital immediately after the lease was made, and was therefore barred at the end of twenty years under the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, sect. 2. I do not think it necessary to examine the reasoning by which the Court of Appeal arrived at this construction of the Statute of Limitations, or to say how far I should be prepared to concur in it, because I must submit to your Lordships that the lease was, ab initio, not merely voidable, but void. The words used by the Legislature in the statute of Elizabeth are precise, and as strong as it is possible to make them. The statute declares that every lease, such as is the one before your Lordships, shall be "utterly void and of none effect to all intents, constructions, and purposes, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary anyways notwithstanding." The onus lies, as it seems to me, upon those who would cut down or qualify the effect of these words to show some ground, either from the nature of the case, or from authority, for doing so. As to the character of the evil which it is sought by the statute to prevent, it is clear that in the case of an eleemosynary corporation, the whole property of which is devoted to charity, where the office-bearers and other members of the corporation have no personal interest whatever, the object must be to make the property of the corporation absolutely inalienable in any way other than by the particular form of lease which is authorised. There is no intention to protect a successor against a predecessor; there is no ground for admitting an intention that individual office-bearers of the corporation granting the lease should be bound, but that their successors should be free either to affirm or disaffirm it. The intention is to condemn the lease as a wrong and a void thing, even though every member of the corporation should have committed himself to it, and should be anxious to maintain it. These considerations show how inapposite, as applied to these Acts of Parliament, is any analogy drawn from the ordinary stipulation between lessor and lessee, that if the lessee breaks certain covenants the lease shall be void. The object in such a case is to give the lessor an opportunity of terminating the lease if he is disposed to do so, but not to terminate it against his will or against his interest; and to hold that the lease must become void, even against the lessor's will, would enable the lessee to get rid of an onerous lease by wilfully breaking the covenant contained in it. So also with regard to cases (of which a great number were cited at your Lordships' bar) where a lease not warranted by the statutes of Elizabeth is made by an ecclesiastical corporation having a head, and where it has been held, while the same head continues, not indeed that the lease is voidable, but that it cannot be avoided even if the corporation desires it, and that after the death of the head the corporation as constituted under his successor may enter and avoid the lease, but may, on the other hand, so act as again to stop itself from so doing. A large number of these cases is collected in Bacon's Abridgment, title "Leases." There may be some difficulty in understanding how some of these cases with regard to ecclesiastical corporations with a head came originally to be decided as they were; probably they proceed on the principle of a personal estoppel by reason of a personal interest in the head of the corporation; but they appear to me to have no application to the case before your Lordships. There is indeed a case mentioned in Bacon's Abridgment under this title—the case of The Collegiate Church of Southwell (1 Mod. 204, 2 Mod. 56), which has some application to a corporation like the appellants, but it is an authority that the lease would be void and not voidable. It runs thus: "Where there is a chapter that hath no dean, as the chapter of the collegiate church of Southwell, there grants or leases made by them contrary to 13th Elizabeth, cap. 10, are void ab initio against themselves, and so the leases or grants by any other corporation aggregate who have no head or principal person; for they must be either void ab initio or good for ever, because they continue always the same, and one has no superiority or power more than another." To hold, in opposition to the precise words of the statute, that a lease by a corporation like the appellants was voidable would not merely be unmeaning—for to say that a lease is voidable implies a right to affirm which the corporation would not possess—but it might also inflict serious injury on the corporation. A valuable estate of the corporation might be alienated in utter recklessness or something worse, and when the corporation was put in motion to reclaim it, then, as the grant was valid until avoided, the right to mesne profits would not exist. The Court of Appeal, as the authority for the view that the lease is voidable only, refer to what they state was a principle of the decision and not a mere obiter dictum in Pennington v. Cardale (3 H. & N. 656). I cannot agree that it was any necessary part of the decision in Pennington v. Cardale that the lease was voidable. The question in that case was the meaning of an exception of certain premises in a lease granted by a dean and chapter in 1849. The excepted premises were described as rents reserved in any building leases granted by the dean and chapter; and the court held that these words upon the whole context meant leases which de facto had been granted by the dean and chapter, whether interests were lawfully created by them or not. The inquiry whether these leases were void or voidable was immaterial. It is true that, in delivering the judgment of the court, Martin, B. says of a lease granted by the dean and chapter contrary to the statute, "It seems quite clear from the authorities cited upon the argument that this lease was not void but voidable only." These observations do not appear to me to have been necessary for the decision of the case, and even if they were accurate, they did not relate to the effect of leases or grants by a corporation such as the appellants, but they referred to the class of cases as to ecclesiastical corporations with a head of which I have already spoken. Holding as I do that the lease of 1783 was absolutely void, the respondents, or those whom they represent, must be taken to have been in possession of the property from 1783 without any title whatever, and not having paid rent to the appellants, or in any way entered into the relation of tenants, there is nothing to prevent the full operation of the second section of the Statute of Limitations, and the right of the appellants to recover the land is, in my opinion, effectually barred. I shall therefore move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion, and I only desire to make two observations. The first is, that the explanation of the doctrine laid down in the authorities as to leases by deans and chapters, and by colleges in the universities, is probably to be found in the fact that they were corporations coming within the original restraining Act of Queen Elizabeth, the governing members of which received the rents reserved on their leases for their own benefit; and that the succession in them of one head, having a principal share in the beneficial interest, after another, was thought—though by a process of reasoning which I cannot think accurate—to justify the courts in holding that the declared policy of that statute was satisfied so long as those particular successors were protected. That, however, cannot apply to a corporation under the government of persons of whom none has the beneficial interest; and the Southwell case is à fortiori an authority for not extending that doctrine to such a corporation. The other observation which I wish to make is, that the present case is one for which there was probably never any precedent, and is never likely to be followed by another similar to it, a long term having been attempted to be granted by a charitable corporation at a peppercorn rent. If any rent had been reserved and received, however small, the legal relation of tenant from year to year would have been created, and the Statute of Limitations could not have run.

THE BANK OF NEW SOUTH WALES v. OWSTON.

[PRIV. CO.]

Lord GORDON.—My Lords, I concur in the judgment which has been delivered by the Lord Chancellor. I am of opinion that the provisions of the statute of Elizabeth apply to the Magdalen Hospital, and to the lease in question; and that being so, I can entertain no doubt that the lease is not only voidable, but that it was from the beginning void. The terms of the Act are, I think, so express as to leave no room for any other construction. If the lease was ab initio void, it follows that the respondents and their predecessors have been all along in possession of the property without any title; and as they have not paid rent to the appellants, or in any other way entered into the relation of tenants, I think that sect. 2 of the Statute of Limitations applies, and that all rights on the part of the appellants are effectually barred. I think, therefore, that the result arrived at by the Court of Appeal, though on different grounds, is right, and that their judgment should be affirmed.

Decree appealed against affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

THE BANK OF NEW SOUTH WALES v. OWSTON. (a)
ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW SOUTH WALES.

Malicious prosecution—Authority of bank manager—Evidence—Misdirection—Practice—Appealable amount—Interest on judgment.

An authority in an agent to arrest offenders, and to institute criminal proceedings, can only be implied where the duties which he has to perform cannot be efficiently discharged for the benefit of his employer unless he has power promptly to apprehend offenders on the spot.

W., the acting manager of the appellants, commenced criminal proceedings against the respondent, a merchant at Sydney, on a charge of stealing a bill of exchange, which proved to be groundless. In an action for malicious prosecution brought by the respondent against the bank,

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that such proceedings not being in the ordinary routine of banking business, and the evidence not showing any case of emergency, the judge misdirected the jury in telling them that such authority was to be inferred from W.'s position alone; and, in the absence of direct evidence of such authority, the bank was not liable.

When interest on the amount of a verdict is given, and included in the judgment, such interest must be taken into account in considering whether the amount at issue reaches the limit allowed for an appeal.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Hargreave and Manning, JJ., Martin, C.J. dissenting), discharging a rule nisi to set aside a verdict for the respondent for 500*l.* and costs, and to enter a nonsuit, or for a new trial, in an action brought by him against the appellants, the New South Wales Bank, for malicious prosecution under circumstances which appear fully in the judgment of their Lordships.

Benjamin Q.C. and Arbuthnot (J. C. Mathew with them) appeared for the appellants.

J. D. Wood (McIntyre, Q.C. with him), for the respondent, took the preliminary objection that by the Order in Council of 13th Nov. 1850, the Supreme Court of New South Wales had no power to grant leave to appeal, except in cases in which judgment had been given in respect of any sum or matter at issue above the amount or value of 500*l.*, without obtaining special leave from the Privy Council, which had not been done in this case.

On this point their LORDSHIPS gave judgment as follows:—In this case an objection has been made to the leave granted by the Supreme Court of New South Wales to appeal to Her Majesty on the ground that the sum involved is below the appealable amount. By the Order in Council of the 13th Nov. 1850, which regulates appeals from the Supreme Court of New South Wales, an appeal is given from any final judgment, decree, order, or sentence of the Supreme Court, subject to certain regulations and limitations, the first being that such judgment, decree, order, or sentence shall be given or pronounced for or in respect of any sum or matter at issue above the amount or value of 500*l.* sterling. In the present case the action was for malicious prosecution, and the damages were laid at 500*l.* On the trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with 500*l.* damages. A rule nisi was applied for to set aside that verdict, which was granted, but upon argument discharged by the court. The rule was discharged on the 12th March 1877, and on the 13th the judgment was entered. The judgment so signed was as follows: "Judgment after verdict for the plaintiff, damages 500*l.*; interest on the above amount from the date of verdict, 15th May 1876, to date, 33*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*; taxed costs, 317*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*" It is plain from previous decisions of this tribunal that the costs may not be added to the amount recovered in estimating the appealable sum; and it is now contended at the bar that interest on the sum awarded by the verdict ought not to be added. Their Lordships, however, think that interest under the laws existing in New South Wales is to be considered in estimating the amount. Interest on a verdict is given by the statute (24 Vict. No. 8), the first section of which enacts that—"Every plaintiff who shall hereafter obtain a verdict in an action in the Supreme Court, upon which he shall hereafter obtain judgment, shall be entitled to interest at the rate of 8*l.* per cent. per annum on the amount of such verdict from the time of obtaining such verdict until the time of entering up judgment thereon, and the amount of such interest shall be included in the judgment." The interest therefore is payable upon the amount of the verdict from the time of obtaining it until the time of entering up the judgment. It is to be included in the judgment, and forms part of it. What, then, is the sum "in issue," to use the words of the statute, in the present appeal? The verdict is only a step towards the judgment. The sum cannot be recovered upon the verdict, but is recovered in execution upon the judgment. The foundation of the judgment is the verdict, and the rule that was obtained to set aside that verdict must be understood as involving the whole sum which the verdict would carry, and which would be included in the judgment. That sum is not the original sum only, but, by virtue of the statute, that sum and interest. A similar question was before this tribunal in certain appeals from India (Gooropersad Khoond v. Juggutchunder (8 Moo. Ind. Ap. 166.)) The part which is material is at page 168: "Where the appeal is from the whole decree, and the decree has given an amount, including interest up to the date of the decree, which exceeds Rs. 10,000, it is clear that the matter which is in dispute in the appeal must exceed the sum of Rs. 10,000; for the question to be tried upon the appeal must be whether the decree is or is not right; that is to say, whether the decree has or has not properly ordered payment of a sum exceeding Rs. 10,000. Where, therefore, at the date of the judgment the sum which is recoverable under the decree of the Sudder Court is an amount exceeding Rs. 10,000, there, in their Lordships' judgment, the case clearly falls within the terms of the Order in Council." In the same judgment their Lordships state that they "must not, of course, be understood to intimate that the Sudder Courts ought to give leave to appeal in cases in which the specified amount of Rs. 10,000 can only be reached by the addition of interest subsequent to the decree." Here their Lordships think that the sum involved in the judgment appealed from does exceed, for the reasons they have stated, the sum of 500*l.*, and they are therefore of opinion that the appeal ought to proceed.

The appeal was then heard upon the merits.

For the appellants it was contended that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, there being no evidence that the prosecution had been directed by the bank. It cannot be contended that it is within the general authority of the manager of a bank to institute a criminal prosecution, and there was no evidence of implied authority, or any ratification of his act. The learned judge misdirected the jury. The following cases were cited:

- Mackay v. The Chartered Bank of New Brunswick*, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 180; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 394; Bolingbroke v. Swindon Local Board, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 723; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 575.

For the respondents it was argued that the manager must be taken to have authority to institute such proceedings. The appellants were incorporated by an Act of Parliament, giving them very wide powers, which of necessity must be exercised by some one on their behalf. It was for them to show that these powers were not vested in the general manager. It is unnecessary to go through all the cases cited on the other side, but the case of The Eastern Counties Railway Company v. Brown (ubi sup.), which is an authority against the respondent, was distinguished in the case of Giles v. The Taff Vale Railway Company (2 E. & B. 822; 23 L. J. 43 Q. B.) The direction of the learned judge at the trial was right.

Benjamin, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

March 28.—Their LORDSHIPS gave judgment as follows:—This is an action for a malicious prosecution brought against the Bank of New South Wales, an incorporated company. The circumstances leading to the prosecution, which it is now admitted was groundless, are the following: In March 1876 a bill at thirty days sight for 1500*l.* was drawn by Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde, a firm trading at Adelaide in South Australia, upon the plaintiff Mr. Owston, a merchant trading at Sydney under the firm of Owston and Co. The bill was drawn against a consignment of wheat shipped on board the Sea Gull, and was sent with the shipping documents by the Adelaide branch of the defendants bank to the head bank at Sydney. On Saturday the 18th March, the bank left the bill with the plaintiff for acceptance. He wrote his name upon it, but it was not called for until the morning of Tuesday the 21st. Meanwhile, on the afternoon of Monday the 20th, the plaintiff had received the following telegram from the drawers: "Sea Gull put back leaky;" and on the same afternoon he telegraphed in reply, "Do you wish us to accept draft, or will you instruct extension of sixty days?" On the morning of Tuesday the 21st, about eleven o'clock, a clerk from the bank called for the bill, and the plaintiff showed him the telegrams. He did not give the bill to him, but sent a clerk to the bank to explain the matter, and it was arranged that the bank should wait until one o'clock for the return of the bill. About that hour, and before the plaintiff had received an answer to his telegram, he returned the bill to the bank, having previously cancelled his acceptance. In the afternoon of the same day the following telegram from Adelaide reached the plaintiff:—"Bank instructed extend draft to sixty days." A telegram to the same effect was received by the bank. The bill, when returned to the bank by the plaintiff, was sent on the same afternoon by Hobbs, one of its clerks, to Messrs. Allen, Bowden, and Allen, who are notaries, and also solicitors of the bank, to be presented by them for noting, and what took place with respect to this presentation produced the misunderstandings which led to the prosecution complained of. On the following day, Wednesday the 22nd, a clerk of Messrs. Allen and Bowden, a lad called Muir, brought the bill to the plaintiff for acceptance. The plaintiff's evidence is to the effect that he understood the lad to be one of the bank clerks, and having in his mind the telegrams as to the alteration of the days of sight, he inquired of him how the bank wished the acceptance to be. The clerk said he knew nothing about that. The plaintiff then told him that he would accept the bill, and send it round to the bank, and it was left with him. Shortly afterwards Bishop, another clerk of Messrs. Allen and Bowden, came for the bill, and demanded to have it returned. According to the plaintiff's evidence he was not aware that Bishop was other than a bank clerk. He says that he again inquired how the bill was to be accepted, and told Bishop he would accept and send the bill to the bank. He says Bishop behaved in a violent manner and declared that he should treat what he had said as a refusal to return the bill. The plaintiff's account of these conversations is contradicted, but for the purpose of this general statement may be assumed to be correct. The plaintiff in fact soon after sent the bill to the bank, accepted, having first made it payable at sixty days sight, and it appears to have reached the bank about one o'clock. Unfortunately the fact of the return of the bill was not communicated by the bank to Messrs. Allen and Bowden, as it ought to have been, and they remained under the impression that the plaintiff was still keeping it in his possession. Another interview took place between Bishop and the plaintiff; they met in the street. The plaintiff declined to have anything to say to Bishop, and unfortunately did not tell him what would have prevented further trouble—that the bill had been sent to the bank. Bishop said, on parting, that he would go for the police. A consultation was held in Messrs. Allen and Bowden's office, and apparently on the assumption that the plaintiff was improperly withholding the bill, and that they as notaries were responsible to the bank for its return, it was resolved to take criminal proceedings. Bishop and Muir then went to the police magistrate and applied for a warrant to apprehend the plaintiff on the charge of stealing the bill. The magistrate refused to grant a warrant, but issued a summons to the plaintiff to appear on the next day to answer a charge of feloniously stealing a bill of exchange of the value of 1500*l.*, the property of the bank. The information was laid by Muir. As soon as he was served with the summons, the plaintiff went to the bank, and after inquiring for the general manager, who was engaged, saw Mr. Wilkinson, the acting manager, and complained to him of the course which had been taken. There is great conflict of testimony as to what occurred at this interview, but an explanation then took place, and there seems no doubt that after the interview it was resolved not to press the charge. Application was made by the solicitors to the magistrate to be allowed to withdraw it, which was refused, and upon the case being called on the next morning, the plaintiff being present in obedience to the summons, no evidence was offered in support of the charge, and the case was dismissed. The plaintiff then brought the present action against the bank. On the trial Manning, J. properly held that the prosecution was without reasonable cause, and it was found by the jury to have been commenced from improper motives, and was therefore malicious. No question now arises on this part of the case. The two questions which were mainly contested at the trial and argued at their Lordships' bar are: (1) whether the proceedings of Messrs. Allen and Bowden were authorised by Wilkinson on behalf of the bank; and (2) if they were, whether the bank was responsible for Wilkinson's acts. At the trial the jury specially found the first question in the affirmative. Upon the second question, the learned judge told the jury, according to his own statement of his direction, "that it was to be inferred from Mr. Wilkinson's position as manager that he had sufficient power under the circumstances for directing a prosecution," and the verdict passed in accordance with this ruling. A rule nisi to enter a nonsuit or for a new trial was granted on the following grounds: 1. That the special finding of the jury (that Mr. Wilkinson authorised the prosecution) was against evidence, and had no evidence to support it. 2. That the judge was in error in directing the jury that the acts of Mr. Wilkinson, the acting manager, were, as regards the prosecution, the acts of the bank for which the bank was responsible. 3. That there was no evidence that the prosecution was in fact or in law a prosecution by the bank. This rule, after an argument before Martin, C.J., Hargreave and Manning, J.J., was discharged. The court was unanimous in refusing to disturb the finding of the jury as to Wilkinson having authorised the proceedings; but on the question of the correctness of the ruling of Manning, J., as to the responsibility of the bank for his acts, which that learned judge and Hargreave, J., sustained, the Chief Justice dissented from his colleagues. One point argued in the court below was that the bank, being a corporation, could not in any case be liable to an action of this kind. The Chief Justice (the other judges taking the opposite view) held the law to be so, to use his own words, "on the plain ground that malice being a state of mind, cannot be attributed to a corporation which has no mind," and he relied on the judgment of Alderson, B., in Stevens v. The Midland Counties Railway Company and Lander (10 Ex. 352) which, as reported, no doubt supports this view. The learned counsel for the appellant acknowledged that, after recent decisions, he could not support this broad proposition, and confined his argument to the two questions above indicated. Upon the first of these questions their Lordships cannot say that there is not some evidence to support the finding of the jury; and that finding having been sustained by the judgment of the court below, they intimated to the learned counsel at the close of the argument for the appellants that they should not feel justified in sending the case to a new trial upon this point, if it stood alone. The point remaining for consideration, viz., the liability of the bank for the acts of Wilkinson, is of more general importance. The first question which arises on this point is whether the direction of the learned judge to the jury to the effect that it was to be inferred from Wilkinson's position that he had authority to direct the prosecution—thus practically withdrawing the question from the jury—was correct, and their Lordships think that upon the evidence given at the trial it was not. No proof was offered by the plaintiff of the position, duties, and powers of the acting manager; but the defendants examined him, and also the general manager, who gave evidence on the question of his authority. Before considering the effect of this evidence, it will be convenient to refer to the series of authorities cited at the bar.

[Priv. Co.]

They all related to the liability of railway companies for wrongful arrests by their servants. In each of the two earliest cases, The Eastern Counties Railway Company v. Broom (6 Ex. 314), and Roe v. The Birkenhead, &c., Railway Company (7 Ex. 36), the plaintiff, who had been arrested at a station for refusal to pay the fare demanded, brought an action for false imprisonment. In both the question arose as to the authority of the officers at the station to make the arrest, and in both it was held there was not sufficient evidence of such authority to go to the jury. The decision in the first of these cases, upon the insufficiency of the evidence for the consideration of the jury, is scarcely consistent with later authorities. In the last of them, Parke, B. thought there was no proof that the servant "had ever received any general authority from the company to arrest any person who did not pay his fare, nor was there any evidence of any course of dealing to show that, as a servant of the company, he was authorised to make any arrest on their behalf." In the later cases a more particular inquiry was made into the character of the employment of the officer, whose acts were in question, and the nature of the duties entrusted to him. In Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Company (3 El. & El. 672; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 850) the plaintiff had been arrested for travelling on the line without a proper ticket by an inspector of the company acting under the direction of the superintendent of the station. By the Railway Clauses Act (10 Vict. c. 20), s. 8, a penalty is imposed on any person travelling on a railway without having paid his fare, with intent to defraud, and power is given to all officers and servants on behalf of the company to apprehend such persons. There was evidence that the superintendent was the person in supreme authority at the station, and the jury having found for the plaintiff, the court refused to set aside the verdict, on the ground that there was no evidence for their consideration. Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, observes: "The court thought that, as from the nature of the case the question whether a particular passenger should be arrested or not must be made without delay, and as the case may not be of unfrequent occurrence, it was a reasonable inference that in the conduct of their business the company should have on the spot officers with authority to determine, without the delay attending on convening the directors, whether a person accused of this offence should be apprehended." And the court held there was evidence for the jury that the persons who apprehended the plaintiff had such authority, observing that it was difficult to see why the company paid the police if the inspector of their police was not to act for them to this extent. This case turns therefore on the considerations that the summary power of apprehension given for the protection of the company could only be exercised (practically) on the spot, and instantly, and that the officers who acted were the fittest and indeed the only representatives of the company on the spot who could exercise it, and upon these considerations it was held that the jury might infer the necessary authority. In the later case of Edwards v. London and North-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 445; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 656), it was held that there was no evidence of the officer who had made the arrest having such authority. There a foreman porter who had the superintendence of the station yard in the absence of the station-master, gave the plaintiff into custody on a charge of stealing timber which the foreman porter suspected to be the property of the company. The timber was in a van at the station. It did not appear that any timber was in the special charge of the foreman. The plaintiff was well known, and in fact a gate-man in the service of the company. It was held that there was no evidence of implied authority arising from the foreman's position to give into custody persons whom he might suspect to have stolen the company's goods. The apprehension in this case was not in pursuance of any special duty entrusted to the servant, to enforce laws or bye-laws. The court recognised the distinction that in the case of such a duty, authority might under certain circumstances be presumed, but held that the general authority sought to be inferred from the position of the foreman could not be so presumed. Other decisions adopt this distinction. In Moore v. Metropolitan Railway Company (L. Rep., 8 Q. B. 36; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 951), the facts of the case were held to bring it within the authority of Goff v. The Great Western Railway Company. The case of Poulton v. The South-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 534; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 11) was a peculiar one. The station-master had arrested the plaintiff for non payment, not of his own fare, but that of his horse; the law giving power to detain only for the former. Although it appeared that the station-master acted in the belief that the law authorised the arrest, and that he was protecting the interests of the company, it was held that his act was not within the scope of his authority, since it could not be inferred that the company had authorised him to do an act which under no circumstances could be lawful, and which they had no power to do themselves. A question in some respects similar arose in Allen v. The London and South-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 65; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 612). It is to be observed that although in both these cases the defendants happened to be railway companies, the questions involved in them might equally arise in the case of other masters. In the last it appeared that a clerk whose duty it was to issue tickets and put the money received in a till, which was kept under his charge, having given some money in change to the plaintiff, who objected to one of the coins, a dispute arose, and the plaintiff, it was alleged, put his hand into the till. The clerk thereupon seized the plaintiff and gave him into custody, and the next morning charged him before a magistrate with feloniously attempting to rob the till. Blackburn, J., who tried the cause, left it to the jury to say whether the clerk acted for his own ends and out of spite in consequence of the dispute, or whether he acted in furtherance, as he supposed, of the interests of his employers to protect their property. The jury found that the clerk was acting in defence of the company's property, and returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The court set this verdict aside and entered a nonsuit. It does not appear whether the clerk when he gave the plaintiff into custody believed or suspected that he had actually taken any money, though the finding of the jury affords an inference that he acted under that belief. The charge however was for the attempt only, and the decision assumed there had been no more than an attempt. Blackburn, J. put two cases, as supposed cases only, and his so putting them shows how little questions of this kind have been before the courts. He said he was disposed to think that if a servant in charge of money found another attempting to steal it, and could not prevent him otherwise than by taking him into custody, he might have an implied authority to arrest him, or if he had reason to believe that the money had been actually stolen, and he could get it back by taking the thief into custody, that also might be within the authority of the person in charge of it. The learned judge, however, declined to pronounce a decided opinion on these cases, and held that there was clearly no implied authority to give the plaintiff into custody for an attempt to steal which had failed. In none of the cases referred to did the question of the authority of a manager or agent entrusted with the general conduct of his master's business arise. They were all cases of particular agencies where the agents had been appointed to a special sphere of duty. The result of the decisions in all these cases is that the authority to arrest offenders was only implied where the duties which the officer was employed to discharge could not be efficiently performed for the benefit of his employer, unless he had the power to apprehend offenders promptly on the spot; though it was suggested that possibly a like authority might be implied in the supposed cases of a servant in charge of his master's property arresting a man who he had reason to believe was attempting to steal, or had actually stolen it. In the latter of these cases it is part of the supposition that the property might be got back by the arrest, but in such a case the time, place, and opportunity of consulting the employer before acting would be material circumstances to be considered in determining the question of authority. The liability of the bank in this case must rest either on the ground of some general authority in the acting manager to prosecute on behalf of the bank, or on a particular authority so to act in cases of emergency. The duties of a bank manager would usually be to conduct banking business on behalf of his employers, and when he is found so acting, what is done by him in the way of ordinary banking transactions may be presumed, until the contrary is shown, to be within the scope of his authority; and his employers would be liable for his mistakes, and, under some circumstances, for his frauds, in the management of such business (Mackay v. The Commercial Bank of New Brunswick, L. Rep. 5 P. C. 394; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 180). But the arrest, and still less the prosecution of offenders, is not within the ordinary routine of banking business, and when the question of a manager's authority in such a case arises, it is essential to inquire carefully into his position and duties. These may, and in practice do, vary considerably. In the case of a chief or general manager, invested with general supervision and power of control, such an authority in certain cases affecting the property of the bank might be presumed from his position to belong to him, at least in the absence of the directors. The same presumption might arise in the instance of a manager conducting the business of a branch bank at a distance from the head office and the board of directors. But whatever may be the case in instances of this kind, their Lordships think that such a presumption cannot properly be made from the evidence given at the trial as to the position held by Mr. Wilkinson. It appears that the board of directors held their meetings at the bank office, and the general manager, Mr. Smith, also sat there; and the clear inference from the evidence (if believed) is that the acting manager was subordinate to the general manager, and that the latter was, as he presumably would be, subject to the superior authority of the directors. Supposing this to be so (and if the facts were disputed, the opinion of the jury should have been taken upon them), their Lordships think it cannot be presumed, from his position alone, that the acting manager had general authority to prosecute on behalf of the bank, and therefore that evidence was required to show that such a power was within the scope of the duties and class of acts he was authorised to perform. The plaintiff offered no evidence whatever on this point; and the testimony of the two managers directly negatives the possession of such a power by the acting manager. Their statements at the most raise the question whether Wilkinson had authority so to act in cases of emergency, where immediate action is required, and the opportunity of arresting the offender might be lost if reference was made to the general manager or the directors. Granting that these statements afford some proof of such an authority, the further question would arise whether there is evidence that an emergency in fact occurred. An authority to be exercised only in cases of emergency, and derived from the exigency of the occasion, is evidently a limited one, and before it can arise a state of facts must exist which shows that such exigency is present, or from which it might reasonably be supposed to be present. If a general authority is proved, it is enough to show, commonly, that the agent was acting in what he did on behalf of his principal. But in the case of such a limited authority as that referred to, the question whether the emergency existed, or might reasonably have been supposed to exist, arises for decision; and that question raises issues beyond the mere fact that the agent acted on behalf of and in the supposed interest of the principal; were it otherwise, the special authority would be equivalent to a general one. What then was the situation when these unwarrantable proceedings took place? It cannot possibly be considered that it raised a case of emergency requiring immediate action by criminal proceedings against a person in the plaintiffs' position, or afforded reasonable ground for supposing that such a case had arisen. There was no necessity for immediate action, nor was immediate action in fact taken. The plaintiff was not at once given into custody, but an information was laid before a magistrate, and when he very properly refused a warrant to apprehend him, the summons complained of was taken out when there could evidently be no urgency either to obtain or serve it. It was obviously an attempt of the notaries and solicitors to recover the bill by means which were thought by them to be more effectual for the purpose than civil proceedings would be. Their Lordships therefore think, upon facts which appear upon the evidence to be beyond dispute, that there was no necessity or apparent necessity for immediate action from which authority in the acting manager to instruct the solicitors (if he really did instruct them) to take these proceedings on behalf of the bank could be inferred. It is to be observed also that the bill in question was not under Wilkinson's special charge. He says "the matter was not in his department. It was a branch business; the general manager takes that." There being then no evidence of any emergency, the case in their Lordships' view is brought to the issue that the bank would not be liable for the acts of Wilkinson unless it could be established that he had some general authority to institute criminal proceedings. They have already said that they think such an authority cannot be inferred from his position alone as it appears upon the evidence, and that the direction of the learned judge was wrong. The verdict therefore cannot stand. In case the action should be again tried, the jury should be told, if the evidence on the point should be to the same effect as on the first trial, that the facts do not present a case of emergency, or apparent emergency, from which authority could be derived, and consequently that the bank would not be liable for the act in question unless it is proved, or can be inferred from the evidence, that general authority to prosecute offenders for stealing the bank's property connected with its business at Sydney, without consulting the general manager or the board of directors, was within the scope of Wilkinson's employment and duties, and the powers entrusted to him in relation thereto. The question whether Wilkinson in fact authorised the solicitors to prosecute the plaintiff will of course be open on the second trial. In the result their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court discharging the rule, and to direct that the rule be made absolute for a new trial. The respondent must pay the costs of this appeal.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Feb. 27 and March 22, 1879.

GIRDLESTONE v. THE BRIGHTON AQUARIUM COMPANY. (a)

Profanation of the Lord's-day—21 Geo. 3, c. 49, ss. 1, 4.—Action for penalties—Covin and collusion.

A judgment recovered in an action by arrangement between the parties in order to protect the offenders against bona fide actions for the penalties is covinous and collusive.

The plaintiff sued the defendants to recover a penalty under 21 Geo. 3, c. 49, s. 1. for keeping open the Brighton Aquarium on a Sunday, 15th Aug. Subsequently to the issuing of the writ in the plaintiff's action, the solicitor of the defendants obtained permission from one R. to instruct a solicitor to bring an action in R's name for penalties incurred for keeping the Aquarium open on the 15th Aug. and the several Sundays intervening between that date and the 7th Oct.; it being understood that R. should not issue execution or claim the penalties, but that the company might do what they pleased with the judgment so to be obtained in R's name. At the time of making this arrangement neither R. nor the solicitor to the company were aware of the plaintiff's action. The object of the arrangement with R. was to protect the company against any action which might be brought for any of the several penalties, and also to obtain as early as possible a remission of the penalties by the Home Secretary under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 80. R. had nothing more to do with the action brought in his name. Judgment was signed by default on 28th Oct. This judgment the defendants pleaded in bar of the plaintiff's action, and the plaintiff replied that the judgment was obtained by covin and collusion.

Held, that the judgment obtained under R's name was no bar to plaintiff's action, because it was in reality no judgment, as R. was only a nominal plaintiff, and the plaintiff and defendants were in substance identical.

And per Cotton and Thesiger, L.JJ., that, inasmuch as the result of the proceedings in R's action was to defraud and prejudice a third party, the judgment could not be a bar to plaintiff's action, being covinous and collusive.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of the Exchequer Division, in an action to recover a penalty under 21 Geo. 3, 49. The facts (a) are stated as far as material in the report of the proceedings in the court below (reported 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 358; 1. Rep. 3 Ex. Div. p. 137), and in the judgment of Cotton, L.J.

O. Russell, Q.C. and O. F. Macdonell (McMillan with them) for the appellants.—The true definition of covin is "a secret assent determined in the hearts of two or more to the defrauding and prejudice of another" (Co. Lit. 357 a). Therefore, such a plea as this cannot be established without proving fraud, which is also implied in the word collusion. Covin and collusion are made penal by stat. 4 Hen. 7, c. 20, and therefore the plaintiff who alleges them must prove as strictly as upon an indictment, and he must prove these ingredients, none of which are present here, viz, two parties (Tresham's case 9 Rep. 195); fraud essential (Meddowcroft v. Huguenin) (4 Moo. P.C. 386); prejudice to third party. If two persons take a case by consent, and on proper materials, this is not collusive:

(a) By 21 Geo. 3, c. 49, s. 1, "Any house, room, or other place which shall be opened or used for public entertainment or amusement . . . upon any part of the Lord's-day, called Sunday, and to which persons shall be admitted by the payment of money, or by tickets sold for money, shall be deemed a disorderly house or place; and the keeper of such house, room, or place shall forfeit the sum of 200l. for every day that such house, room, or place shall be opened or used as aforesaid on the Lord's-day to such person as will sue for the same. . . ."

By 38 & 39 Vict. c. 80, s. 1, "It shall be lawful for her Majesty to remit in whole or in part any penalty, fine, or forfeiture imposed or recovered for any offence under the said Act;" 21 Geo. 3, c. 49, "Whether on indictment, information, or summary conviction, or by action, or any other process."

Secondly, the rule that the first writ in point of date acquires a vested right is repealed by implication by the Uniformity of Process Act (2 Will. 4, c. 39). But even if the rule did exist, the plaintiff could not avail himself of it, because his writ does not specify for what Sunday he sues. They also cited

Sir Hardinge Giffard (Solicitor-General), Waddy, Q.C., and Bosanquet for the respondents.—There can be no question that the 15th Aug. was the day in respect of which the plaintiff sued, and the point was not taken at the trial. Covin does not ex vi termini require two parties. It is enough that the action was not brought bond fide for the purpose of recovering the penalties, and it is immaterial that the motives of the parties were in other respects good. Here Rolfe was merely nominal plaintiff, and for the purpose of overriding an Act of Parliament, therefore the action was not bond fide. Protective actions are expressly within the meaning of the statute of Hen. 7, and for this purpose it is enough that there was an agreement that no penalty should be recovered. The priority of respondent's writ makes him entitled, and the company should have pleaded this against plaintiff. He cited

Macdonell in reply.

March 22.—The following judgments were delivered.

BRETT, L.J.—This case was tried before Cleasby, B., and it seems to me that his direction to the jury amounted to this, that they might find that the previous judgment which had been obtained had no effect, although they might be of opinion that there was no fraud. The Exchequer Division, after the jury had found a verdict for the plaintiff, confirmed this ruling. Now if it were necessary, in order to support the judgment of the court below, to say that there had been any fraud, or anything which could be called fraud, on the part of anyone, I could not agree to that, for in my opinion there was not a symptom of any fraud, but what was done was an honest transaction, and there was no harm in it morally. There was a division of opinion among different people as to the propriety of suing for and recovering the penalties imposed by this Act of Parliament, and that being so, the solicitor for the defendants requested a person, to whose mind it appeared that the penalties ought not to be recovered, to sue the defendants for a penalty under the Act. He had two intentions in so doing, first, that the judgment which he recovered should be an answer to any other action which might be brought against the defendants for the same cause; and, secondly, that the Home Secretary might remit the penalty which the defendants had incurred. Neither object was illegal or immoral; what was done was done for the purpose of protecting the company. It was not shown that the person who sued the defendants at the request of their solicitor knew that the other action had been commenced, but in my opinion that would be immaterial. I think the defect was brought about by the over caution of the defendant's solicitor, for, if Rolfe had instructed some other solicitor, and had sued the defendants, although he might have been bound in honour not to exact the penalty when he had obtained judgment for it, I think there would have been no covin and collusion. But the defendants' solicitor requested Rolfe to allow him (the defendants' solicitor) to bring the action, using Rolfe's name as plaintiff; but Rolfe had no control over the proceedings, and did not instruct any one to act on his behalf, but only lent his name for the purpose of the action. This shows, in my mind, that the suggested plaintiff, Rolfe, was really no plaintiff at all, but that the company were in reality both plaintiffs and defendants. Therefore, although in form there is a judgment, there is in reality no judgment whatever. If the plaintiff in this case had pleaded in reply, not that there was covin and collusion, but had pleaded a reply in which the facts were stated, it would have been shown that there was no judgment which could be held to be valid. Therefore I am of opinion that there was no judgment, and on that ground alone I am a party to affirming this decision.

COTTON, L.J.—This was a motion by the defendants by way of appeal from the decision of the Exchequer Division for a new trial on the ground of misdirection by the judge before whom the case was tried. The action was to recover a penalty under the Act 21 Geo. 3, c. 49. This Act makes the penalty a debt due to the person who sues for it. The defendants pleaded a judgment in respect of the same offence, that is, keeping open the Aquarium on Sunday the 15th of August obtained at the suit of Rolfe. The plaintiff replied that the judgment was obtained by covin and collusion, and the jury found for the plaintiff on this issue, and there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. There was an application to the Exchequer Division for a new trial, but that court refused to interfere, hence the appeal to us. This action was commenced on the 17th Aug. 1875. There was evidence at the trial, that in October the solicitor of the defendants saw Rolfe, and that at his request Rolfe authorised him to commence in the name of Rolfe an action against the company for penalties incurred for keeping open the Aquarium on the 15th Aug. and on the Sundays intervening between that day and the 20th Oct., that the solicitor of the company accordingly instructed the solicitor who appeared on the record for Rolfe, that this solicitor received no instructions in the matter from Rolfe, that on the 28th Oct. the company suffered judgment by default, that this judgment had never been enforced, and that although there was no positive agreement that the judgment should not be enforced against the company, there was an honourable understanding between Rolfe and the company that the action brought in his name was to be a protective action, and that Rolfe should not issue execution. One of the objects in allowing Rolfe to obtain judgment was to ascertain in an action in which the plaintiff was not hostile whether the Home Secretary would exercise the power given to him by a recent Act, of preventing penalties being enforced, and it was proved that till after the judgment pleaded was confessed, neither Rolfe nor the solicitor who appeared as his solicitor on the record knew of the present action.

GIRDLESTONE v. THE BRIGHTON AQUARIUM COMPANY.

[CT. OF APP.]

On this evidence the defendants contended that Rolfe had no intention of defeating the claim of the plaintiff in the present action, and that his intention to protect the company was not sufficient to support the reply of covin and collusion. The learned judge, in summing up, in effect, told the jury that it was not necessary for the support of this reply of covin and collusion to show that Rolfe knew of the plaintiff's action, that even though the object of the company in procuring the action to be brought was to obtain the decision of the Home Secretary, the judgment would be one obtained by covin and collusion, if in fact there was no intention to take out execution, or otherwise enforce the judgment, and if the intention was to protect the company. The jury on this direction found for the plaintiff, and I am of opinion that there was no misdirection, and that there was ample evidence to support the verdict. There was much argument before us as to the meaning of the word covin. It may be assumed that the meaning of the reply is that the judgment was obtained by an agreement between Rolfe and the defendants the company. For even if the word covin does not of itself import an agreement between two, covin and collusion do. I am also of opinion that to make an agreement covinous, there must be something in it which in the view of the law is deceit. Now, in an action for penalties the plaintiff is, ordinarily and in the absence of agreement between him and the defendant, a person independent of and adverse to the defendant, seeking to obtain a judgment as a means of enforcing for his own benefit payment of the penalty. If in such an action, though the plaintiff is apparently independent of the defendant, he has by agreement with the defendant allowed his name to be used as plaintiff, and authorised the defendant, or his solicitor, to instruct a solicitor to act for him, the nominal plaintiff, and there is an agreement, or understanding, that judgment in the action shall not be enforced, but used as a protection to the defendant against other actions, either already brought, or which may be brought, to recover a penalty given by statute; then the action is one in which the company are in substance both plaintiffs and defendants, and this agreement or arrangement is an agreement or arrangement that the position of the parties to the action, apparently hostile, shall be friendly; that the action and judgment, which purport to be an attack on, shall in fact be a protection to the defendant, an agreement that the reality shall be different from what is represented. This, in my opinion is, even in the absence of any intent to defraud, deceit, and, in my opinion, though the agreement or arrangement be not legally binding, the judgment confessed or obtained under it will have been obtained by covin and collusion, and cannot be relied on by the defendant in answer to an action in respect of the same matter brought by any other person, and the learned judge so directed the jury. It was urged upon us that, to support the reply of covin and collusion, it was necessary that the agreement should be intended to deprive or defraud the plaintiff in the present action of his claim, that Rolfe had no such intention, and that neither he nor his solicitor knew of the present action till after judgment was confessed in Rolfe's action. But it was stated by the solicitor of the defendants that the object of the action commenced in Rolfe's name was to protect the defendants, that is, to defeat the claim of any person who might endeavour to obtain judgment for penalties for keeping open the aquarium on any Sunday covered by Rolfe's action, and, if so, in law the parties to the agreement must be considered to have intended to defeat the claim of the plaintiff as one of the general body against whose claims Rolfe's action was intended to protect the defendants. It was strongly pressed in support of the appeal that the object of Rolfe's action was to obtain a judgment on which the decision of the Home Secretary could be taken as to the course which he would adopt, and that this was disregarded by Cleasby, B. In my opinion he was right in so doing. It is unnecessary to consider whether the intention to apply to the Home Secretary, as if Rolfe were an independent plaintiff, seeking to enforce payment of the penalties, while in fact he was, as plaintiff in the action, a mere name used by the company, by means of which name the company had obtained a judgment for their own protection, was not of itself an argument against the validity of that judgment. But the circumstance that one of the objects was to apply to and obtain the decision of the Home Secretary does not, in my opinion, make the judgment less covinous and collusive if it was obtained in an action in which there was not any real plaintiff, and under an arrangement that it should be used, not to recover penalties from the defendants, but to protect the defendants from the claims of others who might probably sue. I may add that the decision might, independently of the grounds to which I have already referred, be supported on the ground that in substance there was no judgment, the plaintiff on the record having been under the circumstances the defendant under another name. In my opinion the appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

THESEER, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed. The defendants plead in bar to an action to recover a penalty, a judgment in favour of a third party for the same penalty. That judgment was obtained in an action which was commenced at the request of the defendants' solicitor while the plaintiff's action was pending, and was carried through to judgment by the intervention of a solicitor employed by the defendants, and without the interference, in any way, of the nominal plaintiff. It was an action not brought for the purpose of giving the person named as plaintiff the fruits of it, or indeed any benefit whatever from it, but immediately for the protection of the defendants from any action brought, or to be brought against them in respect of the penalties which were claimed in it, and mediately for the purpose of taking the Home Secretary's opinion upon the point whether he would remit such penalties. Apart from any question upon the pleadings, is it possible that a judgment so obtained, and in such a suit, can bar the plaintiff's action? Was the action in which it was obtained in substance anything more than one in which the defendants were the real plaintiffs as well as the nominal and real defendants? I think not, and if it was not, then the mere statement of the character of the action is a sufficient argument against the judgment obtained in it operating as a bar to the present action. But the plaintiff has, in his reply to the statement of defence, impeached the judgment upon the special ground of covin and collusion. The argument, therefore, before us has been addressed to the question whether the facts of the case establish that the judgment is so impeachable. In dealing with this question, I assume that Rolfe, when he assented to an action being brought in his name, was unaware of the fact that the present action had been commenced. I assume, too, that the jury have negatived fraud in the sense of there having been a wicked mind and intent on the part of Rolfe and the defendants, or either of them, in instituting, or assenting to the institution of the proceedings which led to the judgment. I think, nevertheless that they were legally guilty both of covin and collusion. Although the word "covin" is sometimes, and especially by old writers, used in the sense of a trick or contrivance devised by one person alone, I think that in a case like the present, when it is used in conjunction with the word "collusion," it does import a trick or contrivance planned by both the parties to the transaction which is alleged to be tainted by it. I go further, and take it to mean a trick or contrivance which must be proved to be—using the language in Co. Litt. 357 (b)—"to the defrauding and prejudice of another." Even if we assume all this, the contention of the defendants still appears to me to be inadmissible. If Rolfe had known of and intended to defeat the plaintiff's bonâ fide action by permitting a sham action to be brought in his own name, it is clear that he would have been a party to a trick or contrivance for defrauding the plaintiff. Prejudicing a bonâ fide action for a statutory penalty by the secret contrivance of a sham one can be nothing less than defrauding. Indeed, it is hardly disputed on the part of the defendants that, under such circumstances, the allegation of covin and collusion would be established. But, if so, surely the intention to prejudice or defraud a class of persons, including the plaintiff, must equally establish the allegation, although the plaintiff was not known to form one of the class intended to be prejudiced or defrauded. There is legislative authority for this view;—the stat. 4 Hen. 7, which was passed for the purpose of preventing proceedings taken in good faith to recover penalties being defeated by sham protective actions, made punishable, under the name of covin and collusion, such actions, not only when brought for the purpose of defeating bonâ fide proceedings already taken—in other words, prejudicing a particular individual—but also of defeating such proceedings, although not yet commenced—in other words, of prejudicing an individual not yet identified and known. The statute also provided that such covin and collusion might be averred in answer to any plea setting up a recovery in a covinous and collusive action in bar to bonâ fide proceedings. I would only add that, although, as has been suggested, the motive of the defendants and Rolfe in endeavouring to obtain the decision of the Home Secretary as to the remission of penalties may have been good, and the end, the keeping the Aquarium open on Sundays, may have been a desirable one, it appears to me impossible to hold with reason that the co-existence of such motives or such an end, with motives, ends, and acts which, standing by themselves, constitute covin and collusion, can make this case any the less one of covin and collusion, or in any way remove or lessen the legal consequences which covin and collusion entail.

LAMB v. BREWSTER AND ANOTHER. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Landlord and tenant—Property tax—Agreement by landlord to repay tax not deducted from rent—Legality of contract—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 103.

If a landlord agrees with his tenant to repay him property tax at some future time instead of allowing a deduction from the rent of the amount of the tax, such an agreement is not illegal, and the tenant may recover the amounts paid in accordance therewith.

THE plaintiff gave notice under Order XXI., r. 4, that his claim was that which appeared from the indorsement on the writ.

The claim was against the defendants as executors, for 37*l.*, for six years' property tax paid by the plaintiff as tenant of the testator for him, and which the executors had refused to return to the plaintiff.

The statement of defence alleged that, assuming that the property tax was paid by the plaintiff as alleged, no demand or application was ever made by the plaintiff for the said property tax to be paid or allowed, or deducted out of the rent, which became due and payable by the plaintiff to the testator, next after each payment of the said property tax respectively; that the said plaintiff made each payment of rent without making or claiming any such deduction of the amount liable to be deducted in respect of property tax, according to the statutes in such case made and provided.

In his reply the plaintiff stated that demands or requests were frequently made by the plaintiff for the said property tax to be paid, allowed, or deducted out of the rent which became due and payable by the plaintiff to the testator next after such payment of the said property tax respectively. That the said testator promised the plaintiff that if he would continue to pay the said rent in full, without deducting anything for the said payment of property tax, the testator would pay to him all sums which he had paid or should pay for such property tax; and that the plaintiff did continue to pay the rent in full, yet the testator did not repay such sum as agreed.

To this reply the defendants demurred.

The Divisional Court (Mellor and Field, JJ.) held that the reply was good, and gave judgment for the plaintiff (reported 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 457). The defendants appealed.

Legislature is to prevent all private arrangements by which the mode of assessment prescribed by the Act may be interfered with. This is a contract to pay the rent in full without any deduction within the meaning of sect. 103, and the only possible consideration for it is the doing by the landlord of something which would expose him to penalties, that is, refusing to allow the deduction of the property tax when the tenant paid the rent. They cited

Dodd, for the plaintiff, was not called upon to argue.

BRETT, L.J.—I think the judgment in this case ought to be affirmed. In the absence of the specific agreement which is put forth in the reply, the fact of the tenant having paid the rent in full would not either him to recover the amount of the property tax from the landlord; but the question is, not whether on mere payment of the rent in full the tenant can recover the amount of the property tax from the landlord, but whether, when the tenant pays the rent in full, on an understanding that the landlord will repay him the amount of the property tax, he can recover that amount from the landlord. The question turns entirely on the construction of sect. 103 of the Property Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), and sect. 73 has no bearing on the case. Now, in construing an Act of Parliament, just as in construing any other document, we ought to see what is the substantial reason of the Act, and, unless we are prevented by the words, we ought to try to give effect to it; the fulfilment of the substance of the enactment is sufficient. Here, although by the provisions of the Act the tax is imposed upon the tenant in the first instance, the landlord is finally to pay it, and no agreement, of which the effect is that the tenant is to pay both the rent and the tax, is valid; but there are no words to show that a contract that for a time the tenant is to pay the tax is void, for by such an agreement, in substance, although the liability is in the first instance on the tenant, in the result the landlord would pay the amount of the tax, and so the object of the statute is fulfilled, for the tax is collected from the tenant, but the landlord pays it. No doubt the word "deduction," if construed in the most strict sense, would mean a deduction of the amount of the property tax before or at the time of the payment of rent, so that the full amount of the rent should never pass from the tenant to the landlord; but, if we carry this construction to its strict result, it follows that if the tenant pays the rent in full, and the landlord immediately gives him back the amount of the tax, this would not be a deduction within the meaning of the Act; but I think the fair meaning is, that the landlord shall in the result pay the amount of the property tax, and therefore there is nothing in sect. 103 of the Act which can have the effect of invalidating the contract set out in the reply, and therefore, if that contract is proved in fact, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and the reply is good, and the judgment ought to be affirmed.

COTTON, L.J.—The question is, whether the express promise contained in the agreement set out and agreements, made or entered into, or to be made and entered into for payment of any interest, rent, or other annual payment aforesaid in full, without allowing such deduction as aforesaid, shall be utterly void."

out in the reply is void. Some question was raised as to the terms of the agreement, but in substance it comes to this, that if the tenant will pay the amount of the rent in full the defendants' testator will repay to him the amount of the property tax, and the question is whether this is against the Act. The intention of the Act is that the property tax shall be a landlord's and not a tenant's tax; this is partly provided for by sect. 73, but sect. 103 goes further. The Act means that for convenience of collection the occupier shall pay the tax in the first instance, but he may deduct the amount when he pays his rent to the landlord, and if he neglects to exercise this right of deduction he has no remedy in the absence of an express agreement on the part of the landlord to repay the amount. In such a case the tenant makes the payment in his own wrong. Now what is the agreement which is sought to be set aside here? It comes to this: that if the landlord receives the whole amount of the rent he will afterwards pay back to the tenant the amount of the property tax; but still by the agreement it is a landlord's and not a tenant's tax. The contention on behalf of the defendants would go as far as this, that if the tenant pays the full amount of the rent, and the landlord the very next day repays him the amount of the property tax, this would be an illegal transaction; but, in my opinion, such a transaction as that would not be a violation of the provisions of the Act. I think it would be keeping too close to the words, and not paying sufficient attention to the substance of the Act, if we were to say that this agreement makes the tax a tenant's and not a landlord's tax. It is said on behalf of the defendants that the Act makes the agreement void, for the tenant has the right to deduct the amount of the tax when he pays his rent, but, if he does not then exercise that right, he cannot claim afterwards. But I think there is nothing in the Act to say that the agreement is void. Here the tenant has at the request of the landlord paid the rent in full without insisting upon his right of deduction, and the landlord has promised to repay to the tenant the amount of the tax. The general intention of the Act is that this shall be a landlord's and not a tenant's tax, and this is carried out by giving effect to the agreement in question. The power of deduction is for the benefit of the tenant, and there is nothing to prevent his enforcing an express promise by the landlord to repay him the amount of the tax in consideration of his having waived his right to deduct it from the rent. I think this agreement is not void within the words of sect. 103, nor against the intention of the Act. I agree, therefore, that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

THESIGER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute has two main objects: first, to collect the property tax from the tenant; and secondly, as a matter of policy, that the landlord shall be the person to pay it. By sect. 63 the collection from the tenant is provided for; by sect. 73 no agreement shall be binding, contrary to the intent and meaning of the Act; by sect. 103 it is provided that contracts for payment of rent, without deduction shall be void; to carry out the objects of the Act, a remedy is given to the tenant, that is the power of deduction. Sect. 103 provides that, if the landlord refuses to allow any deduction authorised by the Act, he shall be liable to a penalty. Then what is a refusal within the meaning of this provision? The latter part of the section must be correlative with the former part. If the tenant gave a cheque for the whole amount of the rent, and said to the landlord, "You must repay me the amount of the property tax," it is impossible to say that this would be a transaction which would subject the landlord to a penalty. If this is so, we come to understand the latter part of the section to mean that no contract is to be allowed by which the tenant is to be ultimately liable for the tax, but a contract made for the sake of convenience, by which the deduction is to be made in some other way than by a deduction of the amount of the property tax at the time when the tenant pays his rent to the landlord, is perfectly good.

Ex parte THE SWANSEA ROYAL AND SOUTH WALES UNION FRIENDLY SOCIETY; Re THE WEST OF ENGLAND AND SOUTH WALES DISTRICT BANK. (a)

Incapacity of a corporate body to be an officer of a friendly society—Friendly Societies Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), s. 15, sub-sect. 7; s. 20, sub-sect. 1.

Semble, that a corporate body cannot legally be appointed an officer of a friendly society.

The committee of management of a friendly society which had power, in certain events, to elect officers of the society, on the happening of one of such events, passed a resolution that a bank which had been registered as an unlimited company under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867 should be appointed treasurers of the society. The manager of the bank accepted the office on behalf of the bank, and certain moneys belonging to the society were paid to the bank as treasurers. An order having been made to wind-up the bank:

Held, that the society had no preferential right under sect. 15, sub-sect. 7, of the Friendly Societies Act 1875, as against other creditors of the bank, to be paid the moneys received by the bank as treasurers.

Quere, as to the effect of an omission, by an officer of a friendly society, to give security when required by the rules of the society and the 20th section of the Friendly Societies Act 1875.

THE SWANSEA ROYAL AND SOUTH WALES UNION Friendly Society was established in 1867, and was afterwards registered under the Friendly Societies Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60). The rules of the society were duly registered under the Act. By the 7th rule the business and affairs of the society were to be conducted by a committee of management, consisting of five members, which had power to remove an officer for gross neglect, improper conduct, or incompetency; and, in case of such removal, the committee of management were to elect a successor, who should continue in office until the next annual general meeting of the members of the society, when his appointment was to be confirmed, or another person was to be appointed in his place.

The 8th rule was as follows:

A treasurer shall be appointed at any general or special meeting of the members of the society, by a majority of the members present and voting, and shall continue in office during the pleasure of the members. He shall be responsible for all sums of money from time to time paid into his hands by any persons on account of the society, and for the investment or application of the same under the authority of the trustees in such a manner as they and the committee of management of the society shall direct. He shall render his cash account monthly and as often as the society or trustees or committee of management shall direct, and supply them with duplicates thereof, and shall, if required, attend every general meeting of the members, and all meetings of the committee of management. He shall, before taking upon himself the execution of his office, give security pursuant to the 38 & 39 Vict. c. 60, s. 20. (a)

In the early part of 1877 the then treasurer of the friendly society became insolvent, and in consequence of the difficulty encountered in recovering from his estate the moneys in his hands belonging to the friendly society, it was resolved that in future a bank should be appointed treasurer, and at a meeting of the committee of management, held on the 18th June 1877, a resolution was passed that the West of England and South Wales District Bank should be the treasurer of the friendly society. Shortly afterwards three members of the committee of management called on the manager of the Swansea branch of the bank (which was registered as a company with unlimited liability under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867), and he then, on behalf of the bank, accepted the office of treasurer. An account in the name of the friendly society was then opened at the bank, and the prospectuses of the friendly society were reprinted. On the first page of the prospectus, as reprinted, appeared the names of the trustees, committee of management, &c., and the following words, "Treasurer: West of England Bank;" "Bankers: West of England and South Wales District Bank." The manager of the bank continued to act as treasurer of the friendly society from the time when he accepted the office on behalf of the bank until an order to wind-up the bank was made by Malins, V.C.; and, at the date of the winding-up order, the balance standing to the credit of the friendly society in their account with the bank amounted to the sum of 496*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* After the winding-up order had been made the solicitors of the friendly society applied to the official liquidators for payment of the 496*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, as being a preference debt, within sect. 15, sub-sect. 7, of the Friendly Societies Act 1875. (a)

(a) "Every officer, if the rules of the society require, shall, before taking upon himself the execution of his office, become bound with one sufficient surety at the least in a bond according to one of the forms set forth in the third schedule to this Act, or give the security of a guarantee society, in such sum as the society directs, conditioned for his rendering a just and true account of all moneys received and paid by him on account of the society at such times as its rules appoint, or as the society, or the trustees, or committee of management thereof require him to do so, and for the payment by him of all sums due from him to the society:" (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60, s. 20, sub-sect. 1).

(a) Reported by FRANK EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The liquidators having refused payment on the ground that the bank was not a treasurer within the meaning of the Act, the trustees of the friendly society took out a summons before Fry, J., to whom the winding-up of the proceedings had been transferred, for an order that the official liquidators might be directed to pay to the applicants as such trustees the sum of 496*l.* 1*l.* 9*d.*, money in the possession of the bank, by virtue of their office as treasurer. The summons was adjourned into court.

F. Bristow, Q.C. and H. B. Buckley for the friendly society.—The effect of sub-sect. 7 of sect. 15 is, that when there is a properly constituted officer, and that officer has in his hands any money belonging to the society, that officer must, on the demand of the trustees, pay back that money in preference to all other demands upon him. By the 8th rule the treasurer is to give the security pursuant to the 20th section of the Friendly Societies Act 1875. By that section the security is only to be given "as required" by the society, and in this case the society had not demanded the security. By the resolution of the 18th June 1877 the bank became treasurer of the society. [Fry, J.—The appointment must be made at a "general or special meeting of the members of the society," not by the committee.] They were appointed ad interim till the next general meeting, which was held on the 21st May 1878. [Fry, J.—Then the appointment terminated on the 21st May 1878.] No; they remained until the appointment was confirmed or someone else appointed, and, no one else being appointed at the next meeting, there was a tacit confirmation of the appointment. [Fry, J.—The alternative is that the appointment of treasurer is confirmed or someone else is appointed. By virtue of the general meeting he goes out of office.] The bank as treasurers were indirectly confirmed in their appointment because everyone would receive notice of what had taken place before the meeting, and no opposition was afterwards made. [Fry, J.—There is a difficulty as to the words "bankruptcy or insolvency" in the 15th section.] The bank was clearly in a state of bankruptcy or insolvency—they had ceased to pay their debts. It has been said that twenty shillings in the pound will ultimately be paid, but it could not be paid when demanded. Then the section applies if any execution, attachment, or other process be issued, or action raised. Winding-up is a prejudicial proceeding by which the assets of the company are made liable for its debts. The winding-up order may be said also to be a "process" within the meaning of the section. Winding-up is something additional to what is expressly mentioned in the section, and it is difficult to name anything else additional which would come within the section. The society would have had a right against the bank if no winding-up order had been made, and such order gives no new rights. [Fry, J.—How can a large body like this act as a treasurer?] The appointment was a de facto appointment, and the money came into the hands of the bank as treasurers, and not as bankers only. [Fry, J.—Had the bank any power to accept the office?] The manager of the bank had power to accept on behalf of the bank. They cited

Ex parte Harris, 1 De Gex, 162;

Ex parte Orford, 1 De G. M. & G. 483.

Glassey, Q.C. and Romer, for the liquidators, were not called upon.

Fry, J.—I am of opinion that the claimants in this case have not substantiated their claim. They claim that a sum of 496*l.* 1*l.* 9*d.* standing to the credit of their account at one of the branches of the bank should be paid to them in priority to any other creditors, by virtue of a provision, which is contained in the Friendly Societies Act, and which follows similar provisions which have been contained in similar Acts for a long series of years. The bank, it appears from the statement of counsel, is a company incorporated under the Companies Acts 1862 and 1867, and is therefore a corporation. It appears that, before the 18th June 1877, a treasurer had been appointed by this society, and that defalcations had been made by him, and that, at a meeting, held on that day, of the committee, the bank were appointed treasurer of the society. Now the rule of the society which regulates that appointment is the 7th, and it is there provided that in the event of any vacancy occurring by the resignation or death of any officer, the committee of management shall elect a successor, who shall continue in office until the next annual general meeting of the members of the society, when his appointment shall be confirmed, or another person shall be elected in his place. On the 21st May 1878 a general annual meeting of the society was held, and it does not appear that at that meeting the appointment of the bank as treasurer was confirmed, or that any other person was elected in its place. Upon that a question might arise whether the court is to imply that the bank was to continue in the office. I should have a difficulty judicially in coming to the conclusion that that is a necessary inference. Then the 8th section of the rules provides that, a treasurer is to be appointed, and is to continue in office during the pleasure of the members. He is to be responsible for money from time to time paid into his hands on account of the society, and for the investment or application of the same. Then he is to render cash accounts monthly and supply duplicates, and if required, attend every general meeting of the members, and all meetings of the committee of management. And he shall, before taking upon himself the execution of his office, give security pursuant to ss. 38 & 39 Vict., c. 60, s. 20. It appears that that security

(a) "Upon the death or bankruptcy or insolvency of any officer of a society, having in his possession by virtue of his office any money or property belonging to the society, or if any execution, attachment, or other process be issued, or action or diligence raised against such officer or against his property, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or trustee in bankruptcy or insolvency, or the sheriff or other person executing such process, or the party using such action or diligence respectively, shall, upon demand in writing of the trustees of the society, or any two of them, or any person authorised by the society, or by the committee of management of the same, to make such demand, pay such money, and deliver over such property to the trustees of the society in preference to any other debts or claims against the estate of such officer."

"Bankruptcy or insolvency in the present section includes liquidation of a debtor's affairs by arrangement in England, cessio honorum of a debtor in Scotland, and a petition for arrangement with creditors in Ireland, and a trustee in bankruptcy or insolvency includes an assignee in Ireland and a judicial factor in Scotland." has never been given, and it may be, upon the authority of the case of Ex parte Ross (6 Ves. jun. 803a), before Lord Eldon, considered doubtful whether a person who has been appointed to the office of treasurer, and has not given the security which the Act requires, is a treasurer against whom the society can claim a preferential right. Then, further than that, the question arises whether a corporation can fill the office of treasurer according to the rules of the society. It is evident that a treasurer is bound to perform certain public duties. He is to attend the meeting of the members, and all the meetings of the committee of management. It is said that that can be done by the manager or clerk of the bank, but it appears to me that the scope and object of these rules with regard to the officer is the appointment of a natural person, who is to be an officer of the society within the ordinary meaning of that expression, and that great difficulties would be involved in the performance of the duties of that office by a corporation instead of by a natural person. When I turn to the clause of the existing Act regulating friendly societies, which gives the preferential right upon which the applicants are now insisting, I find similar words, indicating to my mind a similar intention, namely, the officer against whom, or whose estate, the preferential claim is to subsist is to be a natural person, and not a body corporate. The whole scope of that clause appears to me to refer to a private individual, who takes upon himself an office, and it gives certain rights in the event of his death, bankruptcy, insolvency, or execution of an attachment or other process to be issued, or action or diligence raised against his property or himself, and it is very remarkable that if it were in the mind of the Legislature that an incorporated company could be an officer, and that the priority should be given in the event of a winding-up, that this Act, which was passed long subsequent to any of the winding-up Acts, is entirely silent with regard to the liquidation of a company, or the winding-up and the distribution of the assets of the company. It appears to me that I am bound to read this clause somewhat strictly, and for the reason which has been pointed out by Lord Eldon, to which I have already referred, and by Knight-Bruce, L.J., when Chief Judge of the Court of Bankruptcy, in the case of Ex parte Harris, that the right given is one against the common right of Her Majesty's subjects, and therefore those who claim that right must bring themselves within the express provisions of the statute. Now, the only words which can be relied upon here are the words "other process" against "the property" of the debtor who is said to be liquidating. That appears to me to be a very doubtful proposition, but I conclude against it, because it appears to me that the Legislature has considered that the officer against whom the statute has given that benefit is a private person, and not a body corporate. If I were to extend the words of the section to a body corporate in liquidation, I think I should be going beyond the words, and the fair intent and meaning of the Act, the intent of the Act being addressed, I repeat, to the case of a natural person and not a body corporate. For these reasons, to which I must add the fact that it appears very doubtful whether the manager had any authority on the part of the bank to accept the office of treasurer on the part of the bank, so as to bind the bank, although the bank might become bankers of the society, I must reject the claim made before me, with costs.

Highway—Diversion—View by justices—Validity of certificate—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, ss. 85, 91.

Where justices certify that a new road will be more commodious than the one for which it is proposed to be substituted, it must unequivocally appear on the face of the certificate that they have arrived at that conclusion from their own personal inspection, and not from statements which they might have received from other parties.

An application was made to the court of quarter sessions for power to divert and turn a certain highway in the parishes of O. and S., and to substitute a new highway in lieu thereof.

The certificate of two justices required by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, did not state that the old road would become unnecessary upon the completion of the new road, but that the new road would be more commodious to the public, "because the old pathway passes at the O. end through a low part of the park, which upon inquiries we find in spring and winter is necessarily wet and uncomfortable for walking; and along the S. portion is very irregular, not only in its direction, but also by the numerous holes and uneven ground over which it passes."

The sessions were of opinion that the certificate was insufficient, and altered the appeal.

Held (upon appeal), that the order of sessions was right, as it did not appear by the certificate of the justices that the statement that the new road would be more commodious was based on their own personal inspections.

Held also, by Cockburn, C.J., that as this was merely an application to divert a highway, it was not necessary to state in the certificate that the old road would become unnecessary.

THIS was an appeal, which came on for hearing at the general quarter sessions at Ipswich, in and for the county of Suffolk, on the 5th July 1878, against an order or certificate of two justices to divert and turn a certain pathway, being a highway in the parishes of Orford and Sudbourne, Suffolk, under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

The sessions allowed the appeal, upon the ground that the justices' certificate was incomplete in not stating that the old pathway or highway is or will become unnecessary. It was now sought to set aside the order of sessions, and the following case had been stated for the opinion of the court:

1. The notices on both sides were admitted, and form part of the case.

2. The justices' certificate was as follows :

To Her Majesty's justices of the peace at their general quarter sessions, to be holden at the County Hall, in and for the county of Suffolk, on the 5th July 1878.

We, Arthur John Bethel Thellusson and Ernest St. George Cobbold, Esqs., two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the said county, do hereby certify that on the 20th March last requisitions were made to us, as two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, by Henry Brindley, the surveyor of the highways of the parish of Orford, in the county aforesaid, to view a certain pathway or highway situate in the parishes of Orford and Sudbourne aforesaid, leading from Orford aforesaid to Sudbourne and Chillesford in the said county commencing at or near to the east gate of the Sudbourne Hall Park and terminating on the east side of a certain wood, called Watling Wood, the whole of the said lands being in the occupation of Sir Richard Wallace, of Sudbourne Hall, in the said parish of Sudbourne, Baronet, M.P., and also the lands and grounds through which a new pathway or highway was intended to be made, commencing also at or near to the east gate of the said park, and proceeding thence in a westerly direction through lands in the said parishes of Orford and Sudbourne (the whole of the said lands being in the occupation of the said Sir Richard Wallace), and terminating at or near the east side of the said wood, called Watling Wood, so as to make such new pathway or highway more commodious to the public than the present pathway or highway. And we do further certify that on the 1st April last we jointly made the view required by the said surveyors, and that upon such joint view it appeared unto us that such proposed new pathway or highway would be more commodious to the public than the present pathway or highway. And the said Sir Richard Wallace, being the owner of the lands and grounds through which such new pathway or highway hereinbefore particularly described is proposed to be made, having consented thereto by writing under his hand, bearing date the 4th April last, and hereunto annexed, we directed the said Henry Brindley and John Martin as such surveyors as aforesaid to affix copies of the several notices, &c. . . . And we do further certify that a plan hath this day been delivered to us, particularly describing the said highway so proposed to be diverted and turned as aforesaid. And the said lands and grounds through which a new highway is proposed to be made as aforesaid by metes, bounds, and admeasurements thereof, verified on the oath of Benjamin Moulton, of Woodbridge aforesaid, a competent surveyor. And we do further certify that the proposed new pathway or highway leading from Orford aforesaid, to Sudbourne and Chillesford in the same county, and particularly described in the said notice as aforesaid, will be more commodious to the public than the present highway, because the old path passes at the Orford end through a low part of the park, which upon inquiries we find in spring and winter is necessarily wet and uncomfortable for walking, and along the Sudbourne portion is very irregular, not only in its direction, but also is made inconvenient by the numerous holes and uneven ground over which it passes, whereas the new path, by taking a slight curve from the Orford end, avoids the wet ground, and thence continues along the Sudbourne portion in a perfectly straight direction, and is smooth and regular and a made path, the present one being in fact simply a track, the exact direction of which is uncertain, while the new path there is clearly apparent both by night and day, the slight addition in length of but sixteen yards being fully and more than compensated for by the even and regular manner in which the new path has been made. Given under our hand this 18th May 1878.

(Signed) ARTHUR J. B. THELLUSSON.
ERNEST S. G. COBBOLD.

4. It was objected on the part of the appellant that the justices' certificate was incomplete and insufficient because it did not state that the old pathway or highway is or will become unnecessary, and, if so, why it was or would become unnecessary.

5. The sessions decided that the justices' certificate was incomplete and insufficient in not stating that the old pathway or highway is or will become unnecessary. A copy of the order of sessions, certified by the clerk of the peace, is set out in the appendix hereunto annexed.

6. It being thus the opinion of the quarter sessions that the justices' certificate was incomplete and insufficient, the sessions considered it unnecessary to hear the evidence on the question of fact, and the appeal was allowed, subject to a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

7. The appellant also contends that the said certificate is insufficient on the ground that the statement therein, that the new path will be more commodious, is based partly upon inquiries made by the justices, and it does not unequivocally appear that they acted on their own view as required by the 85th section of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

8. The appellant further contends that the certificate and plan herein do not "particularly describe the old and new highways by metes, bounds, and admeasurements thereof," as required by the 85th section of the said Act.

9. The questions for the opinion of the court are whether the certificate is complete and sufficient, and also whether the plan accompanying the said certificate is in accordance with the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4 c. 50.

10. If the court shall be of opinion that the certificate is complete and is sufficient, and that the plan is in accordance with the Act, then the judgment of the quarter sessions is to be reversed, and the matter to go back to the sessions for the purpose of having the questions of fact determined and of proceeding thereon according to law.

By 5 & 6 Will. 4 c. 50, s. 85 it is enacted that

When it shall appear upon such view of such two justices, made at the request of the surveyor as aforesaid (sect. 84), that any public highway may be diverted and turned either entirely or subject as aforesaid, so as to make the same nearer or more commodious to the public; and the owner of the land or grounds through which new highway so proposed to be made shall consent thereto by writing under his hand; or if it shall appear upon such view that any public highway is unnecessary, the said justices shall direct the surveyor to affix a notice in the form or to the effect of schedule 4, in legible characters, at the place and by the side of each end of the said highway from where the same is proposed to be turned, diverted, or stopped up . . . the notices to be published. . . . and the said several notices having been so published, and proof thereof having been given to the satisfaction of the said justices, and a plan having been delivered to them at the same time particularly describing the old and proposed new highway by metes, bounds, and admeasurements thereof, which plan shall be verified by some competent surveyor, the said justices shall proceed to certify under their hands the fact of their having viewed the said highway as aforesaid, and that the proposed new highway is nearer or more commodious to the public; and if nearer the said certificate shall state the number of yards or feet it is nearer, or if more commodious the reason why it is so, and if the highway is proposed to be stopped up as unnecessary, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, then the certificate shall state the reason why it is unnecessary.

Sects. 88 and 89 provide for an appeal to sessions. By sect. 91 :

If no such appeal be made, or being made shall be dismissed as aforesaid, then the justices at the said quarter sessions shall make an order to divert and turn and to stop up such highway either entirely, or subject as aforesaid, or to divert, turn, and stop up such old highway, and to purchase the ground and soil for such new highway, or to stop up such unnecessary highway, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, by such ways and means, and subject to such exceptions and conditions in all respects as in this Act is mentioned in regard to highways to be widened . . . but no old highway (except in the case of stopping up such useless highway as herein is mentioned) shall be stopped up until such new highway shall be completed and put into good condition and repair, and so certified by two justices of the peace upon view thereof.

Q.B. Div.] Reg. on the prosecution of A. CRILF (app.) v. SIR RICHARD WALLACE (resp.). [Q.B. Div.]

Poyser (Gully, Q.C. with him) for the appellant.—The certificate before the court contains no statement that the old road which it is proposed to stop up either is or will become unnecessary. It is true that the justices are only asked to give authority "to divert and turn," but in reality authority to stop up the old road is sought for, though the conditions precedent to such stopping up are evaded. The 85th section of the Act contemplates two things: the stopping up of an old way as unnecessary, and the diverting a way by substituting a new way for it. It is submitted that though there may be a stopping up without a diversion, there cannot be a diversion without a stopping up, and if that is so all the conditions with respect to stopping up must be complied with in the latter case, and that has not been done here. Reg. v. Phillips (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 648; 35 L. J. 217, M. C.) supports this argument. If all allusion to the old road was surplusage, the time spent in discussing that case was time wasted. As suggested in the case cited, it is not the road that is diverted, but the traffic over the road, and that can only be done by stopping up the old road either by a barrier or some order of justices. That there could not be a diversion without a stopping up is clearly contemplated by the Act. The order of justices is provided for by sect. 91, which says, "the justices at the same quarter sessions shall make an order to divert and turn and to stop up such highway either entirely or subject as aforesaid, or to divert, turn, and stop up such old highway, and to purchase ground for such new highway, or to stop up such unnecessary highway," so there can be no order for diverting without at the same time an order to stop up. (See form of order, sched. 19 of Act.) The new highway might be shorter or more commodious, and yet there might be some reason which would still make the old road necessary. There might, for instance, be a well to which it was the sole means of approach, and the certificate should show that this is not so. The authorities upon the second point are conclusive. Here the certificate states that the justices base their opinion that the new road will be more commodious upon inquiries that they have made, or at all events partly upon inquiries made by them. In Reg. v. The Marquis of Downshire (4 A. & E. 698) Lord Denman says: "We think that it does not by any fair or reasonable inference (and such only ought we to apply) follow that the motive operating upon the justices was the view only. They might, consistently with a fair and reasonable construction of the order, have been influenced by other proof. If so, the justices never obtained jurisdiction over the subject, and their order cannot be supported." Reg. v. Stephen Jones (12 A. & E. 684) is also in point, and the principle was recognised in Reg. v. Milverton (5 A. & E. 841). On both grounds therefore this certificate is bad, and the order of quarter sessions should be affirmed.

Bulwer, Q.C. (C. E. Malden with him).—The application here is merely to divert a highway and not to stop up. The distinction is clearly recognised in the sections of the Act, and a different mode of procedure is provided for in each of those cases. All we ask for here is to be allowed to go by steps. Later on it may be an application may be made to stop up the old road, but that is not so at present. The distinction between diverting or turning and stopping up was recognised in Agmundesham v. Cornwallis (Anderson's Rep. 234). It is not necessary to inquire into the precise meaning of the words diverting and turning, but they mean something distinct from stopping up, and all conditions for diverting and turning have been complied with here. As to the second point, the Act has been fully carried out. The magistrates have viewed, and upon such view in the earlier part of the certificate they say the new way will be more commodious. The statement in the later part of the certificate is mere surplusage and may be rejected. Besides even there it is stated that the old road was uneven, which was information gained from the view. Reg. v. Milverton (ubi sup.) supports my argument. Reg. v. The Marquis of Downshire and Reg. v. Stephen Jones (ubi sup.) are distinguishable, as there was no sufficient statement of a view in any part of the certificate.

Gully, Q.C. in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I regret to say that I have come to the conclusion that the order cannot be maintained, that is to say the order of the justices, and that the order by the court of quarter sessions in setting the order aside, and in refusing to proceed upon it is right. Two objections have been taken by the party resisting the order in question. The first is that it was necessary that the justices in their certificate stating that this proposed diversion should have for its effect the making of a road more commodious for the public, should have contained in addition a statement that the old road would be unnecessary, and should be stopped up, and I have been rather struck by that argument; but I think, looking at the sections in the Act of Parliament more closely, that there is no foundation for it, and for the simple reason that as soon as the proceedings have terminated for the substitution of a new road for an old one, the diversion to which the certificate of the magistrates had reference had been established, and hence the old road ceased to be a highway at all. It was divested of its character of a highway, the public were no longer entitled to use it as such, and it reverted unincumbered by any public easement or obligation to the original owner. The other objection however is a far more formidable one, and that is that it does not appear upon the certificate that the proposed substitution of a new road would be more commodious to the public as the result of the view of the magistrates themselves affecting their own judgment. I think this is necessary under the Act of Parliament. The Act of Parliament requires that the justices should view, and not only that they should view, but that they should certify under their hands the fact of their having viewed, and that the proposed new highway was shorter and more commodious than the former one. If more commodious, which was the ground upon the certificate as given here, they had to set out the reason why it was so. The reasons, I think, must be reasons resulting from the view on their own personal inspection, and not from statements which they might have received from parties possibly interested in the result. The justices in this case appear to have founded their decision not upon their own view, but upon inquiries. I do not mean to say that they must not consult, but it must appear that the view upon which they founded their decision was their own, and such a view was totally wanting in the certificate. I cannot help regretting the decision, but the order of quarter sessions must be affirmed.

MELLOR, J.—I think I have come to the conclusion on the same grounds. The term diversion must mean a change of direction in the highway, and that the portion of the highway abandoned is no longer highway. What remains is merely the property of the person who owned the land. That, however, is not a point for decision at present.

LEEDS UNION (apps.) v. TADCASTER UNION (resps.) (a) Settlement by residence—Child living apart from parent—39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34.

A pauper child, born in 1870, a bastard, was placed by her mother, when about a fortnight old, in the charge of a person, who resided with the child for eight years in the appellants' union. Afterwards the child and the person having charge of her removed to the respondents' union, and there, in about seven months, became chargeable to the poor rates. The mother's settlement and residence were not known.

Held, that the pauper's settlement by residence under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34, was in the appellants' union; and that the order of removal thereto was rightly made.

At a general quarter sessions of the peace for the said riding, holden at Wakefield, in the said riding, on the 14th Oct. 1878, before Thomas Brooke, Esq., and others, justices of the peace, an appeal in which the guardians of Leeds Union were appellants, and the guardians of Tadcaster Union were respondents, came on to be tried against an order of removal made by two justices of the said riding on the 2nd Sept. 1878 adjudging the place of the legal settlement of Beatrice Emily Wright, aged eight years, the illegitimate child of Caroline Wright, to be in the parish or township of Seacroft, in the said riding and in the said Leeds Union. At the hearing of the appeal the said court of quarter sessions confirmed the said order of the justices, subject to the following case:

1. The pauper, Beatrice Emily Wright, is the illegitimate child of Caroline Wright, and was born in the parish or township of Roundhay, in the West Riding in May 1870.

2. When the pauper was about a fortnight old she was placed by her mother in the care of John Oakes and his wife.

3. John Oakes and his wife resided at Seacroft from Dec. 1871 to Feb. 1878, and during all this time the pauper lived with them without receiving any relief, except that in Sept. 1875 the pauper was sent by John Oakes for one week (during the temporary illness of his own daughter) to the house of his son, who lived at Crossgates, in the West Riding.

4. At the time the pauper was so sent to Crossgates, both John Oakes and his wife intended to bring her back to their house at Seacroft within a period of a week or thereabouts.

5. In Feb. 1878 John Oakes and his wife with the pauper left Seacroft and went to reside in Crossgates within the respondents Union, and in Sept. 1878 the pauper became chargeable to the respondents Union.

6. No evidence was given of the settlement by birth or otherwise of Caroline Wright, the mother of the pauper, though evidence was given that the respondents had made unsuccessful enquiry about it.

7. During all the time aforesaid the parishes or townships of Seacroft and Roundhay were comprised within the appellants' union.

8. Copies of the order of justices and grounds of removal and grounds of appeal accompany and form part of this case.

9. Upon the above facts the court of quarter sessions confirmed the above order.

The question for the court of Queen's Bench Division was whether they were right in doing so.

If the answer of the court were in the affirmative, the order of sessions was to stand, otherwise it would be reversed.

Lofthouse for the respondents.—This settlement comes within the words of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34, by which it is enacted that "Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish, in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years, as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise." [Stopped by the Court.]

Poland and Lumley for the appellants.—To reside, according to the meaning of this section, must involve some personal act by the individual who thereby obtains a settlement. A child of this age is incapable of selecting a residence as a voluntary proceeding; if it were otherwise and the settlement in this case were good, the result must be frequently to separate children from their parents. Moreover, this was not a residence at Seacroft which would constitute irremovability under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66; it is rather the case of the child who was sent year after year to a charitable institution, but yet constructively resided with his mother in another parish, and was held to be irremovable when he became chargeable in the mother's parish:

Reg. v. Abingdon, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 406.

This statute of irremovability is subject to the proviso in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, "Provided always that whenever any person should have a wife or children having no other settlement than his or her own, such wife and children should be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would be removable, notwithstanding any provisions of the said recited Act (i.e. 9 & 10

STACEY (app.) v. LINTELL (resp.).

Vict. c. 66), and should not be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would not be removable by reason of any provision in the said recited Act." There was nothing here to make the mother irremovable from Seacroft, and therefore the pauper can neither be irremovable from there, nor have a settlement there :

Reg. v. Pott Shrigley, 12 Q. B. 143.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We think our judgment must be to confirm the order of removal and that of the quarter sessions. It has been ingeniously argued that the case is bound by the proviso in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, to 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, which, it is said, limits the irremovability of a child to the place where the parent is irremovable. But the proviso has nothing to do with the present case: its object was to prevent the dispersing of different members of a family. Here there is no consideration of that kind, and we have only to decide upon the applicability of sect. 34 of the Act of 1876 to the circumstances. The pauper has actually resided for three years in Seacroft, but it is contended that, because the mother lived in another parish, the child constructively re-resided with her and where she resided. It is true that where a child is under the authority and control of its parent, it may, even placed at a school in a different parish, be said to constructively reside with the parent. Here, however, the child had been entirely given up by its mother; it was not a suspension, but a virtual abandonment of the maternal right. Circumstanced as she was, she asked Oakes and his wife to take the child off her hands, and the child resided with them in another parish without any intention on the part of the mother to resume her rights. Mr. Poland has contended that under sect. 34, there must be an intention on the part of the person residing to choose a residence, but nothing of the kind is expressed in the Act. The expression is simply "shall have resided." The child must have resided somewhere, and the words and spirit of the section are satisfied by actual residence on its part. The section may sometimes produce inconvenience, but on the whole, its operation, by preventing people from being torn from a neighbourhood in which they have long been living, is likely to be beneficial. I think this is a case certainly within its application.

LOPES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

STACEY (app.) v. LINTELL (resp.). (a)

Bastardy—Married woman living with her husband—Justices' jurisdiction—35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, s. 3.

A single woman, after being delivered of a bastard child, got married, and, whilst living with her husband, applied for an affiliation summons against the putative father.

Held, upon a case stated by justices, that the 3rd section of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act 1872 does not apply to such a case, and that the justices rightly refused to make an order.

THIS was a case stated by justices, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the opinion of the court.

At a petty sessions for Chipping Wycombe an information was preferred under 35 & 36 Vict. c. 15, s. 3, by Sarah Stacey, formerly Sarah Cogdell, against Charles Lintell, charging him with being the father of her bastard child. Upon the hearing the justices dismissed the information, and stated the following case:—

1. Upon the hearing of the said information and application it was proved that the appellant at the time of the birth of the child mentioned in the said information, namely, in Jan. 1876, was a single woman, and she deposed on oath that the respondent was the father of the said child, and that his wife, within twelve months next after the birth of the said child, paid her money, which the appellant considered was intended for its maintenance. In cross-examination it was admitted by the appellant, and proved to the satisfaction of the justices, that since the birth of the said child, but previous to the filing of the said information—namely, on the 6th Feb. 1878—the appellant had intermarried with and become the wife of Edward Stacey, and was at the date of the said hearing the wife of the said Edward Stacey, and living with him as his wife.

2. It was therefore contended by Mr. Daniel Clark, the solicitor for the respondent, that the appellant was not a single woman within the meaning of sect. 3 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, and that an order to affiliate the said child could not, under the circumstances before stated, be made on her application. The following cases were referred to, namely, Res v. Luffe (8 East 193); Reg. v. Collingwood (12 Q. B. 681); Ex parte Grimes (2 E. & B 547). The solicitor for the respondent contended that those cases were distinguished, because there the woman was not living with her husband at the time the order was made; and, further, that the cases were decided on the ground that if an order could not be made the child would be unprovided for, and he pointed out that such would not be the case with regard to the child of the appellant, as by sect. 57 of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, the husband of the appellant would be liable to maintain it.

3. The said justices, in the absence of any decision as to the words "single woman" applying to a married woman living with her husband at the time of the application and hearing, dismissed the said information, as before mentioned, without going into further evidence as to the respondent being the father of the said child, or having paid monthly, as alleged in the said information, on the ground that the appellant was not entitled to prefer the said information, or to obtain an order thereon, because she was a married woman and living with her husband at the time the said information was preferred and came on for hearing.

4. The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the court was, whether an order to affiliate the child named in the said information could be made on the application of the appellant, assuming that the paternity of the child could be proved by the mother and the necessary corroborative testimony could be given, and the payment by or on behalf of the alleged father of money for the child's maintenance within twelve months of its birth and before the marriage of the appellant could be proved to the justices' satisfaction.

Graham for the appellant.—The words of this 3rd section—which are that “any single woman who may be with child, or who may be delivered of a bastard child, after the passing of this Act may either before the birth, or at any time within twelve months from the birth of such child, or at any time thereafter, upon proof that the man alleged to be the father of such child has within the twelve months next after the birth of such child paid money for its maintenance,” apply for an affiliation order—can be satisfied by reading the words “single woman” as applying only to the time of the child's birth. This interpretation is supported by the fact that the previous statute, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, contained a proviso in sect. 5 that no order for the maintenance or support of a bastard child should have any force or validity after the mother's marriage. That proviso has now no existence, the previous statute being repealed by the present one; therefore an order will now continue to have effect, notwithstanding the marriage. This being so, there is no reason why the order should not be made after the marriage. Under the earlier Bastardy Acts, before 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, marriage was held to be no objection to an order (Rees v. Luffe, 8 East, 193); so also under that Act in the case of a woman living apart from her husband (Reg. v. Collingwood, 12 Q. B. 681; and Reg. v. Pillington, 2 E. & B. 546). The case of Lang v. Spicer (1 M. & W. 129) was decided under an early statute, and was based only on the ability of the husband to maintain the child.

Crooms for the respondent.—The repeal of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, merely restores the previous law under which Lang v. Spicer was decided; it is therefore a distinct authority against any affiliation order in this case. There is a marked distinction between the other cases cited and the present, in that the married women were in both the cases, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, living apart from their husbands, and were therefore held to be single women.

Graham in reply.

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the justices was right, and that the appellant did not come within the definition of a single woman. It appears to me that the reasoning in the case of Lang v. Spicer—although this case is not actually governed by the decision there—shows us that we ought not to hold that a woman who is married at the time of her application for an order is within the contemplation of the 3rd section of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65. By her marriage her husband becomes liable to maintain her bastard child; and, if she were at liberty also to apply and obtain an order against the putative father, there would be a double liability in reference to the maintenance of the same child. The reason of the thing is thus against the argument of Mr. Graham founded upon the Acts; but I think also that we are within the strict meaning of the words in the section. I think that the intention is that the woman throughout should be a single woman, or at least that she should be so in the sense of those cases where a woman separated from her husband has been held to be a single woman for the purpose of obtaining an order of affiliation. Those cases, however, only show that for the purposes of the Poor Law Acts a married woman might come within the provision throwing the cost of the maintenance of the bastard of a single woman upon the putative father.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The policy of the law is to assist the mother in maintaining the child, and to insure that she shall not throw the cost of it upon the parish; and so the word single woman has received an interpretation which enables us to say that it does not necessarily mean “unmarried,” but may include a woman separated from her husband, who, during such separation, has had a bastard child, and who by such separation has been reduced as it were to the position of a single woman. But the woman here was living with her husband at the time of her application, and by sect. 57 of the Poor Law Act (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76) “every man who shall marry a woman having a child at the time of such marriage shall be liable to maintain such child as part of his family.” Therefore, as soon as the woman married, the child had a father, a person bound to maintain it. Now, it has been observed that in the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, there was a proviso that no order for the maintenance of a bastard child should be of any force after the marriage of the mother, and that that proviso is purposely omitted in the later Act, whence it is contended that the Legislature intended that her subsequent marriage should not invalidate the order. I, however, do not so read the Act. I think the effect is this, that the order does not now become ipso facto void upon the marriage of the woman; but, if the order has been made while she was single, it may be continued after her marriage, under the order of the justices, until the child is thirteen—that is, whether she marries or not, the order may be kept alive and in force up to that time. That is not this case. The question then is, When she applied was she in the position of a single woman? I think not; she was not therefore capable of applying, for to be within the Act she must be either single or separated from her husband.

A tollhouse had been used for the residence of a man employed to keep the road in repair ever since the tolls had ceased to be collected there, twelve years ago. The adjoining landowner applied for a mandamus to compel the road trustees to pull down the house, under 4 Geo. 4, c. 95, s. 57, in order that he might purchase the site, under 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 89.

Held, that the house, being situated within forbidden distance from the centre of the road for a dwelling—house (under 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 118), it was, under the circumstances, no longer required for the purposes of the road; and that the applicant was entitled to this remedy.

THIS was a rule for a mandamus obtained on behalf of the proprietor of land adjoining, by which the trustees of the Greenlaw Turnpike Trust were commanded to pull down a tollhouse which, it was alleged, was no longer required for the purposes of the road, and to sell or remove the materials.

The tollhouse was erected in 1851, and was used for about sixteen years afterwards for collecting tolls. In 1867 it was resolved to remove the bar, and since that time the house has been used only as a residence for a workman, employed by the trustees, to keep the road in order. The tollhouse stood by the side of the road within less than 30 ft. from the middle of the road, which is forbidden, with respect to a dwelling-house, by sect. 118 of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126.

By 4 Geo. 4, c. 95, s. 57 it was enacted

That where any tollhouse or tollhouses standing on or adjoining any turnpike road, and which shall have been erected by or vested in the trustees or commissioners of such road, shall become useless and be no longer required for the purposes of such road, it shall not be lawful for the trustees or commissioners of such road to sell or dispose of such tollhouse or tollhouses, but in every such case the trustees or commissioners of the road, on which such tollhouse or tollhouses no longer required, shall stand, shall cause such tollhouse or tollhouses, with the outhouses attached or belonging thereto, to be pulled down, and the materials thereof to be sold or removed, and the site of such tollhouse or tollhouses so pulled down, together with the gardens and appurtenances thereunto belonging may then be sold by the said trustees or commissioners, in the same manner as and under the regulations in the said recited Act and this Act contained, with respect to any land or ground not wanted for the purposes of the road.

The provision in the recited Act referred to is contained in sect. 89 of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126

That where the trustees or commissioners of any turnpike road shall have purchased, or shall be possessed of any piece or pieces of ground not wanted for the purposes of such road, it shall and may be lawful for such trustees or commissioners to sell and dispose of the same: provided always that the said trustees or commissioners, before they shall sell and dispose of any such piece or pieces of ground not wanted for the purposes of such turnpike road as aforesaid to any other person or persons of whom the same shall have been purchased, or to the person or persons whose lands shall adjoin thereto.

Candy showed cause for the trustees.—This is an appeal to the discretion of the court by a landowner for the purpose of becoming possessed of a piece of land adjoining his own. The duty of the trustees is to pull down these tollhouses only when they become useless and are no longer required for the purposes of the road. Because this tollhouse has not been used for collecting during the last twelve years, it does not follow that it may be no longer required for that purpose again. Moreover, it is a sufficient exemption from the application of the section, if the tollhouse is required for the purposes of the road. Here the house is used for the residence of the person who keeps the road in repair, which may well be included in the purposes of the road. Under the Lands Clauses Act, "superfluous land" has been held to be inapplicable to land used for other purposes of a railway than that of bearing the rails.

Bidley supported the rule.—The adjoining owner has a right of pre-emption, and this is the only means by which he can enforce his right. When used as a dwelling, the tollhouse became an obstruction within the 118th section of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, and its continued existence is forbidden by that section, and cannot therefore be a purpose of the road. As to its future use, the definition of the word "required" with respect to superfluous land was given by Bramwell, L.J. in Hooper v. Browne (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. Div. 258, 274). Land is required by a railway company where they have actually used it for laying down the rails over which the trains carrying their traffic pass and re-pass, or for erecting works necessary in conducting their business. I think also that land is required where, although it is not at the moment used by the company, it will be wanted within a definite ascertained time." It is not suggested here that the house will again be required for collecting tolls.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This rule must, I think, be made absolute. The first question is, whether the tollhouse has become useless, and is no longer required for the purposes of the road? and the decision of this question turns on what is the proper construction of the words "required for the purposes of the road?" It is quite clear that this has ceased to be useful as a tollhouse, and I do not think that the turnpike trustees have shown anything to lead us to believe that they seriously contemplate setting up a toll again at this place. As an inference of fact from their statement I do not believe there is any intention to use this again as a tollhouse. I start therefore with the assumption that this is useless as a tollhouse. Then it is said that it is still required for road purposes, because it is occupied by one of the men employed in the road. We must therefore consider whether such occupation can come within the meaning of sect. 57. In order to determine that, we were very properly referred to sect. 118 of the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, forbidding encroachments by means of dwelling-houses or other buildings being made on or at the sides of any turnpike road so as to reduce the breadth, which seems to me to make all the difference in the case. It is clear that if the trustees had erected this, not as a tollhouse but as a dwelling-house, they would have obstructed the road, and gone in direct contravention of this section. If they had done so, then the neighbouring landowner, who it must be presumed uses the road, would have a right to call upon them to pull the house down, or to proceed by information as prescribed. Turning again to sect. 57, and reading the purposes there as meaning lawful purposes, we see that the use of the house otherwise than as a tollhouse is not within it. The only other question is, whether the neighbouring proprietor is entitled to call upon the turnpike trustees by mandamus to proceed under the Act and pull down the tollhouse, and sell or remove the materials. I think that he is. He has the right to have the road unobstructed, and we may, as I before said, assume that, being a neighbouring owner, he uses the road. That being so, he has, in my opinion, a right to call on the trustees to proceed so soon as it is established that the tollhouse has become useless.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. For some little time I hesitated as to whether this might not still be said to be required for the purposes of the road, but I am satisfied now that it has become useless within the meaning of the section. The object of that section is to deal with toll-houses, and their removal when useless for toll purposes. Furthermore, it is clear, in view of the other sections about the erection of houses, that the trustees would have no right to erect any such house except for a tollhouse, and it is only as such that it can be continued. Otherwise it is a nuisance and obstruction on the road; and sect. 57 is express that the land shall not be sold with the obstruction on it. The rule for a mandamus must therefore be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE HEREFORD UNION (apps.) v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE WARWICK UNION (resps.). (a)

Poor Law—Settlement—Child under sixteen—Poor Law Amendment Act 1870 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.

A pauper was born in the H. Union in 1840, but had never acquired a settlement in her own right. Her father was born in the L. Union, but had acquired no settlement except his birth settlement.

Held, that, under these circumstances, the pauper was not settled in the H. Union, but must be deemed to have derived her father's birth settlement.

THIS was an appeal against an order of two justices for Warwick, adjudicating the settlement of Emma Jones, a lunatic, to be in the Hereford Union.

The appeal was tried at the quarter sessions of Warwickshire holden at Warwick on the 3rd July 1878, when the said order of adjudication was confirmed, subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division upon the following

CASE.

It was proved or admitted that the said pauper lunatic, Emma Jones, was born in the parish of St. John, Hereford, in the month of April, in the year 1840, and was the lawful daughter of James and Ann Jones.

James Jones, the father, was born at Leominster in or about the year 1798, and acquired a settlement there by birth, but never acquired any settlement elsewhere.

The said lunatic, Emma Jones, was never married, and had never done anything to acquire a settlement in her own right.

The said Emma Jones was adjudged a lunatic by an order of one of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Warwick, dated May 12, 1878, and was received as a patient in the county lunatic asylum at Hatton.

An order was made by two justices of the peace for the county of Warwick, adjudging the parish of St. John, Hereford, in the Hereford Poor Law Union, to be the place of the last legal settlement of the said Emma Jones, and ordering the guardians of the poor of the said Hereford Union to contribute to her support in the said Hatton asylum.

(a) Reported by A. H. POTTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This order was confirmed by the justices in quarter sessions, they being of opinion that the derivative settlement of Emma Jones from her father ceased on her attaining the age of sixteen years before the passing of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 35.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether such order was rightly confirmed.

By 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, sect. 35:

No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another.

An illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child shall acquire another settlement.

If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born.

Lumley Smith for the respondents.—The only settlement that it is alleged the father had was a birth settlement. He may have been entitled to a derivative settlement, and that being so, no inquiry can be made into such derivative settlement. The child must therefore take her own birth settlement under the 3rd clause of sect. 35 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61:

Guardians of Westbury-on-Severn v. Overseers of Barrow-in-Furness, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 315; L. Rep. 3 Ex. Div. 88.

FIELD, J.—I am of opinion that the case comes within the decision of the Exchequer Division in The Guardians of Westbury-on-Severn v. The Overseers of Barrow-in-Furness, and we are bound to follow that decision. The question we have to determine arises in this way. The pauper in question was born in the Hereford Union in 1840, and never acquired any other settlement, and at the time the Poor Law Amendment Act passed in 1876, she was long past the age of sixteen. There might have been some difficulty in arriving at the settlement of the pauper under these circumstances, had it not been that in the case to which I have before referred, the Exchequer Division has come to the conclusion that sect. 35 of that Act and the proviso therein are retrospective. It follows, therefore, that the pauper in question was a child under sixteen within the meaning of this Act, and up to that age took her father's settlement, which she was to retain until she acquired some other settlement—but she never did acquire another settlement, and therefore she still takes her father's settlement. Mr. Lumley Smith contends that this case comes under the third branch of the 35th section. He says it would be unsafe to assume that the father was actually settled at the place of his birth until the grandfather's settlement has been inquired into, and when once it becomes necessary to inquire into the grandfather's settlement the court should hold it in his hand, and he relied upon The Guardians of Woodstock Union v. The Churchwardens of St. Pancras (ubi sup.); but, if that contention is right, you would exclude from the benefit of this section all birth settlements, if it is necessary to go back and inquire into the settlement of all ancestors. This section was clearly intended to exclude birth settlements, so that children under sixteen might be as far as possible settled with their parents. I am of opinion, therefore, that the decision of quarter sessions was wrong and must be quashed.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case is clearly within the decision of The Guardians of Westbury-on-Severn v. The Overseers of Barrow-in-Furness.

NIGOTTI v. COLVILLE. (a)

False imprisonment—Time, mode of computation—Calendar month—Expiration of term of imprisonment.

The plaintiff, who had been sentenced by a police magistrate on the 31st Oct. to two different terms of imprisonment on two convictions, the first for "one calendar month," the second "for fourteen days, to commence at the expiration of the imprisonment previously adjudged," sued the defendant, the governor of Coldbath Fields Prison, for false imprisonment. The plaintiff was received into the defendant's custody on the 31st Oct., and finally released on the 14th Dec. at 9 a.m.

Held, that the facts disclosed no cause of action, the term of imprisonment not strictly expiring until midnight on the 14th Dec.

"One calendar month," in a sentence of imprisonment, means a period expiring on that day in the succeeding month which corresponds numerically with the day on which the sentence is pronounced.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

The plaintiff, who sued the governor of Coldbath Fields Prison for false imprisonment, had been sentenced on the 31st Oct. to two successive terms of imprisonment, one calendar month and fourteen days respectively.

The defendant received the plaintiff into his custody on the afternoon of the same day, and finally discharged him at 9 a.m. on the 14th Dec.

The jury having provisionally assessed the damages at 20s., the case was adjourned for further argument.

Kydd and Barnard, for the plaintiff, argued that the first period of one calendar month's imprisonment must be regarded as having commenced at midnight on the 30th Oct., the plaintiff having been in custody during part of the 31st, and a part of a day being in law equivalent to a whole day for such a purpose. This being so, the month would expire at midnight on 29th Nov., that completing thirty entire days. If the term were reckoned to midnight on 30th Nov., the plaintiff would have been detained in prison during the whole of November (which would be one 'calendar month'), and, in addition, one day in October, under a sentence for one month. Fourteen days from midnight on 29th Nov. would expire at midnight on 13th Dec., so that there was an illegal detention.

A. L. Smith, for the defendant, contended that the first sentence of one calendar month did not expire until midnight on the 30th Nov. at the earliest.

Our. adv. vult.

DENMAN, J. subsequently delivered the following written judgment.—This was an action for false imprisonment by detaining the plaintiff in custody for a longer period than, as he contended, he was liable to be detained. The facts were not in dispute. I took the opinion of the jury as to the damages, which were assessed at 20s. After hearing counsel, I took time to consider whether judgment ought to be for the plaintiff or for the defendant. The plaintiff had been convicted by a metropolitan police magistrate of two different assaults, and sentenced to imprisonment upon each conviction. The convictions took place at 11 a.m. on the 31st Oct., and the commitments were drawn up in accordance with the sentences passed. For the first assault the plaintiff was sentenced to be imprisoned "for one calendar month;" and, for the second assault, "for fourteen days, to commence at the expiration of the imprisonment previously adjudged." He was taken into the custody of the defendant, being the governor of Coldbath Fields Prison, during the afternoon of the 31st Oct., and finally released at 9 a.m. on the 14th Dec., having claimed to be released on the previous day. It was contended for the plaintiff that the calendar month (the term of the first sentence) commenced at midnight on the 30th Oct. So far I am of opinion that the plaintiff's contention was well founded. I can find no express authority on the point, but, arguing from analogous cases, I think I ought so to hold. It has been held in many cases that, as a general rule, except where it is necessary in order to settle which of two actions on the same day is to prevail, the law takes no notice of parts of a day, and that the first day to be counted is the day, any part of which is occupied in the particular business which is to endure for a certain number of days in order to fulfil any requirement of the law. This principle is recognised in the often-cited case of Combe v. Pitt (3 Burr. 1434); in Field v. Jones (9 East. 154); in Glassington v. Rawlings (3 East. 407), where it was held that, under the statute which enacted that a trader lying in prison two months after an arrest for debt should be adjudged a bankrupt, the day of arrest was to be included in the computation of the two months; and also in Wright v. Mills (4 H. & N. 488) and other cases; and this is stated to be the rule applicable "to all judicial acts" in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Edwards v. The Queen (9 Exch. 628). There are no doubt several cases in which, where the date is to run from an act done, it has been held that the day on which the act is done is to be excluded from the computation. See Lester v. Garland (15 Ves. jun. 254). There are also cases in which, where a payment is to be made or something to be done "within so many days or months," or "at the expiration of so many days or months," the day of the event within or at the expiration of so many days from which the payment is to be made, or the act done,

(a) Reported by J. A. Fooks, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C.P. Div.]

WYNNE v. FORESTER.

is not included in the reckoning. The case of a bill of exchange is a familiar instance. But I can find no authority for saying that the general rule ought not to apply to the case of a sentence of imprisonment. Nor can I see any ground for doubting that it applies to the case, where the sentence is for a calendar month, or a given number of calendar months, just as much as to a sentence for so many days. Holding, then, that the first sentence in the present case must be computed from midnight on the 30th Oct., when did the calendar month expire? The plaintiff contends that it expired at midnight on the 29th Nov. at the latest; and he does so on the ground that, if not, the plaintiff under a sentence of one calendar month's imprisonment would have to undergo something more than a calendar month's imprisonment, inasmuch as he would be imprisoned for the whole of one day in October (i.e., from midnight on the 30th to midnight on the 31st Oct.), plus twenty-nine days and something more (say, even a whole calendar month more) in November, making in the whole more than thirty days; whereas November, which is a calendar month, only consists of thirty days. Therefore, it is argued, it follows of necessity that he will have suffered more than a calendar month's imprisonment, and in this particular case he will have actually been imprisoned during the whole calendar month of November, plus one day in October. It appears to me that this argument, however plausible, is not sound. The question appears to me to depend entirely upon what was the meaning of "one calendar month" at the time the sentence was passed; and I am of opinion that at that time, viz., on 31st Oct., those words meant a month ending on the day in the succeeding month corresponding to the day of the sentence, according to the ordinary understanding of the words "this day calendar month." The whole difficulty of the case here arises from the fact of October having thirty-one days, and November only thirty; but I think that a few considerations will show how that difficulty ought to be solved. Suppose instead of the 31st Oct. this sentence had been passed on the 26th. Then, applying the rule mentioned above as to the commencement of the term, the prisoner would be entitled to count the whole of the 26th as a day of imprisonment, i.e., the sentence would have begun to run from midnight on the 25th. I apprehend that no one would contend that it would have expired before midnight on the 25th Nov. Why? because that would be the expiration of the "calendar month." Yet in that case, as in this, the calendar month spent in prison would have been one of thirty-one days and not of thirty days. This seems to show that the meaning of "one calendar month" cannot be construed with reference only to the duration of the latter of the two months over which it may extend. If it did, then a sentence of one calendar month passed on the 29th Jan. would expire not on the 28th Feb., but at midnight on the 25th, because, February being a calendar month of twenty-eight days, the prisoner would have in that sense spent a calendar month in prison. In the case of bills of exchange, in which the word month is held to mean "calendar month," it is laid down by all the text writers that bills of one month drawn on the 28th, 29th, 30th, or 31st Jan. will fall due (excluding the days of grace) all on the same day, viz., 28th Feb., or in Leap Year on the 29th. See Byles on Bills, 12th edit., p. 206; Chitty on Bills, 11th edit., by J. A. Russell, p. 264 (and the older books there cited in the note); Story on Bills, 1st edit. s. 335, note 1. Yet those drawn on the 28th and 29th would, according to the mode of reckoning here contended for by the plaintiff, have been running one or two days more than the whole of February, and therefore more than a calendar month. It is no doubt true that the law applicable to bills of exchange depends upon the usage of merchants, and is not necessarily applicable to other cases; but where the question is, what is the true meaning of so familiar an expression as "one calendar month," it is useful to consider how such an expression is regarded in any case in which it is constantly used in familiar legal instruments. On the whole I am of opinion that a sentence of imprisonment for one calendar month passed on any given day of any given month, is held to begin to run from the first moment of that day, and to expire upon arriving at the first moment of the corresponding day in the succeeding month. If there be no such corresponding day by reason of the succeeding month not having so many days as the preceding month, then, by analogy to the law established in the case of bills of exchange, I think the calendar month should be held to have expired at the last moment of its last day; but as long as there is a day in the calendar numerically corresponding with the day from which the sentence begins to run, so that it is unnecessary to trench upon a succeeding month, I see no ground for anticipating the expiration of the sentence. This being so, it follows that the plaintiff was not strictly entitled to his discharge until midnight on the 14th Dec., being one calendar month and fourteen days from the time from which his first sentence began to run, and fourteen days from its expiration. I am of opinion, for these reasons, that the plaintiff, who was discharged at nine o'clock in the morning of the 14th Dec., was not detained illegally, and I accordingly give judgment for the defendant with costs.

WYNNE v. FORESTER. (a)

Mines—Agent—Certified manager—Conviction—Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), sect. 51.

By sect. 51 of the Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), it is enacted (sub-sect. (1) that an adequate amount of ventilation for certain defined purposes shall be constantly produced in every mine; and by sub-sect. (31), that, in the event of any contravention of or non-compliance with any of the preceding rules being proved in the case of any mine to which this Act applies, the owner, agent, and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against the Act, unless he proves certain exculpatory facts.

Held, that the conviction and fine of the certified manager of a mine for a breach of the regulation contained in sub-sect. (1) did not prevent the respondent, who was the agent of the mine, from being also convicted in respect of the same breach.

(a) Reported by J. A. FOOTE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The following case (omitting formal parts) was stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Stock-upon-Trent for the opinion of the court.

CASE.

4. The statute under which the appellant instituted proceedings is the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), s. 51, which enacts that

The following general rules shall be observed so far as is reasonably practicable in every mine to which this Act applies:

(1.) An adequate amount of ventilation shall be constantly produced in every mine, to dilute and render harmless noxious gases to such an extent that the working places of the shafts, levels, stables, and workings of such mine, and the travelling roads to and from such working places, shall be in a fit state for working and passing therein.

(31.) Every person who contravenes or does not comply with any of the general rules in this section shall be guilty of an offence against this Act; and in the event of any contravention or of a non-compliance with any of the said general rules in the case of any mine to which this Act applies, by any person whomsoever, being proved, the owner, agent, and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing, and to the best of his power enforcing, the said rules or regulations for the working of the mine, to prevent such contravention or non-compliance.

5. Every person who is guilty of an offence against the Act is by sect. 60 made liable to a penalty not exceeding (if he is an owner, agent, or manager) 20*l*.

6. The said mine is a mine to which the said Act applies.

7. The respondent is the agent of the said mine.

8. One George Hollins was at the date of the said proceedings duly appointed manager of the said mine, and he holds a certificate under the said Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872.

9. On the 12th Oct. 1878, Mr. S. B. Gilroy, the assistant-inspector of mines for the district, visited the said colliery and found that the ventilation of the said mine was defective and inadequate, the defect having been caused by a fall in the roof of the said mine, and he thereupon gave directions to the said Martin Forester (the respondent), who accompanied the said assistant-inspector in the absence of the manager, to have the same remedied.

10. On the 1st Nov. the said S. B. Gilroy, as such assistant-inspector, examined the said mine again, and still found the ventilation defective and inadequate for the safe working of the mine, and that nothing had been done for the purpose of removing the said fall or improving the ventilation, and thereupon the said appellant instituted proceedings both against the said Martin Forester (the respondent) and the said George Hollins the certificated manager for such offence.

11. It was proved by the evidence that the said George Hollins was a duly certified manager of the said mine, and that the said mine was worked under his directions. It was also proved that the said respondent was the agent of the said mine, and that occasionally in the temporary absence of the said George Hollins, which was about two days per week, he gave certain directions for the management of the said mine.

12. I thereupon convicted the said George Hollins as the certified manager of the said mine, who in my judgment was responsible for the said offence, and fined him the sum of 15*l*. and costs for the said offence, which the said George Hollins duly paid, and I dismissed the summons as against the said respondent.

13. It was contended, on the part of the appellant, that upon the above facts being proved, I was bound under the provisions of sect. 51 of the said Act to convict the respondent as the agent of the said mine, as well as George Hollins, the certificated manager; but I held that, as the said George Hollins had already been fined for the offence, I had no right to convict the respondent as such agent as aforesaid for the same offence. I was of opinion that, though the assistant-inspector on his first visit gave directions to the respondent to remedy the defect, the promise given by him was simply a promise that he would mention the matter to the manager, the person made responsible by the statute, for by sect. 26 it is expressly declared that every mine to which the Act applies should be under the control and daily supervision of a manager, and that no mine should be worked for more than fourteen days without there being such a manager. The intention of this enactment is, in my opinion, that there shall be some person attached to such mine thoroughly conversant with mining operations, and who shall be deemed responsible for the proper and safe working of the mine; and that, if that be not so, but that the owner or agent who may know little or nothing of the subject is to share the responsibility with the manager, there would be a divided authority which might lead to very serious results, because the two parties may differ in opinion as to any remedies or alteration to be adopted; and if so, whose influence is to prevail if both are responsible? By adhering to what I believe to be the clear intention of the statute, that is, of making the manager alone responsible, the difficulty and danger is overcome. Some stress was put upon the fact that the manager was generally absent two days a week. Be it even so; that did not relieve him from his responsibility as manager, or throw it upon the respondent. It would be the duty of the manager in his unavoidable absence to leave some equally efficient person in charge. On these grounds I dismissed the summons against the respondent.

If the court shall be of opinion that my view of the law is right, the summons will stand dismissed; but if they should be of a contrary opinion, the case is to be remitted to me with their opinion, in order that I may hear the case upon the evidence.

Gorst, Q.C. (M. Mackenzie with him) for the Crown.—The stipendiary magistrate seems to have thought that a mens rea must be shown; but this is one of those cases such as are not uncommon in recent legislation, in which certain persons are presumed by the law to be guilty of a certain offence, upon certain facts appearing, unless they prove the contrary. The section of the Act in question (sect. 15) applies to all the three persons mentioned in it, and they are all three liable.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to succeed. There is no doubt great force in the observations of the stipendiary magistrate, which would have been very well addressed to Parliament against the passing of this Act, or this clause in it. But I do not know whether I may not say that I believe such observations and similar arguments were addressed to Parliament in vain, and yet the Act was passed with this clause in it. I have no doubt that by this section it was intended to compel the persons at the head of these great mining establishments to give their personal attention to these matters, and to render them personally responsible if these rules were neglected. The section expressly exempts them from liability if they can show that they have done their best to carry these regulations into effect, by doing all that a man can reasonably be expected to do to discharge themselves from this liability. The Act seems to me to be a wise and salutary one, and the language of the sections referred to is quite clear. Our judgment must be for the appellant.

JINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The language of sects. 51 and 52 at first sight might suggest that there might be found in the Act some sections pointing to a separate sphere of duties which it would be incumbent on the several persons mentioned to discharge; but there are in fact no such sections; and this clause plainly enacts that in the event of a breach of these regulations by anybody, the three persons mentioned shall be held to be guilty of an offence, unless they show that they have done their best to avoid the event. It appears to me therefore that, notwithstanding the prima facie good sense of the observations of the stipendiary magistrate, the language of the Act is too strong to be got over, and that the scheme of the Act is somewhat different from what he has supposed.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Locomotive—Highway—To be in charge of three persons—One in charge of horse and cart also—28 & 29 Vict. c. 83, s. 3—41 & 42 Vict. c. 77, s. 29.

A steam locomotive, while in motion on a highway, is to be in charge of three persons, one of whom, by 41 & 42 Vict. c. 77, s. 29, shall precede the locomotive on foot, and "shall in case of need assist horses and carriages drawn by horses passing the same."

Held, that the fact that the man preceding the engine was leading a horse and cart of his own was not sufficient to support a conviction for a breach of the above provision.

SPECIAL CASE stated, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the justices for the parts of Kesteven, in Lincolnshire.

At a petty sessions held at Bourne, in and for the said parts, on the 10th Oct. 1878, the said justices heard and determined a complaint by the respondent preferred against the appellant, that the appellant on the 25th Sept. 1878, at the parish of Careby, in the said parts, then being the driver of a certain locomotive engine on a highway there situate, unlawfully had not any person preceding such engine by at least twenty yards on foot, contrary to the statute.

It was proved before the said justices by the evidence of a police constable, as follows:

That on the 25th Sept. 1878 a locomotive engine was seen by him travelling in the day time upon a public highway, in the parish of Careby aforesaid, and that the appellant was the driver of such engine, and that another man was with and assisting him upon the engine.

That at about sixty yards preceding such engine was a third man, on foot, leading a pony, which was drawing an empty light cart, and upon such cart was a red and white pocket handkerchief, by way of a flag, attached to a pole fastened to the said cart.

That the appellant, on being asked by the policeman if the said last-mentioned man was his signalman, replied in the affirmative, and thereupon the policeman said that such man had no right to be in charge of a horse and cart. The appellant then added that they had come some distance to fetch the engine, and had brought the cart to ride in, and that if any accident occurred they would pay for it. The policeman said that there should be a flag and a person on foot not leading a horse and cart.

It was not proved in evidence before the said justices, or suggested, that any case arose in which horses and carriages drawn by horses passing the said engine needed assistance.

At the close of the case for the complainant the defendant's solicitor submitted that no offence had been proved against the appellant, and contended that the appellant had only been shown to be the driver, and not the owner of the locomotive, and that, in the absence of proof of his being the owner, he was not liable to be convicted under the 3rd section of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 83. It was further contended that there was (as the fact was) a person preceding the locomotive on foot by at least twenty yards, for the purpose of warning the riders and drivers of horses, and that if occasion for assistance such as that contemplated by the last-mentioned section had arisen, such person would, and that the justices were bound to assume that he would, have rendered the necessary assistance, and if he had done so no offence under the Act would have been committed. That, had a case of need occurred, and proper assistance not have been given by such man, then and then only, under the circumstances, would an offence have been committed. That the fact of a man leading a horse did not cause him the less to be a person complying with the said 29th section of the Act 41 & 42 Vict. c. 77.

It appeared to the justices that a person necessarily engaged in attending to his own horse and cart was certainly unable to comply with the said 29th section of 41 & 42 Vict. c. 77, since he could not render the assistance mentioned in this section of the Act without himself committing a breach of the law, by leaving his own horse and cart on the highway beyond his control; and the said justices were of opinion that it could not be said that three persons were employed "to drive or conduct the locomotive" whilst one of them was engaged in leading a horse attached to a cart. They therefore convicted the appellant of the offence with which he was charged, and sentenced him to pay a fine of 5s. and 11s. 6d. costs.

The question of law is, whether or not, upon the evidence above stated, the said justices were justified in so convicting and fining the appellant.

28 & 29 Vict. c. 83, s. 3, is as follows:

Every locomotive propelled by steam or any other than animal power on any turnpike road or public highway shall be worked according to the following rules and regulations, viz.:

First, at least three persons shall be employed to drive or conduct such locomotive, and if more than two waggons or carriages be attached thereto an additional person shall be employed, who shall take charge of such waggons or carriages.

Secondly, one of such persons, while any locomotive is in motion, shall precede such locomotive on foot by not less than sixty yards, and shall carry a red flag constantly displayed, and shall warn the riders and drivers of horses of the approach of such locomotives, and shall signal the driver thereof when it shall be necessary to stop, and shall assist horses, and carriages drawn by horses, passing the same. . . . In the event of a non-compliance with any of the provisions of this section, the owner of the locomotive shall, on summary conviction thereof before two justices, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 10l.; but it shall be lawful for such owner, on proving that he has incurred such penalty by reason of the negligence or wilful default of any person in charge or in attendance on such locomotive, to recover summarily from such person the whole or any part of the penalty he may have incurred as owner.

Sect. 7 is as follows:

The name and residence of the owner of every locomotive shall be affixed thereto in a conspicuous manner. If it is not so affixed the owner shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 2l.

41 & 42 Vict. c. 77, s. 29, is as follows:

The paragraph numbered "secondly" of sect. 3 of the Locomotive Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 83) is hereby repealed so far as relates to England, and in lieu thereof the following paragraph is hereby substituted, namely, "Secondly, one of such persons, while the locomotive is in motion, shall precede by at least twenty yards the locomotive on foot, and shall in case of need assist horses, and carriages drawn by horses, passing the same."

Graham for the appellant.—The conviction is wrong on two grounds. First, the only person who can be convicted under the Act is the owner of the locomotive, and the appellant has been convicted as the driver. There was no evidence before the magistrates that he was the owner. Secondly, there is no reason why the man on foot in front of the locomotive should not be quite as well able to give the assistance required by the Act when he has a pony with him as he would be without it. It does not appear that the pony was not properly under his control, even when not held by him, so that in case of need he could have safely left the pony on the road, or have taken it back to the locomotive and fastened it to the engine, or left it in charge of the appellant and the other man there while he went and assisted any other horse or carriage in passing the locomotive. The case of Morris v. Jeffries (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 261) is an instance of horses, while grazing on the side of a turnpike road four or five yards from the person in charge of them, being deemed to be under the control of such person, and therefore not liable to be impounded under 4 Geo. 4, c. 95, s. 75, as being horses found "wandering, straying, or lying about" the road, within the meaning of that enactment. That the man in front was leading a horse and cart does not prevent him, therefore, from being a person preceding the locomotive on foot, as required by the statute.

No one appeared for the respondent.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I think this conviction cannot be sustained. The statute says that one person shall precede the locomotive on foot, and shall in case of need assist horses and carriages passing. The magistrates thought that the man in front here was in such a position that he could not assist passing horses lawfully. I think that cannot be. It seems to me impossible to say that he could not assist passing horses. It is said that he could not, because he could not without leaving his own horse and cart unattended. But I do not think that follows. Indeed, it is obvious that he need not leave his own horse and cart unattended; as Mr. Graham suggests, he might ask a passer-by to mind them, or lead them back to the engine driver, or tie the horse to the fence, or in many other ways keep it under control. The conviction therefore must be quashed on the merits.

LOPES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

STANANOUGHT (app.) v. HAZELDINE (resp.). (a)

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Municipal election—Ballot Act—Offence under—Criminal information—Bad for duplicity—Officer at polling station—Secrecy of voting—Leaving about the means of information—Not "communicating to any person any information"—35 & 36 Vict. c. 33, s. 4.

The 4th section of the Ballot Act 1872 provides that "every officer, clerk, and agent in attendance at a polling station shall maintain and aid in maintaining the secrecy of the voting in such station, and shall not communicate, except for some purpose authorised by law, before the poll is closed, to any person any information as to the name or number on the register of voters of any elector who has or has not applied for a ballot paper or voted at that station," &c.

Held, that, in order to prove a breach of this provision, it was not sufficient to show that an officer in attendance at a polling station had given to some persons the opportunity of obtaining information as to the names of electors who had applied for ballot papers by leaving the burgess roll on which he had marked off such names among them, unless it was also shown that they, or some of them, had availed themselves of that opportunity.

SPECIAL CASE stated by the police magistrate of the borough of Liverpool, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

On the 6th Nov. 1878 the appellant laid an information before the said magistrate against the respondent, of which the following is a copy:

Borough of Liverpool to wit.

Be it remembered, that on the 6th day of Nov., in the year of our Lord 1878, at Liverpool, in the borough aforesaid, in the county of Lancaster, Joseph Stananought, at Liverpool aforesaid, cometh before me, the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said borough of Liverpool, and informeth me, the said justice, that Francis Hazeldine, on the 1st day of Nov. inst., at the borough of Liverpool aforesaid, being a personating agent duly appointed and in attendance at a certain polling station in connection with the municipal election for a town councillor for St. Anne-street Ward, in the said borough, did not then and there maintain and aid in maintaining the secrecy of the voting in such station, but did then and there communicate, without it being for some purpose authorised by law, before the poll was closed, to a certain person or persons, certain information as to the names and numbers on the register of voters of certain electors who had and had not applied for ballot papers or voted at that station, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

On the 19th Nov. 1878 the said information came on to be heard before the said magistrate, when both parties appeared before him.

The complaint arose under the Ballot Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), the 4th section of which enacts as follows :

Every officer, clerk, and agent in attendance at a polling station shall maintain and aid in maintaining the secrecy of the voting in such station, and shall not communicate, except for some purpose authorised by law, before the poll is closed, to any person any information as to the name or number on the register of voters of any elector who has or has not applied for a ballot paper or voted at that station, or as to the official mark ; and no such officer, clerk, or agent, and no person whosever shall interfere with, or attempt to interfere, with a voter when marking his vote, or otherwise attempt to obtain in the polling station information as to the candidate for whom any voter in such station is about to vote or has voted, or communicate at any time to any person any information obtained in a polling station as to the candidate for whom any voter in such station is about to vote or has voted, or as to the number on the back of the ballot paper given to any voter at such station. Every officer, clerk, and agent in attendance at the counting of the votes shall maintain and aid in maintaining the secrecy of the voting, and shall not attempt to ascertain at such counting the number on the back of any ballot paper, or communicate any information obtained at such counting as to the candidate for whom any vote is given in any particular ballot paper. No person shall directly or indirectly induce any voter to display his ballot paper after he shall have marked the same so as to make known to any person the name of the candidate for or against whom he has so marked his vote. Every person who acts in contravention of the provisions of this section shall be liable, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour.

On the hearing of the information it was proved that on the 1st Nov. 1878 there was an election for a councillor for the St. Anne-street Ward, in the said borough, the vacancy being caused by Mr. Ronald M'Dougall's term of office having, pursuant to the Municipal Corporation Act 1835, expired by effluxion of time on that day.

The candidates at such election were the said Ronald M'Dougall and Thomas Hayes Sheen.

Pursuant to the 85th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, personating agents were appointed by each candidate, and amongst these the respondent was appointed personating agent for Mr. Thomas Hayes Sheen, and notice of his appointment was duly given to the returning officer.

The respondent made the declaration of secrecy required by rule 54 in the first schedule to the Ballot Act 1872, except that sect. 4 of this Act was not read over to him by the justice who took his declaration, which the note to the form of such declaration in the second schedule to the Act states must be done.

The appellant was duly appointed and declared to act as presiding officer at the polling station in which the respondent acted as personating agent.

The appellant deposed that he acted as presiding officer on the occasion, that he saw the respondent with a part of the burgess roll in his hand, and that he (the respondent) put a tick opposite the name of every voter when he obtained a ballot paper. Between two and three o'clock in the afternoon he noticed that the respondent had left the booth without his (the appellant's) permission. He also noticed that the respondent's part of the burgess roll was not upon the table where he had placed it on one or two occasions on which he had left his seat in the polling station. The respondent returned in about a quarter of an hour after the appellant had missed him. On being asked by Mr. Stananough where his part of the burgess roll was, he replied that he was not going to work for nothing, and as his committee had not supplied him with any refreshment he had given up his part of the burgess roll to them. The appellant told him he had done very wrong, and had committed an offence under the Ballot Act. The appellant also told him he could not remain in the booth, and he left. The respondent had been in attendance at the polling station from nine o'clock in the morning until the time he left the station as aforesaid, and had not been supplied with any refreshment during that time. The fact that the respondent left the part of the burgess roll in the committee room of the candidate by whom he was employed was admitted by his solicitor. The matters mentioned in this paragraph took place before the close of the poll.

On the part of the respondent it was contended, first, that the information contained two offences, and was therefore bad under the 10th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, which provides that every information shall be for one offence only, and not for two or more offences. This objection the magistrate overruled, on the ground that there was really only one offence charged, namely, that of communicating before the poll was closed to some person information as to the names or numbers on the register of voters of certain electors who had or had not applied for ballot papers. The respondent's solicitor then contended that the appellant had no authority or power to lay the information, contending that his powers were limited to matters arising within the polling station, and that the information should have been laid by the alderman of the ward. The magistrate overruled this objection, as the Ballot Act does not contain any directions as to the persons by whom the information for the offences under it should be laid.

The respondent's solicitor then contended as follows : "The question is whether any offence has been committed under the 4th section. The object of this section is to prevent other persons becoming acquainted with the proceedings in a polling station. Now, what does this man do? According to the evidence all he does is this : he takes a book (it has not been produced to us) out of a polling station, and leaves it at a committee room. That is not communicating to persons information. To communicate information he must impart it to some person capable of understanding it. If he had whispered into the ear of a deaf man something that had taken place, that would not have been a communication. There must be a communication from one man's mind to another man's mind, so that the man may comprehend what has been done. There was no communication made by the defendant to any other person, as required by the Act of Parliament, to constitute an offence." The respondent's solicitor denied that the book referred to had been looked into, or any information obtained therefrom by any person, but called no witness upon this or any other point.

REG. v. OWEN HUGHES.

The respondent's solicitor also contended that, as the magistrate did not read over the 4th section of the Ballot Act to the respondent at the time that he made the declaration of secrecy, the appointment of the respondent was informal, and he could not be convicted. The magistrate was of opinion that, upon the facts proved before him, the respondent had violated the 4th section of the Ballot Act, but he considered this last objection fatal, and he dismissed the information.

The following questions of law are submitted to the court:

1. Whether the information was bad for containing two offences?

2. Whether the information should have been laid by the alderman of the ward instead of by the appellant?

3. Whether it was necessary to prove that the respondent communicated information as to the persons who had or had not applied for ballot papers to some individual person or persons? And

4. Whether it was necessary, in order that a conviction should take place under the Act, that the declaration of secrecy should be read over to the personating agent by the magistrate?

R. T. Wright for the appellant.—As to the first point, there is only one offence in the information, viz., that of communicating information contrary to the Ballot Act. The 10th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 (Jervis's Act), does not apply where more than one act is charged, but constituting in substance only one offence:

Reg. v. Scott, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 662;

Onley v. Gee, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338.

As to the second point, this is an offence against public policy, and the information may be laid by anyone:

Cole v. Coulton, 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 216.

As to the third point, the respondent having placed the means of information within the reach of other persons, and having given no evidence to show that they did not avail themselves of it, it was open to the magistrate to find, as he has, that the respondent did communicate information contrary to the Act. If there was any evidence to support that finding, it must stand. As to the fourth point [he was stopped by the Court].

Fullarton, for the respondent, was not called on to argue.

BRANWELL, L.J.—It is unnecessary for us to hear any argument on the fourth question in the case, as we think that our answer to the third question must be in favour of the respondent. As at present advised, I am inclined to think that a double offence is stated in the information, but, as I am not clear on this point, I state it with some reserve. It seems to me that the 4th section of the Ballot Act 1872 refers to the actual voting. If it does, then maintaining the secrecy of the voting is different from not communicating any information as to the names or numbers of those who have applied for ballot papers, or voted, and therefore I am not sure that the information in this case does not allege a double offence. But it is not necessary to determine this, for, granted that it does not do so, there is the third question, viz., whether the respondent had communicated information to anyone contrary to the provisions of the 4th section, and I do not think he had done so. It is not enough, in my opinion, to give the means of knowing, for I do not think there is any communication until it has reached the mind of the person communicated with. It would, I think, have been sufficient for a conviction to have shown that after the book had been taken into the committee room several of the persons there had looked into it, without specifying who in particular had done so. But, in default of the proof to the contrary, it might well be presumed that the members of the committee acted as right-minded men would have done, namely, shut up the book, and refused to look at it. Therefore, there was no evidence to show that the respondent had communicated the information contained in the book to anyone, and, in my opinion, it was not a case on which the magistrate ought to have convicted. Then ought we to send the case back to the magistrate to re-state it? I think not, for I think it was not intended to ask us whether it was necessary to identify any particular individual to whom the communication had been made, but that what the magistrate meant was to raise the question whether it must be shown that the intelligence had reached the mind of the person communicated with; and therefore, if the case were sent back, there would not be any substantial alteration made in it, and consequently it would be useless to send it back. In order to communicate information within the meaning of the Act there must, I think, be a common knowledge in the mind of the person communicating and of the person to whom it is communicated.

LOPES, J.—I entirely agree.

of this court as to the jurisdiction of the justices in petty sessions, because there was no written information nor oath to support the warrant. Held (Kelly, C.B. dissentiente), that the justices had jurisdiction to hear and determine the case against S., notwithstanding he was brought before them on an illegal warrant, and there was no written information.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this court by Bramwell, L.J.

Owen Hughes was convicted before me at the last Anglesea Assizes (July 1878) of perjury.

He swore falsely and corruptly on the hearing of a charge against John Stanley at petty sessions for an assault on him, Owen Hughes, and for obstructing him, being a police constable, in the discharge of his duty.

But it was objected that the defendant Owen Hughes should be acquitted on the ground that the proceedings were informal and without jurisdiction in the magistrates who heard the case.

Hughes went to the office of the clerk to the justices, saw there a clerk of the clerk, and told him he wanted a warrant against John Stanley for assaulting him and obstructing him in the discharge of his duty. The clerk gave him a form of a warrant to that effect, which Hughes took to a magistrate, who signed it.

There was no written information nor oath by Hughes or any other person to found or justify the issuing of the warrant.

Stanley, however, was arrested on the warrant by Hughes, and brought before the magistrates. The case was gone into of assault and obstruction. No objection was taken by Stanley, who defended himself, and called a witness to show he was not guilty.

I overruled the objection, and, as I have said, the defendant Hughes was convicted.

I have now to ask the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved whether, because there was no written information nor oath, I ought to have directed an acquittal. If I ought, the conviction should be quashed, otherwise not.

The defendant was discharged on bail, to appear at the next Assizes for Anglesea.

G. BRAMWELL.

Bramwell, L.J. stated further to the court that there was no evidence at the trial before him that the warrant was produced before the magistrates; that no one then thought it necessary to inquire into such a matter; and that the case at the trial was conducted on the footing, that the case before the magistrates was conducted in the same way as it would have been if the warrant had been issued on a written information duly sworn to.

The case was argued twice, first on Nov. 23, 30, and Dec. 6, 1878, before Kelly, C.B., Mellor, Denman, and Field, JJ., and Pollock, B., and the Court, after taking time to consider its judgment, directed the case to be re-argued before a full court, and it was re-argued accordingly before the above-named ten judges on March 8 and 15, 1879.

O. Bowen for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained. It was essential that there should have been a written information to sustain the warrant for the arrest of Stanley. Without an information there is no charge, and without a charge there is no issue between the prisoner and the Crown. The necessity for the information appears from Paley on Convictions, 64 (5th edit.). The information or charge was the basis of the whole proceeding, and without that being laid upon oath, there was no legal trial or hearing before the magistrates in petty sessions, any more than there could be a criminal trial before a judge at the assizes without an indictment; all the proceedings were coram non judice. The only statute under which the sentence on Stanley could have been imposed is the 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112 (Prevention of Crime Act), s. 12, which enables justices to inflict a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months with hard labour for assaults on constables in the execution of their duty. Assuming the justices to have proceeded under that statute, sect. 17 enacts "that any offence against that Act may be prosecuted before a court of summary jurisdiction, in England in manner directed by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, and any Act amending the same." Sect. 1 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 enacts that in all cases where an information shall be laid or complaint made the justices may issue a summons requiring the person summoned to appear to answer to the said information or complaint provided also that no objection shall be taken or allowed to any information, complaint, or summons for any defect therein in substance or form, or for any variance between such information, complaint, or summons, and the evidence produced at the hearing of such information or complaint. Then sect. 2 enables justices, if they think fit, upon oath or affirmation substantiating the matter of such information or complaint, to issue their warrant to arrest the party charged or complained against if he does not appear to the summons. Sects. 4, 7, 8, 9 also show that it was intended by the Act that the information should be in writing. Sect. 10 enacts that every information for any offence punishable upon summary conviction, unless some particular Act of Parliament shall otherwise require, may be made or laid without any oath or affirmation being made of the truth thereof, except where the justices shall issue their warrant in the first instance (as here was the case), and in every such case the matter of such information shall be substantiated upon oath before any such warrant shall be issued. The language in sect. 10 is imperative and not directory merely. To give them jurisdiction the justices in petty sessions should have followed the course prescribed in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, and, not having done so, the proceedings were coram non judice, and perjury could not be committed by a person giving evidence under such circumstances. In Caudle v. Seymour (1 Q. B. 889) it was held that a justice's warrant was bad which did not show any information on oath on which the warrant was issued; and, further, that a deposition on oath taken by the justice's clerk, the justice not being present, nor at any time seeing, examining, or hearing the deponent, was irregular, and no justification for the proceedings founded upon it. If it be said that this is procedure, and does not affect the jurisdiction of the magistrate, that may be met by the observation of Coleridge, J. in Caudle v. Seymour: "It is true that a magistrate here has jurisdiction over the offence in the abstract, but to give him jurisdiction in any particular case it must be shown that there was a proper charge upon oath in that case. A man has no right because he is a magistrate to order another to be taken for an offence over which he has jurisdiction without a charge regularly made." So in the present case it is conceded that the justices had jurisdiction in the abstract over the offence, but it is contended that they had no jurisdiction in the charge against Stanley for want of a written information on oath. The cases of Reg. v. Pearce (9 Cox C. C. 258; 22 L. J. 75, M. C.) and Reg. v. Millard (6 Cox C. C. 150; 22 L. J. 108, M. C.) were then referred to. In Reg. v. Carr (10 Cox C. C. 564) it was held that it should be proved distinctly, on the trial of an indictment for perjury, what the charge was on the hearing of which the false evidence was given. In that case Kelly, C.B. said: "This is an indictment for perjury, on the trial of which offence it is necessary to prove, first, that perjury was committed—that is, that the party charged has deposed on oath to something that is untrue; and, secondly, that that evidence is material to the issue before the tribunal where the inquiry takes place. In this case the perjury arises on the hearing of a charge against Lambe before certain magistrates, and the jurisdiction on their parts to entertain it is the point in question. We must see whether the case distinctly shows that the charge was made to and in the presence and hearing of the accused in order to ascertain whether what was sworn was material to the issue. The charge must be collected from the statement in the case, and looking at that, it appears that Lambe was in some way or other made personally to appear before the magistrates, when certain evidence on some charge or other was given. We find, first, that a summons seems to have been made out, but whether that was ever served, or left the magistrates' office, or was delivered to the police officer, or, if so, whether he ever showed it to the accused, does not appear. It is further stated that Lambe appeared before the magistrates, and evidence was heard which there is reason to believe was in relation to a charge of selling beer without a licence; but whatever may have been the charge, we look in vain for any charge distinctly stated, whether written or oral, on which the defendant gave evidence, and in relation to which such evidence is said to have amounted to perjury. Perjury is assigned in the indictment by alleging that the prisoner swore falsely on the hearing of the charge. To sustain that, the charge should distinctly be proved, and I nowhere find any statement—I do not mean on which we may not speculate as to the charge—but any such statement as distinctly shows the charge against Lambe. Two documents are set out, neither of which appears to have been shown or made known to Lambe. How do we know that the charge was not keeping open his house for the sale of beer at unlawful hours? I do not say that we are to infer that, but how can we say that Lambe may not have been before the magistrates without any summons or information, or any real charge having been made known to him? Under these circumstances, and without reference to the authorities cited, I think the conviction should be quashed." The case of Reg. v. Scotton (59 B. 493; 13 L. J. 58, M. C.) also supports the defendant's conclusion, though that was not an indictment for perjury. The case of Turner v. The Postmaster-General (5 B. & S. 756; 34 L. J. 10, M. C.), which will be cited on the other side, depended on a particular statute. It has been said that a person by appearing waives an irregularity in the process by which he is summoned before the court, but it is contended that there can be no waiver in a criminal case of any matter which goes to the root of the jurisdiction of the justices. The information in writing was essential to the jurisdiction of the justices, and the want of that could not be waived. What charge was there when Stanley was brought before the magistrates? [DENMAN, J.—May not the magistrates have said to the constable when Stanley was brought before them, "What do you charge this man with?" and may not the constable have replied, "I charge him with assaulting me in the execution of my duty."] That would not do, if a written information, as is contended, is necessary. There was no proof that the defendant was sworn in any judicial proceeding. If Stanley was brought before the bench for an offence under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, he could not be convicted under the 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112:

The information is not mere process, but procedure, and goes to the root of jurisdiction. "The question of jurisdiction does not depend on the truth or falsehood of the charge, but upon its nature; it is determinable on the commencement, not at the conclusion of the inquiry," per Lord Denman, C.J. in Reg. v. Bolton (1 Q. B. 74). In Reg. v. Brickhall (33 L. J. 156, M. C.) a person was summoned under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 81, for assaulting a constable in the execution of his duty, but convicted under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 42, of a common assault, and Crompton, J. held that the conviction was made without jurisdiction. In the present case the false oath was not taken on the charge of which the prisoner was convicted. Sect. 4 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, was evidently framed on the assumption that the information was to be in writing, and there could not be a waiver of the oath required to substantiate the information where a warrant is issued by magistrates in the first instance under sect. 10. The case of Blake v. Beech (L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 320) is a decision in the defendant's favour. Most of the decisions where it has been said that the want of a summons or information was waived are civil cases.

Poland for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. The justices who heard the case had jurisdiction, and the false swearing of the defendant at such hearing amounted to perjury. The question is whether the hearing was coram non judice. The warrant was improperly issued, and Stanley was illegally arrested and brought before the justices, but he was before them, and his case was to be dealt with by them in some way. No question arises now as to the illegality of the arrest, or of the conviction of Stanley; the only question is whether all that took place at the hearing was coram non judice. [KELLY, O.B.—What do you say the charge before the justices was, and in what form was it made?] It is sufficient to say that a charge was made orally, and that upon the hearing of that charge the defendant swore falsely and corruptly. Whatever was the form of the charge against Stanley before the justices, he had an opportunity of defending himself against it. A man may be charged in the first instance with a particular offence, and on the hearing it may appear that the man has committed a second offence. In such cases the justices exercise their discretion, it may be to commit summarily or send the case for trial, or to dismiss the first charge and convict for the second offence. Surely the magistrates have jurisdiction over the entire matter in such cases. In the present case the constable at the time of the commission of the assault might have arrested Stanley and taken him before the justices, and the charge then would have been oral. The warrant in this case was not the charge—it was merely the authority of the justices to arrest Stanley, and when Stanley was before the magistrates the charge was then made. [MELLOR, J.—Was Stanley in custody for the offence or any other offence legally?] Are the justices to enter upon a preliminary inquiry whether a person before them charged with a breach of the peace is legally brought before them? [KELLY, C.B.—Then what prevents a man not legally in custody from walking away? MELLOR, J.—The Judges of the Superior Courts have power over all kinds of offences, yet the courts never exercise the jurisdiction without inquiring into the legality of the proceedings. What more power has a justice of the peace?] The jurisdiction of a justice of the peace arises on a breach of the peace, and it arises when a person is brought before him charged with a breach of the peace, and that person has the opportunity of defending himself against the charge. There is no law that requires the charge to be made in writing. A man when brought before a justice on a charge is to be dealt with according to law, if the charge is one over which the justice has jurisdiction: The Vagrant Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 33, s. 6) authorises any person to apprehend a vagrant, and forthwith take him before a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to the provisions of the Act. That is an instance where there is no preliminary formal charge, and the justice must necessarily inquire whether the person apprehended was found offending as a vagrant, and false swearing upon the inquiry would amount to perjury. In Reg. v. Millard (Dears. O. C. 166; 6 Cox O. C. 155) Wightman, J. ruled, on an objection on the trial of an indictment for perjury, "that the magistrates had jurisdiction to hear a charge under the Malicious Trespass Act (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 24), although the information was not on oath, and that the omission to lay the information on oath was an error in procedure only," and Jervis, C.J. said that Wightman, J. was right in saying that the information on oath was a matter of procedure only. Jervis, C.J. also said: "If a party charged appear before a magistrate, his jurisdiction is founded to hear and determine the case, but if he does not appear the proceedings must be under the 30th section of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, and there must be an information on oath in order to justify an ex parte proceeding." In Turner v. The Postmaster-General (5 B. & S. 756; 34 L. J. 10, M. C.) the passage from p. 54 of Paley on Convictions was relied on, yet it was held that the want of an information and a summons was cured by the appearance of the appellants before the justices, and that they had waived the objection that they were not legally in custody on the charge, and therefore that the justices had jurisdiction to commit. A man may waive anything in the nature of procedure.

Blake v. Besch, L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 320; 45 L. J. 111, M. C.;

Reg. v. Berry, Bell C. C. 46; 8 Cox C. C. 151;

Reg. v. Hurrell, 3 Foa. & Fin. 171, were then cited.

Bowen in reply.—It is conceded that there may be a waiver of process, but not of procedure. Process is merely to bring a man before a justice, but where the procedure is dictated by statute, as in this case, by sect. 17 of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, the mode prescribed is a condition precedent to the jurisdiction which must arise at the commencement of the hearing. See note to Cripps v. Durden (1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 735). In Res v. Fearshire (1 Leach C. C. 202) Lord Mansfield said that it was the indispensable duty of the magistrate to take all charges in writing of whatsoever nature, kind, or complexity they might be. In this case an information was required in writing, and the absence of it rendered the inquiry at petty sessions one coram non judice.

Our. adv. vult.

June 21.—LOPES, J.—The facts of this case and the Acts of Parliament and authorities which bear upon it have been fully gone into by the judgments of the other members of the court which I have read. I agree in substance with the judgments which will be delivered, but do not desire to commit myself to any opinions which have been expressed collateral to the question before us. I think the warrant in this case was mere process for the purpose of bringing the party complained of before the justices, and had nothing whatever to do with the jurisdiction of the justices. I am of opinion that whether Stanley was summoned, brought by warrant, came voluntarily, or was brought by force, or under an illegal warrant, is immaterial. Being before the justices, however brought there, the justices, if they had jurisdiction in respect of time and place over the offence, were competent to entertain the charge, and being so competent a false oath wilfully taken in respect of something material would be perjury.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of opinion that the conviction was right, and ought to be affirmed. In arriving at this opinion, I have assumed as a fact, from the case as stated, that Stanley was arrested and brought before the justices upon an illegal warrant as ever was issued—a warrant signed by a magistrate not only without any written information or oath to justify it, but without any information at all. It follows that the magistrate who issued the warrant, and the defendant who with knowledge of the illegality executed it, were liable to an action for false imprisonment. If authority were wanting for this, I need but refer to Candle v. Seymour (1 Q. B. 889), and Morgan v. Hughes (2 T. R. 231), per Ashhurst, J. Wrongful, however, as were the proceedings by which Stanley was brought into the presence of the magistrates, to answer a charge which up to that moment had never been legally preferred against him, yet before those magistrates, and in his presence, a charge was made over which, if duly made, they had jurisdiction. Upon that charge it was that the hearing proceeded, and in support of that charge it was that the defendant was sworn, and in giving his evidence swore corruptly and falsely. The case expressly finds that the alleged perjury was committed "on the hearing of a charge against John Stanley at petty sessions for an assault on him, Owen Hughes, and for obstructing him, being a police constable, in the discharge of his duty." Comparing this finding with the language of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 38, which enacts that "whosoever shall assault, resist, or wilfully obstruct any police officer in the due execution of his duty shall be guilty of a misdemeanour," I come without hesitation to the conclusion that the charge was that of the indictable offence created by that statute; and I do not think a doubt could have been suggested as to this, had we not been informed, in the course of the argument, that the justices in the result dealt summarily with the case, and convicted Stanley under sect. 12 of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112 of an assault upon Hughes, being a constable, in the execution of his duty, and sentenced him to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. The case does not find in what form the charge was made, whether in writing or otherwise. In my opinion, writing was unnecessary; but even were it so, I would, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, assume it to have been properly made, as did Crompton, J. in Turner v. The Postmaster-General (34 L. J. 12, M. C.). Now, a charge having been made before them of an indictable offence, committed within their jurisdiction by a person then bodily present, it seems to me the justices were bound to take cognizance of it. The 17th section of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, expressly recognises the legality of depositions of witnesses taken in cases in which persons charged with indictable offences are "brought" before justices "with or without warrant." Had the justices proceeded upon the defendant's deposition to commit Stanley for trial, instead of convicting him summarily, it is difficult to see what possible objection could have been made to the legality of their proceedings. They did not, however, think fit to adopt that course. They took, it is true, the evidence on oath of the defendant upon the charge for the indictable misdemeanour created by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, but, having done so, they proceeded to convict summarily under a different statute (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112) without, as I collect, any new information or charge of the latter offence; in short, they convicted him of an offence with which he had never been legally charged. In this I am of opinion they were wrong; and upon this ground I am strongly inclined to think the conviction may be quashed. Martin v. Pridgeon (1 Ell. & Ell. 778; 23 L. J. 179, M. C.) and Reg. v. Brickhall (33 L. J. 156, M. C.), more particularly referred to hereafter, are strong authorities in favour of this view. It does not, however, seem to me to be necessary to decide that point, for in the case before us we have only to determine whether the justices, at the moment when they swore the defendant in support of the charge which was made, had jurisdiction to hear that charge. Whether they afterwards pronounced a legal or an illegal judgment is immaterial to the present inquiry. Assuming, however, contrary to the view I have taken, that the charge upon which the defendant was sworn was an offence punishable upon summary conviction under 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, and that verbal information of that offence was made before the magistrate who without written information or oath illegally issued the warrant under which Stanley was brought before the petty sessions, I should still be of opinion that the justices, in hearing that charge, and taking evidence in support of it, were acting within their jurisdiction. There is a marked distinction between the jurisdiction to take cognizance of an offence and the jurisdiction to issue a particular process to compel the accused to answer it. The former may exist; the latter may be wanting. To found jurisdiction to take cognizance of an offence, notwithstanding the dictum of Lord Mansfield in Res v. Fearshire (1 Leach C. C. 202), it has been constantly held that a written information is not necessary, per Grose, J. in Res v. Thompson (2 T. R. 23), per Parke, B. in Reg. v. Millard (6 Cox C. C. 150; 22 L. J. 108, M. C.), per Erle, C.J. in Reg. v. Shaw (10 Cox C. C. 66; 34 L. J. 173, M. C.), and per Crompton, J. in Turner v. The Postmaster-General. See also old forms of conviction, in which the information is set out thus: "A. B. giveth me to understand and be informed," &c. The information, which is in the nature of an indictment, of necessity precedes the process; and it is only after the information is laid that the question as to the particular form and nature of the process can properly arise. Process is not essential to the jurisdiction of the justices to hear and adjudicate. It is but the proceeding adopted to compel the appearance of the accused to answer the information already duly laid, without which no hearing in the nature of a trial could take place, unless under special statutory enactment. If a mere summons is required, no writing or oath is necessary—a bare verbal information is sufficient. If a warrant is required, then, and for that purpose only, an oath substantiating the information is requisite, not only by the provisions in Jervis's Act, so often referred to, but by the common law, of which it was always a doctrine that a warrant which deprives a man of liberty ought not to issue without oath of the truth of the information: (see Res v. Heber, Barnardiston, 101.) To justify a warrant, I am also of opinion that a written information is necessary. In the case of indictable offences it is expressly made so by sect. 8 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42. The illegality of the warrant and of the arrest did not, however, affect the jurisdiction of the justices to hear the charge, whether that hearing proceeded upon a valid verbal information, followed by an illegal process, or upon an information for the first time laid in the presence of Stanley, upon which he was then and there instantly charged. The dictum of Holt, C.J. (1 Lord Raymond 509) is an express authority recognising the legality of a conviction upon an information instantly. Stanley might, it is true, had he known of the illegality of his arrest, have demanded his release from it, and prayed for an adjournment to a future day, to enable him to prepare his defence. This, I think, it would have been the duty of the magistrates to grant: (see per Crompton, J. in Turner v. The Postmaster-General (34 L. J. 13, M. C.), and per Blackburn, J. in Reg. v. Shaw (1b. 173, 4). A refusal to do this, however, would not have destroyed their jurisdiction, though it might possibly have afforded good ground for setting aside the conviction on the ground that they had not allowed the accused sufficient opportunity to answer the charge. Another course might have been pursued, viz., to commence to hear, and if necessary adjourn the further hearing to a future day, a power expressly given by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 16. It so happens, however, in the case before us that neither the magistrates nor Stanley were aware of the illegality of the warrant; and so the hearing proceeded without objection, and as if all things were in order. To use the language of the case, "the case was gone into of assault and obstruction," Stanley "defended himself and called a witness to show he was not guilty," and in the result was convicted as I have above mentioned. Possibly that conviction may be open to the objection that the justices had no jurisdiction to convict of the offence created by statute 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, when the only charge made against him was of the misdemeanour created by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, on the authority of Reg. v. Brickhall, or upon the ground that under the circumstances Stanley had not such opportunity of answering and time to answer as he was in common justice entitled to: (see Blake v. Beech, 1 Ex. Div. 320.) The case of Reg. v. Gillyard (12 Q. B. 527) is a strong authority to show that the Queen's Bench have jurisdiction to quash a conviction upon other grounds than want of jurisdiction in the magistrates, e.g., on the ground of fraud, conspiracy, and perjury in obtaining it. If the contention on the part of the defendant be correct, then Stanley, even though he had suffered the whole imprisonment to which he was sentenced would be liable to be tried again, and could not plead autrefois convict; and if he had been acquitted would have been in no condition to plead autrefois acquit—two very startling consequences. A flood of authorities might be cited in support of the proposition that no process at all is necessary when the accused being bodily before the justices the charge is made in his presence, and he appears and answers to it. In 2 Hawk. P. C. 281 it is said "it seemeth plain from the nature of the thing that there can be no need of process where the defendant is present in court, but only where he is absent." In Rees v. Stone (1 East, 649) Lord Kenyon said: "Justice requires that a party should be duly summoned and fully heard before he is condemned; but if he be stated to be present at the time of the proceeding, and to have heard all the witnesses, and not to have asked for any further time to bring forward his defence, if he had any, this at all times has been deemed sufficient." Reg. v. Shaw (34 L. J. 169, M. C.; L. & C. 579; 10 Cox C. C. 66) is to the same effect, and appears to me to be decisive of the present case. The defendant in that case was convicted of perjury, committed upon the hearing of a charge punishable on summary conviction against one Kilshaw, a beershop keeper, under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118. The proceedings, not being prescribed by that Act, were regulated, as are proceedings for the offence of which Stanley was convicted, by Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43). At the trial no proof was given of any written information warranting a summons; indeed, the evidence showed that the summons was filled up by the magistrate's clerk, handed to a superintendent of police, who took it to a magistrate, who read and signed it without making any inquiry, or requiring any statement of fact—very like the circumstances of the present case. It was proved, however, that Kilshaw appeared before the justices, that the charge was then made against him, that he answered it, and that the defendant committed perjury in evidence which he gave on his behalf. It was objected that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear the charge against Kilshaw, because there was no information to justify the issuing of a summons. Erle, C.J. said: "In my opinion, if a party is before a magistrate, and he is then charged with the commission of an offence within the jurisdiction of that magistrate, the latter has jurisdiction to proceed with that charge without any information or summons having been previously issued, unless the statute creating the offence imposes the necessity of taking some such step." See also per Blackburn, J.: "I think when a man appears before justices, and a charge is then made against him, if he has not been summoned, he has a good ground for asking for an adjournment; if he waives that, and answers the charge, a conviction would be perfectly good against him, and the witnesses, if they swore falsely, would be liable to indictment for perjury." To the same effect are Reg. v. Millard (ubi sup.); Reg. v. Borry (8 Cox C. C. 151; 28 L. J. 86, M. C.); Reg. v. Simmons (Ib. 183; 8 Cox C. C. 190); Reg. v. Smith (1 L. Rep. C. C. R. 110; 11 Cox C. C. 10); Reg. v. Fletcher (Ib. 320; 12 Cox C. C. 77); Turner v. Postmaster-General (5 B. & S. 756; s. c. 34 L. J. 10, M. C.) in which latter case the defendants were in custody upon a charge of felony, which could not be sustained, but before the magistrates were charged with and convicted of a different offence, for which they could not be legally arrested without warrant or information on oath. The court upheld the conviction. I do not look upon Blake v. Beech (1 Ex. Div. 320) as deciding that the magistrates in the case then before them had no jurisdiction, but only that the conviction ought to be quashed for irregularity under the peculiar circumstances of that case. Reg. v. Pearce (3 B. & S. 531; s. c. 32 L. J. 75, M. C.) only decides that perjury cannot be committed by a witness who is sworn in a non-existing cause, which is undeniable. That case would have been a strong authority for the defendant if no charge had been made against Stanley before the defendant was sworn. Reg. v. Scotton (5 Q. B. 493; s. c. 13 L. J. 58, M. C.; and 1 New Seas. Cas. 27) was the strongest authority cited in favour of the defendant. That case, however, turned upon the peculiar language of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 65, s. 9, "provided that before any proceedings shall be had or taken upon such information the charge shall be deposed to on oath," &c. It does not become necessary therefore to consider how far that case has been affected by more recent decisions. In the course of the argument there was some discussion as to whether the warrant was produced before the justices. In my opinion, whether it was or not is immaterial; had it been so, it would have proved nothing, for it could not in any sense be treated as the information. It was the act and process of the magistrate alone, not the information of the informer, and the recital of an information in it would be no evidence that there was such an information in fact: (see Stevens v. Clark, 1 Car. & M. 509, Cresswell, J.) I have carefully considered the provisions of Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. cc. 42 and 43), but I find in them nothing at all militating against the view I have expressed. The sections of those statutes to which our attention was called which regulate the formalities to be observed when a charge is made against an absent person whose presence it is desired to procure do not seem to me to have any bearing upon a case like the present where the charge is made in the presence of the accused, who is then and there called upon to answer it, as he lawfully may be, according to the dictum of Holt, C.J., to which I have referred. In such a case it is, in my opinion, altogether immaterial, so far as the jurisdiction of the justices to hear that charge is concerned, whether the accused was before them voluntarily or otherwise, or on legal or illegal process. I have already pointed out that Stanley may have good grounds for asking that his conviction may be quashed, irrespective of the invalid objection raised by the defendant. But this conviction, in my opinion, ought to be affirmed.

POLLOCK, B. and LINDLEY, J. concurred in the judgment delivered by Hawkins, J.

MANISTY, J.—I am of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed. The case finds that Hughes swore falsely and corruptly in the hearing of a charge against Stanley at petty sessions for an assault on him (Hughes) and for obstructing him, being a police-constable, in the execution of his duty; and the question is whether the justices had jurisdiction to hear that charge, Stanley having been brought before them by means of a warrant signed by a magistrate, but which warrant had been issued without any information in writing or on oath. By virtue of the provisions in several statutes, which it is unnecessary for me to repeat, justices of the peace assembled in petty sessions have jurisdiction to hear a charge of an assault upon a constable in the execution of his duty, but it is only by the Prevention of Crimes Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112) that they can summarily convict and punish for that offence. The charge made against Stanley might have been lawfully made and heard without any previous summons or warrant. Hughes might have apprehended Stanley in the act of committing the alleged assault; a magistrate seeing the alleged assault committed might have then and there ordered Stanley into custody; or Stanley, knowing or believing that he would be apprehended if he did not appear, might have appeared voluntarily before the justices to answer the charge, in any of which cases I cannot doubt but that the justices not only might, but must have heard the case and disposed of it somehow. It would be very strange, to say the least of it, if the law be that, notwithstanding the justices would have had jurisdiction to hear the charge if there had not been a warrant, they had no such jurisdiction in consequence of there being a warrant unsupported by sworn information. Nothing short of a clear statutory enactment would justify such a conclusion. That there is no such statutory enactment, I think, is clear. But it is said there are decisions which govern the case. The decision most relied upon on behalf of the prisoner Hughes is Reg. v. Scotton (5 Q. B. 493), but it will be seen by examining that case that the very ground upon which it was decided is wanting in the present case. The indictment was for perjury on the hearing before justices of an information laid under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, sects. 40 & 41, and the court held that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear it, because by sect. 9 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 65, it was expressly made a condition precedent to any further step beyond the information that the matter of the information should be deposed to by oath of the informer or some other credible witness, and no such deposition had been made. Whether that case was rightly decided may, I think, admit of considerable doubt, having regard to the qualified language of the proviso at the end of sect. 9; but, assuming the right construction to have been put upon it, there is no such enactment in the present case, or anything like it. I think it unnecessary to review all the cases which were cited in the course of the argument, partly because I do not think that any of them are conclusive either way, but mainly because I found my judgment upon this, that the provisions contained in the 17th section of the 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112 (which incorporates the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), relative to process or proceedings for the purpose of bringing accused persons before justices, are, in my opinion, directory only, and do not in any way affect the jurisdiction of justices to hear charges made against persons who are before them, and who are accused of offences over which the justices have jurisdiction. The proviso at the end of sect. 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, strongly supports this view. We are not told by the learned judge who has stated this case how the justices dealt with Stanley; but we are informed by counsel at the Bar that they convicted him summarily, and sentenced him to imprisonment. In my opinion it is immaterial for the present purpose how the justices disposed of the charge, the only question before us being whether the justices had jurisdiction to hear it, and to receive evidence upon oath in support of it. I think they had, and that the question put to us should be answered in the affirmative.

FIELD, J.—I also am of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed. I have nothing to add to the judgments already delivered, but only desire to say, as I differed from my brothers Cleasby and Grove in Blake v. Beech, that I have carefully reconsidered my judgment in that case, and am unable to alter the view I then entertained.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The question in this case is, whether a conviction for perjury committed by the prisoner Hughes before justices should be quashed, because there was no information on oath for the warrant upon which Stanley, the party charged, was brought before the justices. The charge against Stanley before the justices was for obstructing Hughes, a police constable, in the discharge of his duty. It is not stated in the case under what statute the charge was made against Stanley; it might, therefore, have been under 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, s. 12, by which he might be convicted summarily; or it might have been under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 38, by which he might have been sent for trial to the assizes or sessions. If the charge be for an offence under the former Act, it may by sect. 17 be prosecuted in manner directed by Jervis's Act, 11 & 12 Vic. c. 43. Sect. 1 of that Act provides that, "where an information shall be laid that any person has committed any offence for which he is liable by law on summary conviction, the justice may issue his summons." This is the process by which the person to be charged is called on to appear. By sect. 2, "if being served the party does not appear a warrant may issue, or a warrant may issue in the first instance if the justice shall think fit," but in both these cases the matter of the information must be substantiated to the satisfaction of the justice by oath or affirmation; and if the summons is not obeyed the justice may proceed ex parte on proof of due service. By sect. 10 it is declared (that is declaratory of the common law) and enacted that the complaint in case of an order, and the information in case of a summary conviction, shall be made or laid without any oath or affirmation except where warrants are issued in the first instance to apprehend, and then the matter of the information must be substantiated by the oath or affirmation of the informant. Sect. 13 deals with the appearance or default of the party charged, and provides that the case may be heard in his absence on due proof of the service of the summons, or a warrant for his apprehension issued and committal; and for the dismissal of complaint or information if the complainant or informant does not appear by himself, counsel, or attorney; for the adjournment of the hearing, and concludes thus, "but if both parties appear, either personally or by their respective counsel or attorneys, before the justice or justices who are to hear and determine such complaint or information, then the said justice or justices shall proceed to hear and determine the same." The object of all these provisions is to bring the party accused before the justices, to enforce his presence, and to enable them to deal with him in his absence; but when he is before them, the justices are required, and shall proceed to hear and determine. The information on oath is not necessary to give the justices jurisdiction to try, though it is necessary to give them jurisdiction to issue a warrant to apprehend. The jurisdiction to try arises on the appearance of the party charged. Sect. 14 shows what is to take place at the hearing, "where such defendant shall be present at such hearing the substance of the information shall be stated to him." The word "stated" is important as pointing out that no summons, information, or other document, is to be read or shewn to him. An information is nothing more than what the word imports; namely, the statement by which the magistrate is informed of the offence for which the summons or warrant is required, and it need not be in writing unless the statute requires it. The magistrate to whom it is made is not necessarily, and very often never is, one of the magistrates by whom the case is subsequently heard. In practice an information is never produced before the justices. If in writing, it remains with the magistrate granting the summons or warrant, as the warrant remains in the custody of the constable. The clerk to the justices, or the police officer present, states the substance of the information, that is, the nature of the charge; sometimes where there is a charge sheet, as in the metropolitan districts, reading from it — otherwise not. The charge sheet is merely the statement drawn up by the inspector at the station of the charge preferred before him. He states, in fact, the substance of the charge or information, and the prisoner is called on to plead. He may admit the truth and plead guilty, or he may not admit the truth and desire to be tried for it, or he may apply to adjourn or object to the jurisdiction. But if he make no objection (and here it is found that Stanley made no objection) the case must proceed. Principle and authority seem to show that objections and defects in the form of procuring the appearance of a party charged will be gone by appearance. The principle is that a party charged should have an opportunity of knowing the charge against him, and be fully heard before being condemned. If he have the opportunity, the method by which he is brought before the justice cannot take away the jurisdiction to hear and determine when he is before them. The arrest of Stanley was no doubt illegal, there had been no information or oath to justify the warrant, and it might be that if the objection had been taken the magistrates might have entertained it, but they could then and there have issued their summons for Stanley's apprehension at once, on a verbal information which would be good (Res v. Fuller, 1 Ld. Raym. 610), and have proceeded to hear and determine, though if the defendant objected they ought to adjourn, so that he might know the charge and be prepared to meet it. Res v. Stone (1 East, 649), was a conviction under the game laws, and the objection that there had been no summons was abandoned on argument, and Lord Kenyon at p. 649, and Mr. Justice Le Blanc at p. 654, point out that "justice requires that a party should be duly summoned and fully heard before he is condemned; but if he be present at the time of the proceeding, and heard the charge of all the witnesses, and not have asked for any further time to bring forward his defence, if he had any, this at all times has been deemed sufficient." This was a case in which the objection was made to the conviction that it did not appear on the face of it that the defendant was duly summoned, but the principle is the same. In R. v. Shaw (L. & C. 579, 10 Cox C. C. 66), where there was no information of any kind, Erle, C. J. points out that where the parties are before a magistrate who has jurisdiction in respect of time and place (as the magistrates had here), no summons or information is necessary to complete his jurisdiction, unless the obligation is imposed by the statute which constitutes the offence, and certainly that is not imposed by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. Blackburn, J., in that case, says no information was required. It is material to know what the charge is (and here the case finds Stanley was charged with obstructing the police constable in the discharge of his duty). Sometimes a summons or other writing may be required, but no antecedent information is necessary. In the absence of one, the party to be tried may, if he please, ask for an adjournment, but if he does not do so the adjudication is good; and Montague Smith, J., says, no information or summons is necessary where the party appears voluntarily, (and I do not think it makes any difference if he be there compulsory.) It is to be observed that this decision was in 1865, long after Jervis's Act came into operation. Indeed Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43) is referred to by the prisoner's counsel. Mr. Bowen's argument in this case for the necessity of an information is entirely based on Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43.) This case is, therefore, a distinct authority that the absence of such an information is not fatal to the jurisdiction of the justices. In Turner v. Postmaster-General (5 B. & S. 756) it was held that though there was no information on oath (the 2nd section of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, the statute on which the defendant was convicted, requiring one) that after appearance and no objection made, no objection to the jurisdiction of the justices to convict could be taken, that any defect in bringing the party before the justices was cured by appearance and the merits of the case being gone into, and that the justices had jurisdiction. Blake v. Beach (1 Ex. Div. 320) is to the same effect. I wish to say that I subscribe to every word in my brother Field's judgment in that case. The judgments of Olesby, B. and Grove J. are based on the ground that the objection to the want of an information was distinctly taken before the magistrates. R. v. Berry (ubi sup.),

B. v. Fletcher (ubi sup.), Rea v. Fuller (13 Lord Raym. Rep. 320) support the same principle, though they were sought to be distinguished in argument by suggesting that the inquiry on which the perjury arose was of a quasi civil nature. The decision in B. v. Scotton (5 Q. B. 493) was on the ground that by the words of the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 65, s. 9 it was a condition precedent to any further steps that the matter of the information should be deposed to on the oath of the informer, or some other credible witness. I think, therefore, that Stanley being before the justices and no adjournment asked for, and being charged with an offence punishable by summary conviction, though there had been no information on oath for the warrant, that false swearing in a material point would be perjury. The passages quoted in the argument from Paley on Convictions and Smith's Leading Cases have reference to the statement of the information in the old form of conviction, where, of course, it became necessary to show in that part of the conviction all the ingredients to give jurisdiction. The form of conviction in Jervis's Act omits the information, but if the offence with which Stanley was charged was one under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 38, for which he might be committed for trial at the assizes or quarter sessions, I entertain no doubt that there need not have been an information on oath or warrant to give the justices jurisdiction to hear and commit or discharge. The practice of justices with regard to indictable offences is regulated by Jervis's Act. Chap. 42, sect. 8 provides that where a warrant is to be issued there must be an information in writing on oath, but not where a summons only is issued. There is no section pointing out what is to be done at the hearing, as in Jervis's Act 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. But sect. 17, which applies to the examination of witnesses provides, "that where any person shall appear, or be brought before any justice, charged with any indictable offence, whether such person appear voluntarily upon summons or have been apprehended with or without warrant, or be in custody for the same, or any other offence, depositions shall be taken and the oath administered before the witness is examined." The justice here, therefore, has expressly jurisdiction to administer the oath to the witness when the party charged is before him, whether he appear or be brought there, and whether there be or be not a warrant; and, therefore, having jurisdiction to administer an oath, false swearing on a material point would be perjury. But apart from either statute, I do not think it can be doubted that a police constable would be justified in taking into custody without summons or warrant any person who was assaulting and obstructing him in the execution of his duty, and subsequently charging him with that offence. Upon such a charge being made (although it was entirely false) the magistrate before whom it is made must inquire into its truth, and to do so must have jurisdiction to administer an oath. False swearing in that inquiry on a material point would be perjury. In any view, therefore, I am of opinion that the conviction must be affirmed.

DENMAN, J.—I conceive the true meaning and effect of the case submitted to us by the learned Lord Justice to be as follows: John Stanley was improperly arrested by the defendant, Owen Hughes, a constable, who had obtained a form of warrant from the clerk to the clerk of the justices which was filled up by the clerk or by Hughes in the usual form, as for a charge of assaulting and obstructing Hughes in the execution of his duty. This warrant was improperly signed by the magistrate without requiring any information either in writing or upon oath. The magistrates at petty sessions finding Stanley before them, and having been verbally informed, either by Hughes, or their own clerk, that Hughes charged Stanley with assaulting him and obstructing him in the execution of his duty, and without inquiring how Stanley had been brought there, administered an oath to Hughes, and took evidence in the course of which Hughes committed perjury, if perjury, in law, would be committed in such a case; the only point raised for our consideration being that the absence of a written information or of an information upon oath was fatal to a conviction for perjury. No question was raised at the petty sessions as to the existence of an information or as to the existence or legality of the warrant or arrest. These objections were first suggested upon the trial of Hughes for perjury. Stanley made no objection to the charge being heard, and called a witness in his own behalf. He was in fact, as was admitted upon the argument though not stated in the case, convicted and sentenced to six months' imprisonment with hard labour, a sentence which could only have been passed upon summary conviction under the powers of the 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, s. 12. The case has been twice most ably and elaborately argued, and for some time I doubted whether the conviction could be sustained, but upon full consideration I am satisfied that it ought to stand. The main argument for the defendant was based upon the ground that the offence of which he was convicted was one under statute 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, s. 12, and that by virtue of sect. 17 of that Act, coupled with the provisions of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, thereby incorporated, the whole proceeding was void, and without jurisdiction for want of an information upon oath. I am of opinion, however, that we ought not to have regard to the conviction in considering whether perjury was committed, but to look to the moment at which the false evidence was given, and consider whether, at that moment, the magistrates had jurisdiction to hear that evidence judicially. And I think that they had jurisdiction to hear that evidence judicially, if, at the trial at which it was given, it was evidence which in any possible event they might have acted upon judicially in a matter within their jurisdiction whether the result of their acting upon it might have been to convict, or to acquit, or to adjourn, or to send for trial, or to take bail, or to do any other judicial act within their competency. At the moment at which the false evidence in question was given, it appears to me that there was nothing to compel the magistrates to inquire into the mode in which Stanley had been brought before them. If, as I suppose (and here I am putting the case as favourably as it can be put for the defendant) nothing more happened than that the magistrate inquired "What is the charge against that man?" and Hughes said in answer, "I charge him with assaulting me, and obstructing me in the execution of my duty." I apprehend that the magistrates would at once have had jurisdiction to put Hughes upon his oath, and inquire into several matters, upon any one of which the perjury might have been committed wholly without reference to what they might in the result feel themselves bound to do or not to do. For example, they might have inquired into the name and number of Hughes, and whether he were really a member of the police, and actually on duty at the time of the alleged assault; whether Stanley was really the person who had assaulted him or not, how he was dressed, whether he were alone, or with others, &c., and indeed even if the jurisdiction of the magistrates to convict depended upon whether he had arrested Stanley in the act, or brought him up upon a legal warrant afterwards obtained, this very question might have been a legitimate subject of inquiry. Considering that this was a case in which Hughes complained of an assault upon himself, it need not have occurred to the magistrates in the first instance that any warrant at all would have been necessary, for there is nothing in any of the statutes to repeal the common law which would have enabled Hughes if the charge were a true one, to bring Stanley at once before the magistrates, without any warrant at all. The charge actually made as stated in the case, according to my understanding of it, is much more nearly in accordance with the provisions of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 s. 38, than with those of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, s. 12. It included a breach of the peace; and I can see no reason why the magistrates, at all events, in the absence of any objection on the ground of the illegality of the arrest, or the want of an information, should not have administered an oath, and inquired into the charge; at all events, until any doubt arose as to their jurisdiction to deal with it finally by conviction. It was contended, that even under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, relating to indictable offences, the right of the magistrates to inquire would not be well founded in the absence of an information in writing or upon oath; but I am of opinion that there is nothing in that Act to destroy the jurisdiction of the magistrates to inquire into a charge of an indictable offence, where the person charged is actually in custody before them. The first section of that Act shows that the provisions relating to warrants and informations are not intended to apply in such a case, but are merely provisions for the purpose of bringing people not already in custody before the justices; but it is not necessary to consider further the question whether the conviction was good or bad, and I express no opinion upon it. Their jurisdiction to convict appears to me to be a totally different question from the question whether they had jurisdiction to take evidence in such a case. I cannot hold that the magistrates who tried and convicted Stanley (even if the conviction be one that cannot be supported) had no jurisdiction to administer an oath to Hughes, or that any evidence he gave relevant to a verbal charge of assault and obstruction was coram non judice. The case of Reg. v. Scott (5 Q. B. 493) which at first seemed to me to be in favour of the defendant's contention, is, I think, clearly distinguishable on the ground that there the court thought that the only possible foundation of the magistrates' jurisdiction was an information, whereas in the present case there was nothing to prevent the magistrates proceeding to inquire into a charge which in at least one other lawful manner might have been brought before them without any information at all, and either adjudicated upon by them or sent for trial. In the view I take of this case it is necessary to discuss more fully the contention of the defendant's learned counsel as to the applicability of Jervis's Acts to the case upon the supposition that because the conviction was one under 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, no evidence given upon the hearing could be the subject of an indictment for perjury in the absence of an information on oath or in writing. In my view all that was necessary to give the magistrates jurisdiction to hear evidence was that there should be before them a person charged with an offence within their general jurisdiction under such circumstances as to call upon them to take evidence before they could decide whether they should exercise or abstain from exercising some legal power which they possessed. For the reasons above given, I think such was the case here, and that the evidence falsely and corruptly given upon oath, and which must be taken to have been held by the learned Lord Justice to have been relevant and material to the subject matter of inquiry before the justices cannot be said to have been coram non judice. The indictment on being referred to, appears to have contained an allegation that the perjury was committed upon the hearing of a "complaint or information," and this is no doubt language which would at first sight lead me to expect that proof would have been given of a charge made otherwise than in the way in which it appears to me that the case states the charge in this case to have been made. But I do not think that the words "complaint or information" are inconsistent with a verbal charge made under the circumstances suggested above. The statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 20, which is applicable to the case provides that "In every indictment for perjury it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged upon the defendant, and by what court, or before whom the oath was taken, without setting forth the bill, answer, information, indictment, declaration, or any part of any proceeding either in law or equity, and without setting forth the commission or authority of the court or person before whom such offence was committed." All that is necessary since that statute is that the indictment should show that there was a proceeding pending before the court, over which the court had jurisdiction, and I think this does sufficiently appear in the present case, and that it is not necessary to tie down the meaning of the words to any particular form of information or complaint. For these reasons I am of opinion that the conviction ought to be affirmed.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am desired to say that the Lord Chief Baron dissents from the judgment of the majority of the court. I had myself prepared a judgment, but after having had the advantage of reading the judgment of my brother Hawkins, I should only be expressing, were I to read it, in less forcible language the conclusions at which he has arrived. Without binding myself to every single expression, I concur in the results, and the train of reasoning in his judgment. And this being the view of the majority of the judges who heard the case, the conviction will be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

MULKERN AND ANOTHER v. LORD. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Building society—Mortgage—Action by member to redeem—Reference to arbitration—Friendly Societies Act.The Friendly Societies Act (10 Geo. 4, c. 56) provides, by sect. 27, that disputes between the society and any member shall be referred to arbitration.The Benefit Building Societies Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32) provides, by sect. 4, that the provisions of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, shall extend to benefit building societies "so far as the same may be applicable."*The respondent was a member of a building society formed under the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and not registered under the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 42 (the Building Societies Act 1874). As such member he had mortgaged property to the society to a large amount. In a suit brought by him for a redemption of the property and an account, the defendants asked that the matter might be referred to arbitration, in accordance with the rules of the society, under the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 27.Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the provisions of this section were not applicable to a dispute where the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee existed.This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (James, Baggallay, and Thesiger, L.JJ.) reversing a decision of Jessel, M.R.The case is reported in 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 265, and 47 L. J. 228, Ch. The action was brought by the respondent against the trustees of the Birkbeck Permanent Benefit Building Society, of which he was a member, for the redemption of property which he had mortgaged to them to secure a loan of 16,000*l.* and interest. The defendants contended that by the rules of the society the matter should be referred to arbitration, and the Master of the Rolls made an order to that effect. The facts appear more fully in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, and in the report in the Court below.The Solicitor-General (Sir. H. Giffard, Q.C.), Waller, Q.C., and W. S. Owen appeared for the appellants, and contended that the effect of the statutes and of the rules of the society was to oust the jurisdiction of the court, and make arbitration compulsory. The whole intention was to prevent costly litigation between these societies and their members:Ex parte Payne*, 5 D. & L. 679;Cutbill v. Kingdom, 1 Ex. 494; 10 L.T. Rep. O. S. 114.Morrison v. Glover (14 L. T. Rep. O. S. 183, 204; 4 Exch. 430) resembles the present case, but there the decision was based on the special rules of the society; so also in Fleming v. Self (24 L. T. Rep. O. S. 101; 1 Kay, 518; 3 De G. M. & G. 997). Here the very dispute contemplated by the rules has arisen. This society exists for the purpose of making advances to its members on mortgage in proportion to the amount of their*shares. Unless the respondent had been a member of the society he could not have been in the position of a mortgagor at all, therefore the rule applies:Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society*, 5 Ch. Div. 726;Reg. v. Trafford, 4 E. & B. 122; 24 L. J. Mag. Cas. 20.Willesford v. Watson (L. Rep. 8 Oh. 473), decided by Lord Selborne, L.C., was a reference to arbitration under the Common Law Procedure Act, which is a totally different thing. [Lord CAIRNS, L.C. referred to Dimsdale v. Giles, 5 H. & N. 753.The cases of friendly societies, which have been cited, stand upon a different footing. Lovejoy v. Mulkern (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77) was an action against the trustees of this society; it went off upon a different point, and this question was never suggested. Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society (ubi sup.), was under the Act of 1874, where the arbitration clause is different. To bring a dispute within this clause it must be one which arises with the party as a member, which this question does not:Prentices v. London, L. Rep. 10 C. P. 679; 33 L. T.

Crisp v. Bunbury (ubi sup.)Reeves v. White (ubi sup.)Wright v. Dealey, 4 H. & C. 209.It is settled by a long course of authority that the jurisdiction of the court cannot be ousted in a case like this:Scott v. Avery, 5 H. of L. Cas. 848.Further, the arbitrators in this case were not properly appointed under the rules and Act.The Solicitor-General was heard in reply.*At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.April 7.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, the appellants in this case are the trustees of the Birkbeck Building Society, the respondent is a member of the society who has mortgaged property to it to secure a loan of 16,000*l.* He now seeks to redeem that mortgage, and to have an account against the appellants of the moneys received by them on sales of part of the mortgaged estate, and of sums which, but for their default, they might have received while in possession of the estate, they having been mortgagees in possession. A decree for account and redemption would, under the circumstances, be a matter of course, if the respondent is not in some way precluded from asking for it. The appellants contend that he is so precluded, and that his only remedy is arbitration. There is not, I think, any doubt that by the rules of this society, standing alone, the respondent would not be prevented* from maintaining a suit for redemption. Rule 91, it is true, states the terms upon which a member is to be entitled to redeem his property before the expiration of the full term for which it was mortgaged, and the 109th and two following rules provide that if any dispute arises between the society and any member, reference shall be made to arbitration. But it is clear that a mere contract of this kind between the parties, unless made obligatory by some Act of Parliament, would not of itself have the effect of ousting the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts. The appellants, however, insist that arbitration has been made obligatory by Act of Parliament, and the Act to which they refer for this purpose is the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56. That is the statute consolidating the law as to friendly societies, societies established for the mutual relief and maintenance of the members in sickness, old age, and infirmity, but not in any way contemplating transactions by way of mortgage between the society and its members, much less mortgage transactions of the magnitude of the one now in question. Various provisions were made by that statute for the economical and expeditious management of the petty transactions of such societies, and among the rest, sect. 27 enacted that provision should be made in the rules of each society, specifying whether a reference of every matter in dispute between the society and a member should be made to a justice of the peace or to arbitrators. If to arbitrators, the award, assumed to be an award for the payment of money, was to be enforced by warrant of two justices, and if the reference was to be made to two justices in the first instance, they were themselves to enforce their order, which was to be final. It is unnecessary to decide the question but I will assume, in favour of the appellants, that, in the case of societies regulated by this statute, the clause to which I have referred would prevent a member suing the society or its trustees, and would oblige him to submit any dispute which he had as a member with the trustees to such an arbitration as is mentioned in the Act. But how does this statute affect the society of the appellants, which is not a friendly society but a building society, established under the 6 & 7 Will. 4 c. 32? The argument of the appellants is this: They say that the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 4, enacts that all the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act (10 Geo. 4, c. 56), so far as the same, or any part thereof, may be applicable to the purpose of any benefit building society, shall extend to the Benefit Building Society and the rules thereof, in the same manner as if the provisions had been expressly re-enacted. Now I will assume that the mortgage transaction between the respondent and the appellants was one warranted by the constitution of the appellants' society. It is a mortgage of an ordinary kind, conveying the legal estate, and constituting the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee; that is a relationship the consequences of which are well known to the law. That relationship creates on the part of the mortgagee a right, in certain events to enter into possession of the mortgaged property, subject to a liability to account for receipts, and for wilful default; a further right to exercise a power of sale, if a power of sale is given; and a right to obtain that which a court alone can give, a decree of foreclosure in the event of nonpayment of the mortgage debt. It creates in the mortgagor a right to obtain from the mortgagee an account, on the footing I have mentioned; and a right to obtain what a court alone can give, a decree for the redemption and reconveyance of the property; a decree which, in default of redemption, dismisses the suit, and thus operates as a decree of foreclosure. This being the relative position, and these the rights of the mortgagor and mortgagee, it appears to me to be impossible that these rights, and especially the rights of foreclosure and redemption, could be enforced or adjusted as is provided by the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 27; and I therefore arrive at the conclusion that the provisions of that Act are not applicable to those purposes of a benefit building society which involve the adjustment of rights created by mortgage. It is unnecessary, in the view which I take of the case, to refer to many of the authorities which were cited during the argument, but I may say that the view taken by Lord Cranworth in Fleming v. Self (3 De G. M. & G. 997) appears to me in substance to coincide with that which I have endeavoured to express. I think the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case is right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion, and I shall not detain your Lordships by going through the various authorities that were cited. Some authorities were cited which appeared at the first blush opposed to each other, and to be decided by judges of considerable authority both one way and the other, indeed, I think I am not mistaken in saying that with regard to one authority the same learned judge, according to the view presented by the argument of counsel, took different views at different periods. But the reality was this: the application to building societies at all of the powers of arbitration arose in this way; building societies had many objects in common with friendly societies, and many objects in common with savings banks, and consequently this was another instance in which the application of the rule of arbitration superseding the ordinary courts of justice was introduced. When one came to look into the Friendly Societies Act one saw that not only was there a choice given between arbitration on the one hand and magistrates on the other, but there was a set form of conviction in each case laid down, and two things had to be determined, whether A. should pay to the trustees a certain definite sum of money, that being the matter in dispute which was to be settled by the speedy mode of arbitration; and whether A. continued to be a member of the society, or was not a member, showing again the nature of the dispute, namely, whether a member had or had not so misconducted himself as to be deserving of expulsion for having broken the rules of the society. When you come to look into the authorities which were cited they amount to this, that where the case went beyond the internal arrangements of the society, and introduced something which might be within their functions in the ordinary course of their business, but yet still outside the whole scheme and scope of the society itself, then a person who had a much larger interest than any of those contemplated among the ordinary members could not be deprived of recourse to the ordinary tribunals of the land; and more especially he could not be so deprived in regard to mortgages, where, as in this case, possession was taken, where there was a question as to an account against the mortgagees for wilful default, and where there was an account also for outlay and expenditure in the mortgaged premises by the mortgagees, and where a number of other questions had arisen, which cannot properly be sifted unless you go to the proper court which has all the means, and the powers of sifting and dealing with them. I think, therefore, when you see what the real nature of the case is, there cannot be a doubt that this tribunal fell short of the requirements of the case, and that the party who sought to have a decree for account and redemption was entitled to it.

LORD O'HAGAN.—My Lords, the substantial question in this case appears to me to have been settled by a series of decisions of very high authority, and, unless your Lordships are prepared to overrule them, I think that the respondent is entitled to succeed. For my part, I see no reason to doubt the correctness of the principles on which they have been founded. On the undisputed facts before us it is plain that the respondent is entitled to maintain his action, unless the appellants can establish that he has been expressly forbidden by law to bring it. The onus is on them. He is a mortgagor, and has received large advances on his mortgage. The appellants are mortgagees. The respondent has failed to make the payments which he ought to have made according to his contract, and the appellants have exercised a power of sale given to them in the usual way, and have sold a portion of the mortgaged premises in discharge of the debt due to their society. A large sum admittedly remains unpaid, and only a part of the premises has been disposed of. In these circumstances the respondent brings his action, and files his claim demanding an account of the money still due by him, an account of the money which the appellants have received, or might have received without wilful default, and an injunction to restrain them from disposing of the premises still remaining unsold. This is a very ordinary claim, and would be considered as a matter of course but for the contention of the appellants that the respondent is a member of their society, and as such is obliged by its rules to submit any disputes between the society and himself to arbitration, pursuant to the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 27. As I have said, the burden of this contention is on the appellants, and the respondent has a right to sustain his action, unless that right is taken from him by clear and express legislation. The privilege of appeal to a court of justice remains with him, unless its jurisdiction is statutorily superseded. The appellants rely (inter alia) on rule 109 of their society, which is in these words: "That in case of any dispute arising between the society and any member thereof, or the legal representatives of any member, reference shall be made to arbitration, pursuant to the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 27, unless such dispute can be amicably arranged by the board of directors and the member, or the legal representatives of such member, within fourteen days from the time such dispute shall be formally brought before the board." And they contend that this rule, which per se would be wholly insufficient to take from the respondent his right of action, is made effective for that purpose by the statute to which it refers. That Act was passed "to consolidate and amend the laws relating to friendly societies." It contained provisions for the cheap and easy settlement of disputes between their members in reference to matters within the scope of their operations, and if we were dealing with such a dispute, as to such a matter, the rule in question, if properly framed according to the statute, would be of binding force. But the society which the appellants represent is a building society, and the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act are only made to affect it by 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, which was passed "for the regulation of benefit building societies," and by its 4th section enacts that those provisions "so far as the same or any part thereof may be applicable to the purposes of any benefit building society," shall extend and apply to such society, in such and the same manner as if those provisions had therein been expressly re-enacted. The real question is whether the provisions are so applicable and I am clearly of opinion that they are not, and should not be so applied. It seems to me necessary merely to state the nature of the transactions to which the appellants ask your Lordships to compel the application of the legal machinery of the Friendly Societies Act, and the character and operation of that machinery, to demonstrate the utter inapplicability of the latter to the former. The building society which the appellants represent appears to have large monetary dealings. The advance to the respondent was originally 12,000*l.*, and 4000*l.* was afterwards added to it. The powers given to the mortgagees were used on the default of the mortgagor, and the taking of the accounts which he is entitled to demand may involve long and laborious calculations, the difficult application of legal principles, and the authoritative interference of a tribunal competent to adjust the complicated relations of the parties, and to carry into effect their relative rights. The claim of the respondent may raise nice questions, e.g., as to wilful default, of which only lawyers can be qualified to dispose, and it invokes the exercise of powers by injunction or otherwise, which belong exclusively to a court of justice. This being the nature of the transaction, what is the machinery which the appellants seek to apply to it? That which manifestly was intended to deal with small affairs amongst humble people, and with simple controversies easily brought to a short and final issue. It aimed at securing mutual assistance to the working classes in circumstances of difficulty, and to settle their ordinary disputes, and enforce their limited demands, at the least expense and in the promptest way. It contemplated the daily dealing of the members one with another, and was in no way adapted to the arrangement of considerable claims, and the solution of doubtful questions. And accordingly the matters in dispute with which the statute intends to meddle are to be referred, according to circumstances, to an arbitrator, or a justice of the peace, the arbitrator to be chosen by the society, and the justice to act in cases submitted to him by its rules. But the exercise of the jurisdiction of either can only result in the levy of a sum of money to be raised by distress, and how small, even so, must be the amounts meant to be dealt with is shown by the trifling fee allowed to the arbitrator upon a reference, the few shillings of costs given on a proceeding before the justice, and the absolute finality of the award or the judgment which may be pronounced. There can be no appeal from either, and they are not to be removed into a court of law, or restrainable by a court of equity.

TURNER v. CRUSH AND ANOTHER.

[H. OF L.]

Such provisions can plainly have been designed only to regulate disputes of a trifling and domestic kind; and it seems to me idle to suppose that an account of the sums due upon the respondents' mortgage, or of the sums received by the appellants, or lost by their wilful default, could possibly be taken by an arbitrator clothed with no special powers, or by an ordinary justice of the peace; whilst the redemption which the respondent seeks they must be absolutely without power to secure to him. I should have been of opinion, if we had no guidance from authority, that, for these reasons, the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act cannot be applicable, and ought not to be applied in the circumstances before us. But, as I have said, that view is maintained by many decisions. Morrison v. Glover (4 Ex. 430) sustains it, and is undistinguishable from the present case. Outbill v. Kingdom (1 Ex. 494), and Reg. v. Trafford (4 E. & B. 122), are to the same effect; and in Fleming v. Self (3 De G. M. & G. 997), to which the Lord Chancellor has referred, Lord Cranworth states succinctly the principle adopted in these and other cases: "The total absence of adequate machinery for enabling arbitrators to enforce any award they might make on the mortgage, in a case like the present, affords cogent evidence that the dispute is not within their competency." And surely the evidence is as cogent with reference to a justice of the peace, if any one should claim for such a functionary the power of interference. In the view I take of the matter it is unnecessary to discuss the question raised at the bar as to the validity of the appointment of the arbitrators. As to the Common Law Procedure Act, I agree with the Court of Appeal that, there being no statutable agreement to refer, no jurisdiction is created under that statute. I am satisfied, on principle and on authority, that the appellants have failed in their contention, and that the judgment should be affirmed with costs.

TURNER v. CRUSH AND ANOTHER. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Inclosure Act—Private right of way—Effect of allotment.

The General Inclosure Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118) enacts (sect. 68) that "all private or occupation ways over, through, and upon the lands to be inclosed which shall not be set out" by the valuer as provided by the section "shall be for ever stopped up and extinguished."

The appellant purchased lands, "together with all ways, &c.," from H. At the time of the purchase an inclosure of the waste of the manor in which the lands sold were situated, was in contemplation, and H. expressly reserved to himself the allotments to which he would be entitled under the award in respect of the lands so sold.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He afterwards sold the allotments to the respondents. The occupiers of the lands sold to the appellant had for forty years, and down to the time of the award under the Inclosure Act, enjoyed a private right of way over the part of the waste comprised in the respondents' allotment, but the award did not set out any way over that allotment.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the effect of the award was to extinguish the right of way previously enjoyed by the occupiers of the appellant's land.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, Cotton, and Thesiger, L.JJ.), reported in 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 192, and 3 Ex. Div. 803.

The action was brought by the respondents against the appellant in the County Court of Essex for damages for a trespass on the plaintiff's land. The defence set up was a right of way over the land in question.

The facts are fully set out in the reports in the court below, and shortly in the head-note above.

The County Court judge decided in favour of the plaintiffs, assessing the damage at 10*l*, and he stated a case for the opinion of the Exchequer Division, under sect. 14 of stat. 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. Upon argument, Kelly, O.B. was in favour of reversing the judgment of the County Court judge, and Huddleston, B. in favour of affirming it. The judgment accordingly stood affirmed, and the defendant obtained leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal. Upon the case coming on, the question was raised whether the appeal would lie since the passing of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876, sect. 20; but the court decided that it had power to hear the appeal (38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 595), which was heard on the merits, and affirmed.

This appeal was then brought to the House of Lords.

The question at issue between the parties was whether certain paths claimed by the appellant over certain land, formerly part of the waste of a manor, which had been included in an allotment made under the General Inclosure Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118) were extinguished by the award made under that Act, not having been set out by the valuer under the provisions of sect. 68.

Philbrick, Q.C. and H. Tindal Atkinson appeared for the appellant.

Grantham, Q.C. and Croome for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, it is necessary in this case to observe what exactly it was which happened in the year 1869, when Mr. Hardcastle sold these lands, which were purchased by the appellant. At that time Mr. Hardcastle was the owner of these lands, and of others in the same neighbourhood. He was not the lord of the manor, but in the neighbourhood of these lands were the wastes of the manor, and among others was the waste along the side of the road in the vicinity of his lands. In that state of things he put up the lands subsequently bought by the appellant for sale by auction, but he reserved to himself expressly the allotments which were to be made of the waste lands under the proceedings then going on for the purpose of inclosure. Notice was, therefore, taken of these proceedings on the face of the sale, and the purchaser was warned that allotments were expected, and that, therefore, if allotments came to be made in respect of the lands offered for sale, these allotments would not pass to the purchaser, but be retained by the vendor. Now, all that was authorised by the General Inclosure Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118). That Act enables persons who expect allotments to be made to them to sell their lands, reserving to themselves the right to the allotments when they come to be made. The purchaser, therefore, was warned that the allotment was in progress, and was put on his guard to be vigilant as to any rights in which he might be interested in respect of that allotment. In that state of things the appellant bought the lands to which I have referred, and subsequently, the allotment having gone on, and having been completed, an award of the pieces of land, the wastes of the manor, intervening between the road and the lands thus sold, was made to persons who claimed under Mr. Hardcastle, and are the present respondents. But before I refer to the allotment I must direct your Lordships' attention to the form of conveyance made to the present appellant. That conveyance passed the property sold to him with the general words, "together with all lands, buildings, yards, gardens, orchards, walls, fences, hedges, ditches, timber, and timber-like trees, woods, underwoods, ways, paths, passages, drains, watercourses, lights, easements, privileges, advantages, and appurtenances, to the said farm lands and hereditaments hereby conveyed, or any of them, belonging or in any wise appertaining, or held, used, or occupied therewith, or known, accepted, or reputed as part, parcel, or member thereof." The County Court judge finds in the special case that, at the time when the conveyance which contained these words was executed, there were track ways, or private roads over a piece of waste to which I have referred, intervening between the road and the lands sold to the appellant, which were used for the purposes of this land; and he finds that these trackways had been so used for upwards of forty years. I think it better therefore to take it that these were valid private rights of way at the time of the conveyance. Beyond all doubt, therefore, as it seems to me, the conveyance carried to the appellant the land which he purchased, and the ways appurtenant to that land, and among other ways those private ways over this waste piece of ground. But then it did that subject to whatever might be the legal consequences of the inclosure then in progress. If that inclosure went off, if it came to nothing, or if the piece of land to which I have referred was not inclosed, then of course the right of the appellant to his private ways would remain unaffected. But if it came to pass that these pieces of waste land were inclosed, as happened under the allotment, then it appears to me that both the appellant and Mr. Hardcastle, or any person claiming under them, must be bound by whatever is the legitimate consequence of the inclosure which was then proceeding under the provisions of the Act of Parliament. Now, what says the Act of Parliament on the subject? It says (sect. 68) that it is to be the duty of those who are making an inclosure to take up the question of private roads over the lands which they are inclosing, and the valuer is to "set out such private or occupation roads and ways through the land to be inclosed as he shall think requisite for the use of the persons interested in such lands, or any of them." And if there be any question whether these roads extend to other lands, that seems to be removed by another enactment. Then it provides for the expenses of setting out those private ways; and it provides that "after such setting out as aforesaid all private or occupation roads or ways over, through, and upon the lands to be inclosed, which shall not be set out as aforesaid, shall be for ever stopped up and extinguished." These are the words of the Legislature, and are as clear and distinct as any words can be; and unless there was some special contract between Mr. Hardcastle and the appellant at the time that he purchased, which bound Mr. Hardcastle not to take advantage of the provisions in this Act of Parliament, or not to allow the title which this Act would give him to be set up as against the appellant, then it appears to me that the operation of the Act is absolutely unfettered so far as Mr. Hardcastle is concerned, and that the appellant has no right to complain of any consequences of that operation. It was for him, knowing that the inclosure was in progress, to set up any case he could before the valuer and commissioners as to the necessity of private roads across these pieces of waste in question. He took no such proceeding, and therefore must, as it seems to me, be held to have remained content with the other means of access he possessed to the land he bought. I can find nothing whatever in the transaction which took place which binds Mr. Hardcastle, or which can be said to bind the respondents taking under him, not to avail themselves of whatever are the legal consequences from the proceedings in the matter of the inclosure. That is the whole case. I must say that I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal is entirely right, and I therefore move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

TURNER v. CRUSH AND ANOTHER.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, I agree for the reasons given by Huddleston, B. in the Exchequer and by Thesiger, L.J. in the Court of Appeal. The words "all ways" are ordinary general words, and as soon as the deed of 1869 was executed these particular rights of way passed to the appellant as legally appurtenant to the land conveyed, and not otherwise, exactly in the same way as such rights of common over the part of the waste now in question, or over any other parts of the wastes to be inclosed, also passed to him thereby. Now, as to all these other rights over the surface of the wastes, it would be inconsistent with the nature and object of the proceedings under the Inclosure Act to suppose that the reservation between these parties of the allotments to be made under these proceedings to the vendor, could possibly have the effect intended by it if all these rights were to remain in the purchaser's favour, as if there had been no inclosure. If so, I cannot see any ground whatever for making a distinction as to rights of way which were equally liable to be extinguished by the process of allotment. The appellant obtained at the time of the conveyance, and by virtue thereof, everything which then belonged to the land, but he did so subject to the pending inclosure, and to the rights which Mr. Hardcastle might acquire in respect of any allotments, wheresoever situate, which might be made to him. If he desired to save the rights of way over this part of the waste which passed to him by the conveyance, as against any title which either Mr. Hardcastle or anyone else might acquire thereto by allotment, it was for him to take the necessary steps thereto for his own protection, as much as if he had been the original owner of the purchased land, and not a purchaser from Mr. Hardcastle. The appellant's argument treats the general words in the deed of conveyance as if they had been a contract or covenant by Mr. Hardcastle to grant new easements over any land which he might acquire by allotment under the Inclosure Act; but for such a construction there is, in my opinion, no ground.

SWANSTON v. THE TWICKENHAM LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH. (a)

Local Board of Health—Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), ss. 45, 46, 144—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 16, 308—Sewer—"Man-hole"—Compensation or purchase.

A "man-hole" or side entrance into a sewer, for the purpose of cleansing it, is part of a "sewer" within the meaning of the 45th section of the Public Health Act 1848, and the 16th section of the Public Health Act 1875, and the local authorities may construct a "man-hole" on any land within their district without first purchasing the land required for the purpose, the landowner being entitled to compensation only.

Decision of Fry, J. reversed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Fry, J.

The hearing in the court below is reported in 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 208, where the facts of the case are sufficiently stated.

The judge below having granted an injunction to restrain the defendants from making man-holes in the plaintiff's land until they had acquired a right in the land by purchase, the defendants appealed from his decision.

J. Pearson, Q.C. and Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellants.—A "man-hole" is part of a sewer within the meaning of sect. 45 of the Act of 1848, and sect. 16 of the Act of 1875, and by sect. 144 of the former Act, and sect. 308 of the latter Act compensation is all that the plaintiff can claim. They cited

Rodericks v. Ashton Local Board, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 170, 328; L. Rep. 5 Ch. Div. 328;

North London Railway Company v. Metropolitan Board of Works, Johns, 405;

White v. Hindley Local Board of Health, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 460; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 219.

(a) Reported by H. PRAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Higgins, Q.C. and E. J. Payne, for the respondent.—We say that a "man-hole" is not part of a sewer. A sewer is a horizontal structure through which the sewage flows, while a man-hole is a vertical structure through which men descend into the sewer. The defendants propose not to carry a sewer through our land, but to sink a shaft, and they have no power to do so without first buying the land. They cited

Taylor v. The Corporation of Oldham, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 696; L. Rep. 4 Ch. Div. 395;

Wood v. Veal, 5 B. & Ald. 454.

Pearson, Q.C., in reply.

BRETT, L.J.—I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with the decision of Fry, J. in this case. It seems to me that what we have to determine is whether within the meaning of either statute this is part of a sewer. Now I think exactly the same question arises under both Acts of Parliament (the Public Health Acts 1848 & 1875). I cannot see, with regard to the question that we have to decide, that there is any difference between the two statutes. The two statutes seem to be identical except that in the second there is a power of compulsory purchase. With regard to the manholes, or whatever they are called, in the two roads, I cannot see myself that there is any difference between the cases of the two roads. If it were necessary to determine it, I should upon the plans and evidence say that the pavement or the part called W.W.W.W. in Station-road is a part of the street. I should say also, taking the plans and evidence into account, that the Avenue-road is a place laid out and intended for a street. No doubt the property in the land below the surface of the Station-road belongs to the owner of the land, who probably is the plaintiff, and certainly the land in Avenue-road belongs to the plaintiff. If it were necessary to determine whether within the meaning of this Act of Parliament these streets are private ground or not, I should have thought that no part of Station-road was private ground in that sense, and Avenue-road, although it is private property, and not yet dedicated to the public, is an intended street. However, it seems to me to be immaterial to consider that, because, supposing they are both private land, the notice is to be given, and if this structure is a part of a sewer, then it is immaterial whether the land is private land or not or whether it is a street or an intended street. The whole question, therefore, is whether this is a part of a sewer within the meaning of the statutes. Now, let us for a moment consider it. The way it strikes me is this: it is either within the 46th sect. of the Act, or it is within the 45th sect., or it is not within the statute at all. Now can it be that it is a casus omissus, and that it is not within the statute at all? It is the means of getting into that part of the sewer which requires cleaning. The statute insists that the persons who have to deal with these sewers shall keep them clean, and is it to be supposed that, although the statute insists that the sewers shall be kept clean, the statute has omitted something which is the means of getting to them in order to clean them? It would be a monstrous conclusion, as it seems to me, to suppose that this is not within the statute at all. Then, if it is within the statute, it is either within the 45th section, or it is within the 46th section. The 46th section empowers the local board to construct such reservoirs, sluices, engines, and other works as may be necessary, and provides that it may cause all or any of such sewers to communicate with and be emptied into such places as may be fit and necessary. How can it be said that a man-hole is a work which is necessary, or which causes all or any of the sewers to communicate with and be emptied into the place which is fit and necessary? That has nothing to do with it. It is not that kind of work at all. It is plain to my mind that it is not within the 46th section. Then it follows logically, as it seems to me, that it is within the 45th section. It is a shaft. It is not used for the purpose of passing sewage through it. That is quite clear; but it is built structurally as part of the sewer, for the sewer purposes, and for the purpose of making the sewer more effectively a sewer. It is said that it is only put at the junctions. That is not true. It is wanted more at junctions than at other places; but, if there were no junctions in the drains all through the system, it would be necessary to have these man-holes, in order to get at the drain for the purpose of cleansing the drain, or to see to the drain being cleansed. It was built for that purpose, and therefore it is structurally, as it seems to me, part of the drain, although no part of the sewage is made to go through it. If that is so, it is within the terms of the 45th section, and it is a part of the sewer. Now, what Fry, J. has held is this: that it is not a part of the sewer, that it is a work within the 46th section, and for all works within the 46th section there must be the purchase of land before the works are made. With regard to the second point, as to land which is required for the purpose of reservoirs, sluices, engines, and works such as are described in the 46th section, whether there must be purchase of land, or whether they are to be the subject-matters of compensation, I desire to give no opinion on the present occasion, because it does not seem to me to be necessary to do so. It may be that, for the things described in the 46th section, under the first Act there must have been a purchase or agreement, and it may be that under the second Act there must be compensation. However, it is not necessary to decide that because we hold that the present case is within the 45th section, and, with regard to matters within the 45th section, it is clear to my mind that the only right which the person has who is injured by anything done under the 45th section is a right to compensation. The plaintiff therefore is not entitled to the decree or order that has been made by Fry, J.—that is to say, to an injunction until the land, or his rights in the land through which this thing is made, be purchased and paid for, and therefore I think that the order was wrong, and must be reversed. The plaintiff is entitled only to compensation.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is no doubt true that the existence of a man-hole may cause greater inconvenience to a person whose property adjoins, or through whose property the sewer is made, than if the sewer had had at that place no man-hole. Of course the greater or less inconvenience is not an argument which can prevent us putting a reasonable construction upon the words used in the Act of Parliament, especially when we consider this, that there is in the Act of Parliament a provision for giving compensation to anyone who is injured by putting in exercise and in force the powers of the Act. I do not think it can be contended for a moment that that does not apply to any inconvenience arising from the construction of a sewer, whether involving a man-hole or not, because it is done in exercise of the powers given by the Act, and for any loss or injury sustained in consequence of it, compensation is given by the 144th section. The question we have to consider is in substance whether or not this case comes within the 45th or the 46th section of the Act of 1848. There is a substantial difference between the sections. If it comes within the 46th section, I do not see that which gives power to the local board or authorities to do what is there referred to in any land whatever, but only general power to do certain things, and it may very well be that under the 46th section power is given to them to do certain things as to which they are to apply the funds at their disposal, but not, on the contrary, to enable them to go into another man's land, and do what is pointed out. They cannot under the section go into another man's land, but they must buy it. In the 45th section power is given to them to do the things pointed out in any land under a street or any other land. The substantial question is whether the present case comes within the 45th or the 46th section. It is not necessary, to my mind, to decide what the effect of the 46th section is, and although I do not dissent from Fry, J. as to that, I think the present case is not within the 46th, and that it is within the 45th section. I think these openings are clearly part of the sewer—a sewer properly made, and that it is right and proper as a matter of construction of the sewer, and not for the purpose of constructing some work auxiliary to the use of the sewer, that there should be these openings in the sewer. That being so, and these openings being strictly a part of the sewer, they are within the 45th section, and come within the term "sewer," to which we must give a reasonable construction. Of course that obviates the necessity of their buying the land, but leaves the local board, or whoever the authorities are, liable to the clause of the Act of Parliament, which makes them subject to the responsibility of paying compensation. The two Acts are precisely the same, and therefore it is not necessary to deal with the Act of 1875, and the question of the Avenue-road sewer separately from the other question.

JAMES, L.J.—For certain reasons I have not given a judgment in this case, but I may say that I have heard it all through, and I entirely concur in the judgment.

GLOSSOP v. THE HESTON AND ISLEWORTH LOCAL BOARD. (a)

Nuisance—Pollution of stream—Local board—Omission to perform statutory duty—Action by individual injured—Mandamus—Public Health Act 1875.

In an action brought in July 1876 by a landowner, whose property was situate within the district of the defendants, to restrain them from permitting a brook which flowed through his land to be polluted with sewage, the plaintiff alleged that the pollution of the stream was caused by the omission of the defendants to discharge their statutory duty of constructing sewers to carry the drainage of the whole district. The defendants were not constituted as a local board till Nov. 1875, and they alleged that they had not been guilty of unreasonable delay in trying to place the drainage of the district in a satisfactory state. The action was commenced in July 1876. Malins, V.C. having granted an injunction in the terms of the claim, the defendants appealed.

Held (reversing the decision of Malins, V.C.), that the defendants had not been guilty of any neglect to perform the parliamentary duty cast on them as the sanitary authority of a particular district, and that, even if there had been any default on their part in that respect, the present action could not be maintained.

The local board were liable, just as any other owner of a sewer, for an unlawful use of it to the injury of any other person, but the statute imposed on them no duty to any particular individual.

If there is any neglect or refusal by a local board to perform their public duties, the proper remedy is by an application for a mandamus to the Queen's Bench Division in the exercise of its prerogative jurisdiction over all public bodies.

There is no precedent in the practice of the Court of Chancery for granting a mandatory injunction to compel a public body to do something for the benefit of an individual.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Malins, V.C.—The plaintiff, Mr. F. Glossop, the owner and occupier of an estate known as Silver Hall, Isleworth, brought his action against the local board for Heston and Isleworth, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from permitting sewage or water polluted with sewage or other offensive matter to pass through the drains or channels under their control into the river Crane in such a manner as to render the water in the river at or near the plaintiff's residence unfit for use by the plaintiff, or injurious to the health and comfort of the persons resident on such premises. The river Crane passed through the plaintiff's pleasure grounds and garden for a distance of 200 yards, and within thirty yards of his residence. The plaintiff alleged that formerly the river was a clear running stream, with a clean gravel bottom, and full of clean feeding fish. Water plants of various kinds grew in the stream, and the water was used for bathing by some of the plaintiff's family and other persons, and was fit for ordinary domestic purposes; but now the water, as it passed through the plaintiff's garden, was always turbid with faecal matter more or less disintegrated. Much solid sewage matter might occasionally be seen floating on the surface of it. The bottom was seldom visible, and was found to be covered for the most part with black offensive mud. No water plants grew in it, and none of the clean feeding fish ever visited it. The stream frequently gave off an offensive smell, and was a constant nuisance to the plaintiff and his family, and in hot weather he was unable to permit the windows of his house overlooking the stream to be left open all night in consequence of the smell from it. The plaintiff further alleged that his family had suffered from attacks of low fever and other forms of disease, which, so far as could be ascertained, arose from the poisonous gases given off by the water of the river Crane. He then charged that the altered condition of the water was caused by the drains and sewers flowing into it, and which were under the defendants' control; that the district was not provided with any system of sewers, that no attempt was made to deodorize or disinfect the water, and that it was their duty under sect. 15 of the Public Health Act of 1875, to remove the cause of nuisance, to make such efficient drains as to render the water free from the pollution complained of, and to make the locality a healthy residence for persons in the neighbourhood of the river as it formerly was.

The action was commenced in July 1876. The defendants were first constituted under the Public Health Act in Nov. 1875, the previous sanitary authority of the district having been the rural sanitary authority of the Brentford Union. Under sect. 15 of that Act the duty of the board was to "cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act."

By their statement of defence the defendants denied many of the plaintiffs' allegations as to the condition of the river. They admitted that the stream was not now so pure as it was many years ago, when the neighbourhood was thinly populated; but they stated it was not in the condition of pollution represented by the plaintiff, and that there was nothing which should render the residence of the plaintiff unhealthy. They also alleged that the river had been in the same state for the last twenty years and upwards. They had not at present had time to provide a proper system of sewers for their district, but they intended as speedily as possible to do so, and they were now preparing to construct sewage works, and to procure an Act of Parliament which would enable them to carry out the scheme.

When the case first came before the Vice-Chancellor in March 1878, a considerable amount of evidence was produced before the court, but it was of so contradictory a nature that his Lordship proposed to appoint a scientific man to inspect the locality, and to make a report to the court upon the subject. That had been done by consent of the parties, and the report of Lieut.-Col. Hope, the gentleman appointed, was to the effect that Mr. Glossop had a real and substantial grievance, though it was not so great as the plaintiff imagined. It might also be that the plaintiff, looking back to the days of his boyhood, invested the river of those days with a purity which modern science would not have certified to. Nevertheless, there was more putrescent matter discharged into the stream than it could oxidise. He believed that the report which had been furnished by a medical man as to the unhealthy state of the water was not exaggerated, and that a species of fever might be produced from the exhalations from the water.

On the 4th June 1868 the Vice-Chancellor came to the conclusion on the evidence that the plaintiff had good grounds for his complaints, and his Lordship granted an injunction.

The defendants appealed.

Higgins, Q.C. and Methold, for the appellants, contended that even assuming the nuisance to be such as the plaintiff alleged, the defendants were not responsible to him, inasmuch as they had done no act to cause the nuisance, but, at the most, had neglected or omitted to perform the duty imposed on them by section 15 of the Public Health Act of 1875 of making such sewers as might be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of the Act. If they had been guilty of any neglect, that would not justify a private person in bringing a distinct action because he had not the advantages he otherwise would be entitled to have if the Act had been properly put into execution; the remedy in that case being by an application to the Queen's Bench Division for a mandamus, in the exercise of its prerogative jurisdiction over all public bodies. They, however, contended that the defendants had not been guilty of neglect of such duty; and that the neglect of any previous board to exercise the powers given them by Acts of 1848 and 1872, could not be imputed to the present board.

Glasse, Q.C. and Decimus Sturges, for the plaintiff, contended that in delaying to carry into execution the powers of the Act, the defendants clearly rendered themselves liable to an action. Although the fact of prospective nuisance was not in itself a ground for the interference of the court, yet if some degree of present nuisance existed, the court would take into account its probable continuance and increase. Here, unless the cause of nuisance, which was under the defendants' control, was removed, the plaintiff's residence would be rendered still more unhealthy. The court might take into consideration the delay of the previous local board and attribute that to the present defendants who were also liable for any negligence on the part of their servants. JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that, whatever may have led to this action, it was commenced through a misapprehension of what the plaintiff's legal rights were against the board. It is manifest from the form of the claim and the evidence, that the action was not based upon any act whatever done by the defendants. It was based entirely upon their alleged neglect to perform the parliamentary duty cast upon them as the sanitary authority of a particular district. It is said that this is a serious matter to the plaintiff and to the public generally. It appears to me that, if this action could be sustained, it would be a very serious matter indeed for every ratepayer in England in any district in which there is any legal authority upon whom duties are cast for the benefit of the locality. If this action could be maintained I do not see why it could not in a similar manner be maintained by every owner of land in that district, who could allege that if there had been a proper system of sewage his property would be much improved. I do not see why, if that is so, every owner of property in London who has not received the benefit he ought to have received from a complete system of sewage carried out by the Metropolitan Board of Works, may not say "my court or alley is not properly cared for," and who might not bring an action against the Metropolitan Board of Works, or any local board having duties in the district, and why he would not be entitled to bring it on the very day the boards were constituted, and the duties cast upon them. According to my view there is no sufficient principle to sustain that, and no authority which comes near it, except the authority of the case before Hall, V.C., which I will refer to. Let us see how the rights and liabilities stand under the Act of Parliament. By the 13th section, all existing and future sewers within the district are vested in the sanitary authority, and vested in them, to a certain extent, as owners. It is difficult to say whether the exact ownership is the same as it is with regard to the surface of a road as to persons having control of the roads. The sewers qua sewers are under their control and vested in them; and by that section alone, as it appears to me, they are under the same liabilities, and have the same defence in respect of any alleged liability, as any private owner of a sewer would have. But the case here is not based upon any common law nuisance or any nuisance or damage existing irrespective of the Act of Parliament, but upon the alleged neglect to comply with the provisions of the Act. Now, as far as I can make out, the greater part of the mischief alleged here is, mischief caused by a brewery, which we know historically to have existed from the time of the seige of Brentford in the time of Oliver Cromwell, and which therefore had apparently acquired a legal right that could not have been interfered with under the 14th and 18th sections of the Act. The rights are to be preserved if they require preservation. By the 14th section any person who "has acquired a right to use such sewer shall be entitled to use the same or any sewer substituted in lieu thereof to the same extent as he would or might have done if the purchase had not been made." Then the 18th section provides that any local authority may from time to time enlarge any sewer," and so on, on condition of providing a sewer as effectual for the use of any person who may be deprived in pursuance of this section of the lawful use of any sewer, "provided that the discontinuance, closing up, or destruction of any sewer shall be so done as not to create a nuisance." Now, therefore, they were in this position: there were certain persons who had a lawful use of the sewer as the law then stood. If any person were using any existing sewer unlawfully as against the plaintiff in respect of his rights of property as they stood before this Act, he had his remedy against them, and was in no way deprived by the Act nor by anything the defendants had done or permitted to be done, of any right he had against any person who had not acquired a prescriptive right to throw the sewage water or foul matter so as to affect his property. That, as it appears to me, was the right, and that was really all that was determined in those cases to which we have been referred. There are a long series of cases of which Goldsmid v. The Tunbridge Wells Commissioners (supra) may be considered as the principal example. That was a case in which what was done was itself a legal wrong—a legal nuisance not justifiable or excusable, unless it could have been justified or excused under the Act of Parliament and it was held that the Act did not justify or excuse it, and the defendants not being able to allege justification or excuse were put in exactly the same position as any private person would have been of being restrained—not of having a mandatory injunction to make works or do anything of that kind—but put under an injunction to restrain the continuance of that which was, independently of the Act, a legal wrong and not justified or excused by the Act. That will be found to be exactly what occurred in every one of the cases referred to except the case before Hall, V.C., in which, however, there may have been exactly the same thing because we have not the facts sufficiently clear before us to state positively that that was true in that case; but I see no reason to doubt that there the board had got a sewer vested in them, which according to the view that the Vice-Chancellor took of the facts, would have made them liable, as a private owner of that sewer would have been, unless they could escape from the jurisdiction of the court by reason of their particular character; and what the learned judge decided was that they were not entitled to escape from the jurisdiction of the court, which so fixed itself upon any private person, by reason of any particular character which was alleged as the ground of their immunity. That is the position upon the facts as to the transfer, and the vesting of the sewers. Now what are the duties the board have to perform? Their main duty is described in the 15th section: "Every local board shall keep in repair all sewers belonging to them and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act." Then there are certain powers to take the sewer under carriage roads and so on, independently of rights; and then comes the 17th section which I read as being a proviso. It was so expressed in the other Acts of Parliament. It provides that "Nothing in this Act shall authorise any local authority to make or use any sewer, drain, or outfall for the purpose of conveying sewage or filthy water into any natural stream or watercourse," and so on. Supposing there had been a prior Act of Parliament authorising the board to make the sewer; or supposing, before this board was constituted, their predecessors or they themselves had acquired by actual grant from the absolute owner of a canal, pond, lake, or stream of water which nobody but that one proprietor had any interest in whatever—supposing they had acquired by grant from such a person a right to make a sewer, it appears to me impossible to say that this section would avoid any such grant, or deprive them of the right they had acquired under such grant. It would be equally impossible to say that the section applies to the defendants in this case unless they find it necessary to excuse or justify themselves in what they are doing under that Act of Parliament. Then they are in this position: They are to cause the whole district to be drained; that is to say, they have no particular duty cast upon them with reference to any particular individual, but it is a duty cast upon them for the effectual draining of the whole district. How is that to be done? It is impossible that that can be done except upon some deliberate scheme. It is a system of sewage which requires to be prepared and to be put into operation. They have practically no compulsory powers. They are to drain the whole district, and their duty is to the district, and the limitation of the exercise of that duty in sect. 17 is a thing that affects, not only the district, but any running stream which may be affected by what they are doing. How are they to do it? It cannot be expected that the local board are to do it with their own hands except by the employment of labour to be paid for out of the rates of the district. They cannot do it without going on somebody's property, and it is utterly impossible they could make a single drain or sewer without acquiring property for that purpose. Then we must consider how that property is to be acquired. By part 5 of the Act they have power to contract for carrying the Act into execution. Then "any local authority may for the purposes and subject to the provisions of this Act purchase or take on lease, sale, or exchange any lands." Then sect. 176 says, "With respect to the purchase of lands by a local authority for the purposes of this Act the following regulations shall be observed;" and the first subdivision of that section states that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts 1845, 1860, and 1869 shall be incorporated with this Act with a certain exception mentioned. Then, before they put in force any of the powers of the Act they must publish once, at least, in each of the consecutive weeks in the month of November in some local newspaper circulated in their district, an advertisement describing shortly the nature of the undertaking in respect of which the lands are proposed to be taken. Now, I believe this board was constituted in November, and therefore they could not have advertised in each of the consecutive weeks in that month. Then they are to serve a notice in the month of December on every owner or reputed owner, defining the particular lands intended to be taken. Then they are to present a petition, under their seal, to the Local Government Board, stating what they are going to do, and then the "Local Government Board shall take such petition into consideration, and may either dismiss the same or direct a local inquiry as to the propriety of assenting to the prayer of such petition, but until such inquiry has been made no provisional order shall be made affecting any lands without the consent of the owners;" and then, "after the completion of such inquiry the Local Government Board may by provisional order empower the local authority to put in force, with reference to the lands referred to in such order, the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement." It then provides, "That the notices required to be given by the Act in the month of November and December may be given in the month of September and October, or of October and November, but in either of such last-mentioned cases an inquiry preliminary to the provisional order to which such notices refer, shall not be held until the expiration of one month from the last day of the second of the two months in which the notices are given," that is to say, they are put in exactly the same position as a company is which requires to get the compulsory clauses. These local bodies are able to get the substitute for an Act of Parliament; that is to say, an order of the Local Government Board authorising them to acquire lands compulsorily, being satisfied, of course, that the whole thing is right. They cannot do anything of that kind until they have made a scheme which they can submit to the Local Government Board, and you cannot say that these persons were guilty of neglect up to the month of May, because, being only elected in Nov. 1875, they were absolutely powerless to comply with that section that they should cause such sewers to be made as should be necessary for effectually draining the district for the purposes of the Act. Then it appears to me they were not guilty of neglect; but if they had been guilty of any refusal, such as is necessary for the purpose of applying for a mandamus, or guilty of any mala fides, for it must be brought up to that to make it equivalent to a refusal to take steps, that is not the ground of an action by any proprietor in the district who is deprived, as he says, and it may be so in fact, of the benefit he expected to derive from the performance of their public duty. If the neglect to perform a public duty for the whole of the district is to enable anybody and everybody to bring a distinct action, or to file a distinct claim, because he has not had the advantages he otherwise would be entitled to have if the Act had been properly put into execution, it appears to me the country would be buying its immunity from nuisances at a very dear rate indeed by the substitution of a far more formidable nuisance in the litigation and expense that would be occasioned by opening a door to litigiousness, or to persons who might be anxious to make profit and costs out of this Act of Parliament. If there has been any neglect or refusal by such a board to perform its public duties it appears to me the proper remedy would be by an application for a mandamus. This suit is not, in substance or in form, an application for a mandamus. It is said to be an application which shall have the effect of a mandatory injunction; that is to say, the application is in form to restrain the defendants "from permitting sewage, or water polluted with sewage or other offensive matter, to pass through the drains or channels under their control into the river Crane in such a manner as to render the water of the river injurious to the plaintiff." That is an injunction to restrain them from doing that which is wrong; that is to say, if the thing itself were legally wrong, independent of the neglect to make an effectual system of drainage, it would be a right thing to say, "You have got a sewer, and you are permitting the sewage to flow so as to be a legal wrong to me." Now, under colour of that, it is said we are to grant what would be a mandatory injunction which would operate as a mandamus to compel them to take all the steps necessary for putting into force the provisions of the Act of Parliament. I am of opinion there is no ground for that. We are dealing with a matter of Chancery jurisdiction, and the Court of Chancery never granted a mandamus to a public body to compel it to do things for the benefit of private persons who might be benefited thereby. A mandamus to compel a man to erect a building was never granted except in one case, I think, where a railway company had to make a bridge—it was an injunction granted where a railway company, in severing a man's land, did not make a bridge. A mandamus might, on proper evidence of refusal, of which I can see none here, be applied for in the Queen's Bench Division for the exercise of its great prerogative jurisdiction to compel all bodies having an authority under an Act of Parliament to perform the duties the Legislature has imposed on them. That mandamus might be applied for by any individual who could show a sufficient cause, and the court might grant it if it could see that something the public body ought to do was neglected to be done. The statute that has created that duty has given a very special provision for enforcing it, a provision which is very material in considering what the court ought to do, and that is, that there is power to apply to the Local Government Board, and if it thinks the local authority has made default in providing the district with sufficient sewers, or in maintaining the existing sewers, or in providing the district with a supply of water, and so on, they can apply for a mandamus, or they may appoint some person (which is a very special additional duty) to do the duty, and to order the costs of doing that duty to be provided for at the expense of the district by its own authority. There is that remedy given which seems to me to make the whole system tolerably complete. The Legislature has provided a particular duty and a mode by which that can be enforced. It would not oust the jurisdiction of any court, either that of the old Court of Chancery, or any division of the existing High Court, in the case of any legal wrong done. I use the words "legal wrong" as distinct from neglect to perform the duties cast upon them by this Act. If this board were to create a nuisance which they were not excused from; if they were, in the apparent exercise of their duties, using or making a sewer which would convey sewage or filthy water into any natural stream or watercourse, or any canal, pond, or lake, that would not prevent the jurisdiction attaching which existed before, or prevent it being exercised, to remedy the wrong being done. That again is the case of an actual legal wrong accompanied with a local damage such as in those cases at common law, where actions for damages have been maintained against such bodies. If the same thing had occurred here—if this local board, while in the course of exercising its duties and rights under this Act, were to make a hole or cut a drain in a public thoroughfare, or put a heap of stones or drain pipes unlighted, as in the case of Foreman v. The Mayor of Canterbury—if anything of that kind were done, and damage arose which could be attributed to the unlawful neglect of the persons they employed, they would be liable for it just as any person making a hole and not sufficiently lighting it, or putting a heap of stones or other matter and not sufficiently warning people against it, would be liable. But those cases have no application to this case where all that can be alleged against the defendants, even if the allegation were sustained, which it does not appear to me to be, is that they have not, within a reasonable time, performed the public duty which they owed, not to the plaintiff, but to the district of which the plaintiff is an inhabitant, if the plaintiff had suffered any legal wrong. The only case the plaintiff has alleged or attempted to prove, is that he has not been relieved from a damage to which he was subject before this body were called into existence—that he has not been relieved from that damage in the way he hoped to be, and as he would be if they had done their work in draining this district. Under all these circumstances I am of opinion that the order of the Vice-Chancellor cannot be sustained, and that the action was brought upon an inaccurate view of the relations between the several landed proprietors in the district and the sanitary board.

BRETT, L.J.—It seems to me that in this case the defendants have not been guilty of any wrongful act or neglect which gives the plaintiff a right to a remedy of any kind; but if they had been guilty of any neglect the proper remedy has not been asked for, neither has the proper court been applied to. I should be very sorry to hold that this river was not in a state which gave reasonable cause of complaint to the plaintiff. There was conflicting evidence on the subject, but looking to the correspondence between the parties, and to the report made to the Vice-Chancellor by Colonel Hope, which it seems to me was only a report and not a binding decision, which report therefore we might have disregarded, but which we ought not to disregard unless convinced it was wrong—looking to the correspondence, the report, and the evidence I should be sorry to disagree with the Vice-Chancellor as to his holding that there was a substantial grievance with reference to the state of this river, and that it was a substantial grievance affecting the plaintiff. I should also be sorry to hold that the drainage of the district was in a satisfactory state. On the contrary, it seems to me to be made out as a matter of fact that the drainage of the district is in an unsatisfactory state, and in a state which requires remedying. I should also be extremely sorry to hold that it is not the duty of the defendants to cure the unsatisfactory condition of the drainage of the district; and it seems to me that that duty is imposed upon them by the 15th section of the Public Health Act. No district can be said to be satisfactorily or effectually drained for the purposes of that Act where any part of the drainage causes a nuisance, so that if the drainage running through any open ditch causes in that ditch a nuisance, or if the drainage running into any stream causes that stream to be offensive, then so long as that state of things exists, it seems to me the district cannot be said to be effectually drained for the purposes of the Act, which purposes are that the district may be in a sanitary condition. I agree with James, L.J., that the 17th section would not impose any obligation upon them on the mere ground that they turned sewage into a running stream, or that they allowed sewage to run into a stream or pond without having freed the sewage from excrementitious or other foul or noxious matter. But I still think, taking the 15th, 17th, 19th, 91st, and 92nd sections together, that although the owner of the stream or pond could not object to the mere fact of their draining sewage into his stream or pond, yet that if the sewage is in a stream in the district so as to make that stream offensive and dangerous, that district is not effectually drained, and that the local authority would be omitting to do their duty if they did not drain it. These defendants therefore are, as it seems to me, in this position—they have a district which is not effectually drained, within the statute; they are bound to cure that defect, and to do so, among other instances, with this result, that they should prevent the river Crane from being offensive to the inhabitants of the district, and among others, to the plaintiff. But the defendants had a duty to perform, and they had certain powers given to them by and through which they were to perform that duty. It is obvious that the remedy they are called upon to apply is one of the utmost difficulty. They have under their control only one district. They are not to be allowed to drain into a running stream so as to make it offensive; they are not to be allowed to drain into the Thames so as to make it offensive, and they have no right to make any works which shall create a nuisance to any individual, and yet it is said they are to effectually drain their district. How are they to do it? Where are they to take the sewage? I agree with what has been suggested, that it is most difficult for them to do it, although perhaps not impossible, unless they can make arrangements with the authorities of other districts so as to have some combined effort by which to get the sewage away to a considerable and safe distance. They therefore, have a very difficult duty to perform, and one that must naturally require a considerable time for its accomplishment, and anybody who has to deal with them in, finding fault with the ineffectiveness of what they have done, is bound to look at their conduct with the greatest indulgence. Now, it seems to me made out in fact, that they have never refused to endeavour to perform the duty which is imposed on them, but on the contrary they have always, when challenged, admitted their duty and have answered that they were endeavouring to perform it. Then has there been any neglect so great as to enable anybody to say that by long and continuous negligence, they are really refusing to perform their duty, although they do not refuse expressly? Taking into account the difficulty of their position and the magnitude of the operation they must perform, it would not be right to say so; and even up to the time of the hearing it is impossible to say they have been so negligent as to enable any court to hold that they were refusing to perform the public duty imposed upon them. Under these circumstances what is their position with regard to the law? They have done no wrongful act. It is suggested that it might have been proved they have done some wrongful act, but I cannot accede to that argument. It seems to me that the statement of claim, which must have been drawn before any act of the defendants that could mislead the course of the litigation had occurred, assumes that the plaintiff could not state any act done by the defendants which was a wrongful act, but that his claim was founded solely upon a neglect by the defendants to perform their duty under the Act; and it also seems to me that the paragraphs alluded to in the statement of defence make the main defence of the defendants this, that they had never refused to perform their duty, but on the contrary had always been endeavouring to perform their duty. So that they accepted the charge made against them in the statement of claim to be a charge of refusal or neglect to perform their duty; that is to say, in the statement of defence they have set up the very defence for which they have argued throughout this long discussion. The defendants having done no act, it seems to me that the Court of Chancery has never, without some act done by such a body as this, granted what is called a mandatory injunction. The Court of Chancery has never granted a mandatory injunction which could be in effect a mandamus against a public body, in order to force them merely to enter upon and to do their duty. There was a long list of cases cited to us, and I watched them carefully, and there was not one of them in which the defendants had not done an act which had caused an injury to a private individual and was unjustified by any statute; and which was such an act as if, done by a private individual, would have given a cause of action at law. That being so, and that being done which might have given a claim for damages in a common law court, the Court of Chancery in those days gave a large remedy which it had the power to give, and which the common law courts had not. A common law court could only give damages, but the Court of Chancery could not only give damages if it thought right, but either with damages or instead of damages, they granted a mandatory injunction against the defendants directing them to cease from continuing the act which was a wrongful act against the individual. That is the proper function of a mandatory injunction, and they never gave it in any any other cases. To-day the case of Foreman v. The Mayor of Canterbury (supra) has been cited, but that comes within the category of all the other cases. There the servant of the defendants first of all placed a heap of stones on the highway, and then left that heap of stones without being lighted. There was an act done, but an act done which he was entitled to do, namely, the laying of the heap of stones on the road, if he did it with reasonable care; but he did it without reasonable care because he left it there in the dark without being lighted. That obviously would give a cause of action. The case in which no act was done, and where it was mere negligence was the case of Hartwell v. The Ryde Commissioners (supra). That was an exceptional case. Lord Blackburn, one of the judges, put it upon the statute which imposed that duty, and which statute not only imposed on those commissioners the duty to keep the highway in repair, but had an express enactment that if they did not, they should be liable to an indictment. He founds his judgment upon that, and applies the well-known common-law rule, that if people do that which, as against the public, amounts to misdemeanour and lays them open to an indictment, and if besides the injury to the public, they so do it as to do any injury to a private individual, that individual may maintain an action for damages for the breach of the statutory enactment which lays them open to an indictment. Now, with regard to the case before Hall, V.C., my impression is, that the predecessors of the defendants there, had been the people who diverted sewage into artificial sewers, and by those artificial sewers diverted sewage into the drain which belonged to the plaintiff. If so, their predecessors had done an act which would bring the case within the ordinary principle of all the other cases; and, probably, in that case there was some enactment that carried down the obligation of what their predecessors had done to the defendants, and so made the defendants liable also under the ordinary rule, as indeed, I am inclined to think that, under this statute, if the former board had done an act that would have given the plaintiff here a right to damages or to a remedy, and the effect of that act continued in the defendants' time, the defendants would have been liable for the continuance of the consequence of that act, and would have been liable to an injunction. Therefore, it seems to me that the case is not brought within the rule that would enable the Court of Chancery to grant a mandatory injunction. Then it is said that nevertheless the defendants are open to a mandamus to do their duty. Now supposing they had neglected or refused to do their duty, then I think they would have been liable to a mandamus, but not to a mandamus to be granted by the Court of Chancery. It would have been a prerogative mandamus, as it is called, to a public body to enter upon and do their duty. That, under the Judicature Act, as it was before, is a matter that can be taken only in the Court of Queen's Bench. I think the mandamus spoken of in the 8th sub-section of the 25th section of the Judicature Act is not the prerogative mandamus, but only a mandamus which may be granted to direct the performance of some act—of something to be done which is the result of an action where an action will lie. Therefore, supposing the defendants here had refused to enter upon or to perform their duty, they would have been liable to a mandamus, but only to a mandamus granted by the Court of Queen's Bench, and not here. It seems to me their conduct has not laid them open to such a mandamus. They have never refused to perform their duty. They have done all acts towards performing their duty. They have not been guilty of any such negligence as amounts to a refusal to enter upon the jurisdiction that is given to them, and even, therefore, if a mandamus could have been asked for from this court, there are not materials on which the court ought to grant it. In every view, therefore, the defendants are right. I doubt whether the point which has been so long argued before us was really argued before the Vice-Chancellor. I doubt whether we are overruling any formed opinion of his. If we are I am sorry, with great deference, to differ, but I must say that here I think the plaintiff has made out no case for any legal remedy whatever.

COTTON, L.J.—The plaintiff in the present action bases his case upon this, that a stream running through his grounds is in such a state as to be a nuisance, and in consequence of that he asks for relief against the defendants, not by way of damages, but for a decree which will relieve him from the nuisance he complains of. I agree with Brett, L.J. that as regards the question of fact, if the right of the plaintiff would follow the decision on that, he has made out his case; that is to say, he has shown, in my opinion, that the water in this stream is in such a state that if that were the result of an act of an individual or of a body not having parliamentary authority to put the stream in such a state, or to do acts which necessarily brought the stream into that state, he would have a ground of action against them; but although that is established, it is a very different thing and a very different consideration whether, as against these defendants, he is entitled either to the decree granted by the Vice-Chancellor or to any decree in this action. Now, the decree made by the Vice-Chancellor went further than what has been considered in the argument, for the decree was against the defendants restraining them from causing or permitting any sewage to go into the river Crane, and also from causing or permitting any new outfall or sewer for the conveyance of sewage into the river Crane to be made. Now, in this case there is no evidence at all, as I understand it, that they have expressed any intention to make any new sewer which would have the effect of bringing fresh sewage into the Crane, nor is there anything to show that they had before the commencement of the action, or at any time, by their own act in any way brought any fresh sewage down the existing sewers which go into the river Crane; and I think that part of the decree to which I have referred, which restrains them from causing or permitting any new outfall to be made, must have got into the decree per incuriam, without the attention of the Vice-Chancellor being directed to it. I advert to that for this reason, that it must not be supposed, although I concur in thinking that the plaintiff is not entitled to any decree, that I am of opinion—and I am sure that the rest of the court are not—that the defendants have a right under this Act of Parliament to make any new sewer and thereby to conduct any sewage matter into the river Crane. In my opinion, if they were intending to do so or had done so, there would have been a clear case on the part of the plaintiff for an injunction against the defendants, because that would be within the clear prohibition of the Act of Parliament. The decree against them in substance, no doubt, was intended to be a decree to restrain them from permitting any sewage to go into the river Crane. It is not said they have done any act the consequence of which has been to bring the sewage down to the Crane. If that were so, unless they could show that that act, causing a nuisance to the plaintiff, as in my opinion it has done, was protected by the Act of Parliament, then of course it would be the duty of this court, as it has done in many cases already, to restrain the defendants from creating a nuisance; and although they are a public body having public duties and powers to perform those duties, that would not exempt them from legal liability in consequence of a nuisance caused by them. On the evidence there is no ground for saying they have done that. I shall have to refer to the cases on this point on another part of the case, but it is sufficient to say here that those cases, for the present purpose, may be disregarded. There has been no act done by the defendants. It is not their act that has caused any nuisance to the plaintiff. Then it is said that, although the decree asked for is in the form of a mandatory injunction to restrain them from permitting the sewage to fall into the Crane, that is done to enforce obedience to obligations imposed by the Act under which they are constituted. It is necessary to consider what are the duties imposed by the Act which the plaintiff seeks to enforce, because the consideration would be very different if the Act, either directly or indirectly, contained that which amounted to a prohibition against them from doing a particular thing, of which the plaintiff complains as causing him a nuisance. In fact, that was felt by counsel for the plaintiff, who contended that there was in the Act of Parliament that which amounted to a prohibition, either in the form of a direction, or in the form of a prohibition against their allowing any sewage to go down into the river Crane. Let us see whether there is any such prohibition. For the purpose of convenience I will take first of all the 19th section, which is the last of those referred to on this point. It says, "Every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be constructed, covered, ventilated, and kept, so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and to be properly cleansed and emptied." That was relied upon. I may dismiss it in a word. The complaint here is, not that injury is caused to the plaintiff by sewers constructed by the defendants being improperly constructed, or by their leaving sewers not constructed by them in a state to be offensive to him and his health, but that the sewers are constructed in such a way as independently of their being in a good or bad state, to bring down sewage into his stream. The complaint, therefore, is of the way in which the sewer brings down sewage water, and not of the state of the sewers. That section has nothing to do with it. Then sect. 17 was more relied upon. James, L.J. has already referred to it. The section begins thus: "Nothing in this Act shall authorise any local authority to make or use any sewer," and so on. That is not a prohibition, but it is a direction that nothing in the Act is to be supposed to give them the power of doing that which is afterwards mentioned in the section—it is not to authorise any local authority to make any sewer, drain or outfall, for the purpose of bringing sewage or filthy water into a running stream. It is said that they were using it by permitting it to be used. I cannot agree to that. "Making or using a sewer" means that you must not make a sewer which brings down the sewage into the river; you must not use existing sewers for bringing sewage which you by other means bring into the old sewer. The answer to the whole thing is that it is not prohibitive or directory of what they are to do unless they exercise, or before they exercise, the powers given by the Act, but only that in exercising the powers given by the Act they are not to continue that particular form of nuisance. We then come to sect. 15, and upon that the question must turn. "Every local authority shall keep in repair all sewers belonging to them, and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act." I think I may respectfully differ a little from what has been said by Brett, L.J. I hardly think this can be considered as a direction that they shall make sewers for the purpose of diverting from running streams any sewage that then went into them. It is a direction that they shall effectually drain the district; that is, that they shall provide drainage for every house in the district. They are to provide sufficient and proper drains for the purpose of carrying off all the sewage and other matter that is to go through the district, and no doubt, doing that in a proper way will have the consequence of making a series of drains, and a system of drainage which will have the result of not allowing any sewage to go down into the running water, and the natural streams in the district. That is the result of effectually draining a district by a proper system of drainage, and not the consequence of anything in the Act that can be looked upon as a direction that they shall divert sewage going into streams by drains. The result will be that, no doubt, but there is nothing in the Act that can be looked upon as a direction to that effect. I ought to advert to sects. 91 and 92 which refer to the abatement of nuisances. In my opinion those sections have no bearing on the present question. They refer really to this, that the local authority are to inspect their district, and to see what individuals in it are doing acts which are nuisances, as there defined, and then to take proper proceedings, and a summary remedy is pointed out for those individuals to abate the nuisance; and power is given to them to remove it themselves if the individuals do not do it. What then is the result? By this decree the plaintiff says, I am directing and causing the defendants to do their duty under the Act of Parliament—not to do their duty by restraining them from infringing a direct intimation in the statute by not doing a thing that they ought to do; but that having a duty and obligation under this Act of Parliament effectually to drain the district, I, indirectly, by this injunction, by restraining them from allowing the sewage to go into my stream, am compelling them to do that, because that is the only way by which they can do it. Putting aside for the present the difficulty of doing such a thing by means of an injunction of this nature, I will deal with it as if it were a question of a mandatory order; that is to say, a mandamus in the sense of a decree directing the defendants on proper grounds at the instance of the plaintiffs to perform the duties and obligations thrown upon them by the Act of Parliament in which he has a special interest. Then comes this question: Ought we to do that unless we can see either something definite which the court can direct the defendants to do, or some practical way by which they can carry out that scheme of drainage by which the plaintiff will, he says, benefit? In my opinion we ought not to do so. We are asked to make a decree, something in the nature of a decree for specific performance, and the plaintiff says, "If the defendants will do their duty the result will be a consequential benefit to me practically, and therefore I have a right to call upon you as if it was a private claim I had against you, to perform that duty and to give that benefit to me." Granted; but it would be contrary to the practice of the court to make a decree of that nature against the defendants, unless one was satisfied that there was some particular mode by which they could carry into effect this scheme of drainage, and then direct them to do that, and in that way exercise the powers of this Act of Parliament. But it was said, that is not the way in which the Court of Chancery has dealt with cases of this sort, where a public body has been brought before it by an individual, or by the Attorney-General, complaining either of a private or public nuisance; and it was argued that in such cases the Court of Chancery has said it had nothing to do with the question how these bodies can perform the duty of draining the district which the Act has thrown upon them. All they had to do was to relieve the plaintiff from the nuisance. But cases not at all analogous have been quoted in support of the plaintiff's contention. In those latter cases the complaint was, not that the defendants were not carrying into execution the powers of the Act, but that the plaintiffs were complaining of a nuisance which the defendants said they had caused in the discharge and execution of their duties under the Act. The answer was, "No; the Act gave you, for the purposes of a particular district, certain powers of drainage; but it also said that, in doing this, you should not create any nuisance, or you should not do what you are doing, namely, draining the sewage into a stream." If once the proceeding has been established to be a nuisance, and not within the protection of the statute, it is no answer to the plaintiff to say, "We are doing this in discharge of a duty," when the Act that gave them the power and obligation of discharging that duty for the benefit of other persons had expressly reserved the right of the plaintiff to complain of any act being done to his prejudice or wrong. Therefore the court said, "We have nothing to do with how you are to perform the duties imposed by the Act, if this act, wrongful against the plaintiff, is stopped. We must stop that. You have your powers on condition of not doing a wrongful act; the act is wrongful, and therefore is not protected by the statute, and you must be, as regards the district you are to drain, just as if you had no parliamentary powers." Therefore those cases are entirely out of the question. Here it is not that the defendants have done a wrongful act, and that they are seeking to protect that wrongful act by saying that unless they do that, they cannot do something else; but the plaintiff asks that they may be called upon to exercise the powers of this Act, because that will consequentially relieve him from the nuisance and injury—an injury, not done by the act of the defendants, but which existed before the defendants came into existence. Those cases are not at all authorities for the suggestion that we should make a mandatory decree without seeing that there is a practical mode of carrying into effect the powers given by this Act of Parliament effectually to drain the district. One may say, besides that, that the Court of Chancery ought not, and no branch of the High Court ought, to direct the defendants by its decree to exercise powers and to do their duty, without being satisfied that there has been something in the nature of a refusal on the part of the defendants to do their duty, and comply with the obligation of the Act. Here it is clear there has been no refusal. The delay of the defendants was only from November, when they were constituted, till the month of July, when the action was brought. Then it is said, if there has been no omission on the part of the defendants amounting to a refusal, one may take into consideration the delay of the previous local board, and attribute that to the present defendants. For that purpose sect. 12 of the Act was relied upon. Without looking at the special words of the section, it is obvious it could not be intended to apply to such a case, on any fair construction. The previous local board had to exercise the powers given to them by the then existing Act under which they were then constituted, and over a different area. The present board have to exercise powers under this Act of 1875 over their area; and how can neglect to perform duties imposed by the Act of 1848, or of 1872, be neglect to perform the duties created by the Act of 1875 in a body existing only under that Act, and having duties to perform specified and defined by that Act? Really it comes to this, that as regards the property vested in the late board, the defendants take it subject to all the obligations and liabilities imposed upon it while under the control of the former board; and if the former board had, by any act done by them, given a right of action or incurred any liability—if by any contract they had incurred any debt, or if they had come under any obligation capable of being enforced by action, then that would have been enforced in the same way as if they were still the same persons who entered into the contract, or had done the act or incurred the obligation. It cannot be said, in my opinion, that the delay, if there were delay, on the part of the old board, can be imputed to the present board so as to make it a refusal to exercise the powers given by the Act of Parliament. Then there are two other points. This is not a decree to direct them to perform certain duties imposed by the Act, but it is a decree in the form of a mandatory injunction. Now, in my opinion, if the court can order the defendants to carry into execution the powers given by the Act, it ought to do so directly, and not to do so by restraining them from permitting a thing to be done which it is not clear will necessarily be removed by their exercising the powers given by the Act. It ought to be to direct them what they are to do and how to exercise the powers of the Act. It certainly ought to be to direct them to exercise the powers of the Act, and not to put them under an injunction for breach of which there might be a sequestration, by enjoining them from permitting a thing to continue which they may not have power to remove under the Act. There is one other matter which I may refer to, although James, L.J. referred to it, because I think Mr. Glasse did not quite see the point I put. I mean with regard to sect. 299. That section provides a mode by which steps shall be taken to compel a public body to discharge its duties under the Act. If they had done any act, it is impossible to say that that section could have taken away any jurisdiction of the court either to grant damages or an injunction to restrain them from continuing that act, if the act was one which the plaintiff could complain of as a legal wrong done to him. Nor do I suggest that the existence of that section takes away the power of the court to interfere by decree to compel them to do their duty. When it is at least doubtful how this scheme can be carried into effect, and the Local Government Board have great control over the manner in which the scheme is carried into effect and may say whether it is done reasonably or not, it would be the duty of the court not to grant a decree in such a case compelling them to do their duty, but it might interfere when there is a way pointed out, guiding the court to say whether, under the circumstances, it ought, if the jurisdiction exists, to make a decree for the defendants to carry out such works and system of drainage as under the Act they might have power to carry into execution. On all these grounds I am of opinion the plaintiff fails, and the action must be dismissed.

JAMES, L.J.—I think there is no sufficient ground to alter the general rule that costs must abide the result. The defendants will have the costs of the suit in the court below and here.

NIGOTTI v. COLVILLE. (a)

Sentence of imprisonment—Computation of time—One calendar month—Expiration of sentence.

A sentence of one calendar month's imprisonment expires on the day preceding that day which corresponds numerically in the next succeeding month with the day on which the sentence was passed. If there is no such corresponding day in the next month, then the sentence expires on the last day of that month.

Where a prisoner was sentenced to one calendar month's imprisonment on the 31st Oct.,

Held (affirming the decision of Denman, J.), that the month expired on the 30th Nov.

APPEAL from a decision of Denman, J. giving judgment for the defendant.

The action was to recover damages against the governor of Coldbath Fields Prison for alleged false imprisonment of the plaintiff. At the trial, before Denman, J. and a common jury, the following facts were proved in evidence or admitted.

The plaintiff was convicted by a Metropolitan police magistrate of two different assaults. The convictions took place at 11 a.m. on the 31st Oct., and the commitments were drawn up in accordance with the sentences passed. The plaintiff, for the first assault, was sentenced to be imprisoned for "one calendar month," and for the second assault "for fourteen days, to commence at the expiration of the imprisonment previously adjudged." The prisoner was accordingly taken into the custody of the defendant, who was the governor of Coldbath Fields Prison, during the afternoon of the 31st Oct., and finally released at 9 a.m. on the 14th Dec., having asked to be released on the preceding day. Denman, J. on these facts, asked the jury to assess the damages (which they did at 20s.), and reserved for further consideration the question whether judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiff or defendant. After hearing the arguments of counsel on further consideration, the learned judge directed judgment to be entered for the defendant, with costs.

The plaintiff appealed.

The case in the court below is reported 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 522.

The plaintiff in person contended that, as his imprisonment must be taken to have commenced at midnight on the 30th Oct., the calendar month expired on the 29th Nov., and that being so, that he ought to have been released on Dec. 13. Otherwise, he said, he would have been imprisoned the whole of November, which was a calendar month, and one day in October, and also for the fourteen days. He submitted that the question of time was one of fact for the jury.

A. L. Smith, for the defendant, was not called upon to argue.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of opinion that this judgment must be affirmed. As Denman, J. said, there is no doubt a plausible argument for the now plaintiff that, according to his opinion, he has been imprisoned during the whole of November and one day in October as constituting one calendar month. The difficulty really arises because the term "calendar month" is not applicable except as applied to particular months, and that it is inapplicable where the month begins in the middle of a particular calendar month. Then the month is made up of a portion of two calendar months, which may be of unequal lengths, and various consequences seem to follow. It is clear that the only sensible rule which can be laid down is this, that where the imprisonment begins on a day in one month, so many days of the next month must be taken, if there are enough days to do it, as will come up to the date of the day before that on which the imprisonment com-menaced. That is to say, that, if the day of imprisonment commenced on the 5th of the month, it must go on until the 4th of the next month; if on the 29th until the 28th. That is to say, you must take as many days out of the next month as had passed in the month when the imprisonment began before that imprisonment commenced. If that were not so, see what the consequences would be. The plaintiff says, "I was sent to prison on Oct. 31st. Therefore, I ought to have been let out on Nov. 29th. Otherwise I should have had one calendar month's imprisonment, and one day of another month. The effect of his argument is this, that whereas the imprisonment began on Oct. 30th, it ought to end on the 29th Nov. So ought it if the imprisonment began on the 31st. There is no reason why that should be so. Suppose a man is sentenced to two calendar months' imprisonment, when does he come out? Certainly not until Dec. 30th. Now, if one month ends on Nov. 29th, how do you get the next month ending on the 30th? The only way to make sense of it is to apply the rule I have mentioned. It would never operate to the prejudice of the prisoner. If he was sent to prison in a long month he would get thirty-one days; if in a short one he would get thirty days. If he was sent to prison in February, so much the better for him. If he went to prison on the 29th Jan., according to the rule expressed he would get out on the 28th Feb.; so he would if he went to prison on the 30th Jan. or on the 31st or on the 1st Feb. He would then have the benefit of an imprisonment shortened by the number of the days wanting to make up the days which had elapsed in the month in which he was imprisoned at the time of his imprisonment. As the plaintiff was sent to prison on Oct. 31st, there were thirty days wanting from the next month, and, as a consequence, the month did not expire until the 30th. Then the fourteen days did not begin until the first, and the plaintiff therefore was duly kept in prison until the 14th. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

BRETT, L.J.—The expression one calendar month is a legal and technical phrase to which we must give a legal and technical meaning. It does not, strictly speaking, mean any particular number of days, but one month according to the calendar. We must therefore look to the calendar in calculating it, and not count the days. Now, one month according to the calendar, in my view, is one month from the day of the imprisonment until the corresponding numerical day of the next month less one. In some cases there is no corresponding numerical day in the next month, because it is a shorter month than the one in which the imprisonment begins. There the imprisonment is less than it otherwise would have been, and in favour of the prisoner it must end on the last day of the short month.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think Denman, J. was right in dealing with this point as a matter of law. It was for the judge to say, on the meaning and construction of the sentence, what was "one calendar month." The plaintiff contends that he could not be imprisoned during the whole of one calendar month and one day of another month. The question then is, what is the meaning to be given to the term "one calendar month?" I am of opinion, although difficulties and incongruities no doubt arise, that where there is a sentence of a calendar month's imprisonment not commencing on the first day of the month, you must consider it as expiring at twelve o'clock on the corresponding numerical day of the next month, and, if there are not enough days in the next month, in favour of the prisoner, the sentence will expire on the last day of the month. The consequence is that he never gets a longer imprisonment than the number of the days in the month in which he is to be imprisoned, and sometimes will get a less number of days' imprisonment than the number of days to be found in the calendar month for which he was imprisoned.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Tuesday, May 13, 1879.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J. and MELLOR, J.)

THE PRISON COMMISSIONERS v. THE MAYOR, &C., OF LIVERPOOL. (a)

Reformatory school—Liability to provide proper clothing for juvenile offenders—Prison authorities—Reformatory Schools Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 117), s. 23—Prison Acts (28 & 29 Vict. c. 126; 40 & 41 Vict. c. 21, s. 4).

T. M., a juvenile offender, was sentenced by the stipendiary magistrate of L. to a short term of imprisonment, and a further period of five years in a reformatory school. Previously to his entering the school the Prison Commissioners of England had provided the said T. M. with clothing proper and suitable for such school. Under the Prison Act of 1865 the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of L. were the prison authorities for the prison of the borough of L., and under the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Act of 1866 they still are the authorities for the reformatory and industrial schools of the borough. By the Prison Act of 1877 the borough prison of L. was transferred from the old prison authorities and vested in one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State. The question was whether the providing of clothing for juveniles sentenced to a period of years in a reformatory or industrial school after a term of imprisonment was a prison or reformatory school expense, and whether the Prison Commissioners, or the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of L., as the authorities having the management of the reformatory schools, were liable for the expense of such clothing.

Held, that the Prison Commissioners were liable, and that the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of L. should not be burdened with the expenses of matters over which they had no control.

THIS was a case stated by consent, under Order XXXIV. r. 1. :—

1. Down to the commencement of Prison Act, 1877, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Liverpool acting by the council were the prison authority of the borough of Liverpool, and of the borough prison of that borough, and as such authority they, down to the commencement of the said Prison Act 1877, were liable to defray, and they defrayed, the expenses mentioned in sect. 23 of the Reformatory Schools Act 1866, in the case of youthful offenders sentenced under sect. 14 of the last-mentioned Act, to be sent to and detained in a certified reformatory school, after imprisonment in the borough prison of the said borough.

2. On the 28th March 1877 Thomas Mulloch was convicted by the police magistrate of the borough of Liverpool, of an offence punishable with imprisonment, and was sentenced to be imprisoned for more than ten days in the above-mentioned prison, and to be sent at the expiration of his period of imprisonment to the Reformatory school ship Akbar, and to be there detained for a period of five years. The said ship Akbar was a certified reformatory school.

3. The said Thomas Mulloch was imprisoned in the said prison, in accordance with the said sentence, and was at the time in that behalf directed by the sentence removed by the plaintiffs to the said reformatory school, and was there received and detained under the said sentence.

4. Under the Prison Act 1877 the said prison became vested in one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, and during the whole period of the imprisonment of the said Thomas Mulloch in the said prison, the general superintendence of the said prison was and it still is vested in the plaintiffs under the said Prison Act 1877.

5. At the time of the removal of the said Thomas Mulloch from the said prison to the said reformatory school, the said Thomas Mulloch was possessed of proper clothing necessary for his decent conveyance from the prison to the school.

6. Previously to and for the purpose of the admission of the said Thomas Mulloch into the said reformatory school, he was also provided by the plaintiffs with certain other clothing at a cost of 30s. Such other clothing was proper clothing for the said Thomas Mulloch requisite for his admission to the said school, and unless he had been provided with such last-mentioned clothing he would not have been admitted by the managers of the said school.

7. A question having arisen between the plaintiffs and the defendants with respect to the liability to pay for such last-mentioned clothing, and in order to obtain the admission of the said Thomas Mulloch into the said reformatory school, it was arranged between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the plaintiffs should repay the cost thereof in the event of the court being of opinion that the defendants were liable for the cost of such clothing.

8. The question is, whether, having regard to the provisions of the Prisons Acts 1865 and 1877 and the Reformatory Schools Act 1866, the defendants were liable for the expense of proper clothing requisite for the admission of the said Thomas Mulloch to the said school.

Poland (the Attorney-General with him), for the plaintiffs, maintained that the providing the proper clothing before entering a reformatory school was a school expense, and that the defendants were liable for it. The mayor and corporation of Liverpool were, under 28 & 29 Vict. c. 126, the prison authorities for the borough of Liverpool, and by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 117, s. 3, are still the authorities having the control and management of the reformatory and industrial schools of the borough. The plaintiffs concede that by 40 & 41 Vict. c. 21, s. 3, the prison of the borough of Liverpool became vested in the Home Secretary, who has appointed the plaintiffs to assist him in carrying out the provisions of the Act; but the mayor and corporation have still the control and management of the reformatory schools, for sects. 4 and 52 of the Act of 1877 must be read together. The clothing requisite for admission into the school does not come under the 4th section, which deals with the defraying of expenses connected with prisoners. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Up to the time that the juvenile offender is started for the school he is a prisoner, and all expenses connected with him are prison expenses.] The question here is who is to pay for the boy's suit in the school. During the term of imprisonment the prison authorities are clearly bound to support the prisoner, but by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 117, s. 23, the prison authorities had to provide the uniform suits of the children in the reformatory, and as the Act of 1877 does not affect the jurisdiction of the defendants in reference to their borough reformatory schools, they are liable to defray such expenses. The Legislature undoubtedly intended that the borough authorities should retain their old powers of raising rates for the support of their reformatory and industrial schools.

R. S. Wright (Herschell, Q.C. with him), for the defendants, was not called upon. (But see ss. 23 and 30 of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 117, and ss. 52 and 57 of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 21.)

COCKBURN, C.J.—The Legislature clearly intended by the Prisons Act of 1877 to relieve the local rates; and to throw burdens like these on imperial taxation. By the same Act the powers and jurisdiction of the old prison authorities with reference to reformatory and industrial schools are kept alive, but not their duties and obligations, and we must read sect. 57 with sect. 4. This providing of suitable clothes is a prison expense, and the plaintiffs are liable to defray it. The Government have taken away the control and management of prisons and prisoners from the old prison authorities, and they must not be saddled with the expenses of matters over which they have no control.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF WILTSHIRE. (a)

Poor rate—Objection to valuation list—Time for appealing—Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), s. 1—25 & 26 Vict. c. 103.

Where a valuation list has been objected to before the assessment committee, and subsequently a rate has been made based upon such list, it is not a condition precedent to an appeal that the list should again be objected to before the committee after the making of the rate.

A supplemental valuation list for the parish of S. was deposited by the respondents on the 13th April 1878. The appellant on the 11th May gave to the assessment committee notice of objection to the amount at which they were rated in the said list. On the 22nd May, at a meeting held to consider the objection, the assessment committee refused to reduce the amount, and approved and signed the valuation list. On the 23rd May a poor rate was made, and on the 28th May demanded, the appellants being assessed to the same on the amount entered in the supplemental list. The next meeting of the assessment committee was held on the 12th June, and the next Quarter Sessions on the 2nd July.

The appellants again gave notice of objection to the list on the 31st July, which objection was overruled on the 4th Sept. The appellants then gave notice of appeal for the Michaelmas Sessions held in October, but the Court of Quarter Sessions declined to enter and respite the appeal.

Held, that the decision of the Court of Quarter Sessions was right, as the appellants having been before the assessment committee and taken exception to the list, and having failed to obtain relief, were in a position to have appealed at the July Sessions.

THIS was an application for a mandamus to compel the justices to enter continuances and hear the appeal.

It appeared that an application was made by the appellants, the Great Western Railway Company, to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Wilts, held on the 16th Oct. 1878, to enter and respite an appeal against a poor rate made by the respondents, the assessment committee of the Highworth and Swindon Union.

The following were the facts as stated for the opinion of the court:—

1. The respondents, on the 13th April 1878, deposited a supplemental valuation list of certain rateable hereditaments in the parish of Stratton St. Margaret, in which list the property in the occupation of the appellants in the said parish was entered as a rateable value of 6703*l*. The said parish of Stratton St. Margaret is included in the Highworth and Swindon Union.

2. The appellants, on the 11th May 1878, gave to the assessment committee for the Highworth and Swindon Union (hereinafter called "the assessment committee") notice of objection to the amount at which their said property was valued in the said valuation list.

3. On the 15th and 22nd May 1878 the assessment committee held meetings for hearing the objections of the appellants, and on the latter day refused to reduce the amount at which the said property of the appellants was valued as aforesaid, and duly approved and signed the said supplemental valuation list.

4. The respondents, on the 23rd May 1878, made a poor rate of ninepence in the pound for the relief of the poor of the said parish, and assessed the appellants to the same according to the rateable value of their property appearing in the said valuation list.

5. The rate mentioned in the last paragraph was duly published on the 26th May 1878, and demand made upon the appellants for payment thereof on the 28th May 1878.

6. The next meeting of the assessment committee after the making and publication of the said rate was held on the 12th June 1878, and the next quarter sessions for the county of Wilts, hereinafter called "the July sessions," were held on Tuesday, the 2nd July 1878; so that, if it was necessary again to give the assessment committee notice of objection, the appellants could not have given the proper notices in order to appeal to the sessions held on the 2nd July. The appellants subsequently to the 12th June attended two meetings of the assessment committee by their agent after the publication and demand of the rate aforesaid, but made no further objection to the said valuation list until the 31st July 1878, when the appellants gave notice of objection against the said valuation list to the assessment committee, who on the 4th Sept. 1878, at a meeting for hearing amongst others the said objections of the appellants, refused to grant any relief to the appellants.

8. The appellants, on the 17th Sept. 1878, gave notice to the respondents and to the assessment committee of their intention to appeal against the said poor rate to the next quarter sessions to be holden in and for the county of Wilts, and in pursuance of such notice application was made at the Wilts quarter sessions held on the 16th Oct. 1878, to enter and respite the appeal.

9. It was objected on the part of the respondents that the Court of Quarter Sessions had no jurisdiction to entertain the application to enter and respite the said appeal on the following grounds: (1) That the appellants ought to have appealed to the next quarter sessions, i.e., the next practicable sessions after the allowance and publication of the poor rate, pursuant to 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4. for there was ample time between the 28th May 1878 (the day the rate was demanded) and 2nd July 1878 (the day of holding the July quarter sessions) for the appellants to have given the twenty-one days' notice to the assessment committee as required by sect. 1 of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, of their intention to appeal at the next quarter sessions. (2) That the appellants having objected to the valuation list on the 15th and 22nd May 1878 before the assessment committee, and failed to obtain relief, had done all the Legislature intended should be done by the proviso contained in the 1st section of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, and that it was not necessary for the appellants to go through the same process of objecting again after the first poor rate based upon such valuation list had been allowed, but, if still aggrieved, they should forthwith have given the twenty-one days' notice of intention to appeal to the July quarter sessions, which was the next sessions after the failure to obtain relief, and that having failed to go to such sessions they had lost the right of appeal at the following October quarter sessions. (3) That if it was necessary for the appellants to renew their objection to the assessment committee to the valuation list after a poor rate based upon such list had been allowed and published, such objection should have been preferred at the meeting of the assessment committee next after demand of the rate on the 28th May 1878 had been made, and not deferred until the 31st July 1878, after two meetings of the committee had been in the meantime holden.

10. The appellants contend: (1) That notwithstanding their having objected to the said valuation list as aforesaid before any rate was made upon the basis of it, they had no right of appeal against the said poor rate until they had given to the assessment committee notice of objection against the valuation list in force in the said parish at the time of the making of the said rate, and had failed to obtain relief in the matter, and that the fact of the appellants having stated their objection to the said valuation list to the assessment committee before the approval of the said list by the assessment committee did not relieve the appellants from the necessity of objecting to the said list after the making of a rate on the basis of it as a condition precedent to an appeal against the said rate. (2) That as, the said rate was published on the 26th May 1878, and the next meeting of the assessment committee was held on the 12th June 1878, it was impracticable for the appellants, if their contention in the last paragraph is correct, to appeal to the July sessions, because a decision of the assessment committee could not be obtained in time to enable the appellants to give the requisite twenty-one days' notice of appeal prior to such quarter sessions. (3) That as it was impracticable to appeal to the July sessions, the appellants were not obliged immediately to object against the said valuation list, but that their notice of objection given on the 21st July 1878 as aforesaid was sufficient, and that it was not until the assessment committee on the 4th Sept. 1878 refused to grant relief as aforesaid, the appellants became entitled to appeal to the sessions held on the 16th Oct. 1878.

11. The question for the opinion of the court is: Whether the Court of Quarter Sessions were right in deciding that they had no jurisdiction to enter and respite the appeal against the said poor rate. If the court shall be of opinion that the decision of the Court of Quarter Sessions was wrong, then the appeal is to be entered and respited as asked for.

By 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1:

Before any appeal shall be heard by any special or quarter sessions against a poor rate made for any parish contained in any union to which the Union Assessment Committee Act 1862 applies, the appellant shall give twenty-one days' notice in writing previous to the special or quarter sessions to which such appeal is to be made of the intention to appeal, and the grounds thereof, to the assessment committee of such union, provided that no person shall be empowered to appeal to any sessions against a poor rate made in conformity with the valuation list approved of by such committee unless he shall have given to such committee notice of objection against the said list, and shall have failed to obtain such relief in the matter as he deems just; and which objection, after notice given at any time in the manner prescribed by the said Act with respect to objections, the committee shall hear, with full power to call for and amend such list, &c.

B. E. Webster, Q.C. (Lopes with him), for the appellants, contended that, before notice of appeal could be given, the appellants must have made objection to the list subsequent to the making of the rate based upon that list. He cited

Reg. v. Great Western Railway Company, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 323; 20 L. T. Rep. 481;

Reg. v. The Justices of Derbyshire, 25 L. T. Rep. 43;

Reg. v. The Guardians of Biggleswade Union, 21 L. T. Rep. 494.

Charles, Q.C. and Ravenhill, for the respondents, showed cause in the first instance, and contended that it was sufficient if objection were made to the list prior to the appeal, and that being so, the justices rightly decided that they had no jurisdiction to respite this appeal, which might have been made at the July sessions.

Cockburn, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule moved for by Mr. Webster must be refused. The case all turns, no doubt, upon the modification introduced by the 1st section of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, of the preceding Act of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103. Under the first of those two Acts of Parliament a party could appeal against a rate founded upon a valuation list approved by the assessment committee, without having taken an objection before the assessment committee to his assessment or the assessment of other people upon that valuation list. The new Act comes in and says that no one shall appeal against a rate who shall not have given notice to the assessment committee, and who shall not have taken objection to the valuation list before he appeals against the rate. That is, no doubt, to a certain extent, a salutary provision, for this reason: the purpose of the valuation list and the legislative opportunity given to take exception to that list was a means of preventing the expense, sometimes very considerable expense, of going to quarter sessions to appeal against a rate and to get relief. By the alteration of the valuation list it could be obtained cheaply and readily without occasion to resort to the more expensive process of going before the quarter sessions on appeal. On the other hand, it being left open to a party to appeal without having recourse to the more summary and less expensive mode of obtaining relief, the Legislature interposed and said, "You shall not appeal against a rate until or unless"—for that is the way I read the statute—"you have been before the assessment committee, and have sought there the relief which you may obtain in this cheaper and easier mode; unless you are defeated there, you shall not be permitted to have recourse to the more expensive process of appealing against a rate of taking it to the quarter sessions." Mr. Webster's contention is, that, although the party deeming himself aggrieved and desirous of appealing has in the first instance gone before the assessment committee, and there sought the relief which it was the object of all this legislation to make him seek in that easier form, instead of going to quarter sessions to appeal; that, although he has been once before the rate, as soon as the rate is made upon the valuation lists with reference to which his objection has been already heard and determined, he must go again, and go through the very same discussion, in order to be entitled to appeal against the rate. Now that in itself would be a legislative absurdity of so striking a character, that one cannot suppose the Legislature could have intended anything so nonsensical. It desires that a man shall go before the assessment committee, and makes it a condition of his being entitled to appeal to quarter sessions, but never could have intended that, having done before the rate was made that which the statute desired he should do, he shall be obliged to go through it over again in order to be entitled to bring his appeal to quarter sessions. I should struggle to the utmost against a conclusion involving really so preposterous an absurdity as that. But, says Mr. Webster, the court is bound by its former decision in the Great Western case, where it was held that, although the valuation list is by the Act of Parliament permanent, and need not be renewed in the shape of a fresh valuation list, and therefore rate after rate may be made in succession on the same valuation list, this court held no doubt that between each successive rate, if a man intend to appeal against a later rate, he must challenge the valuation list, although the Act of Parliament intended to make it permanent, and that that is conclusive in the present case. I own that the present discussion has somewhat shaken my confidence in the correctness of that decision: but it is by no means necessary to overrule it on the present occasion, because the two cases appear to me to be plainly distinguishable. A man may not have appealed against the first rate, he may have relied upon the opportunity of a fresh valuation list being made to which he could make exception, circumstances may have induced him to desist from presenting an appeal against the first rate; but when he finds the valuation list is kept in a state of permanency, and he feels that he has been aggrieved by the first rate upon him, he may well say, when the second rate comes, "I will appeal against a rate founded on that valuation list." Then he does not satisfy the exigency of the Act of Parliament, which says, "You shall not appeal unless you have objected to the valuation list," unless he object to the list as the list upon which the second rate has been founded. That decision, as far as it goes, is, or at all events may be, what the Legislature might well be thought to have had in its contemplation, and what I think is essential to the working out of this legislation, that though the valuation list is by the terms of the Act to be permanent until a new one is made, yet, in order that there may not be any appeal without objection being taken to the list, which might be cured in that simple and summary manner instead of appeal to quarter sessions being resorted to, it is necessary to appeal for the purpose of each successive rate against the valuation list to which exception not only may be taken, but must be taken. I think, looking at it in that point of view, the former decision of the Court of Queen's Bench remains intact, and we may give effect to this legislation by saying, at all events, where a second rate is not in question, where you are dealing with the first rate made after the valuation list has been approved, that the party who has been before the assessment committee and has there taken his exception and has failed to obtain relief, is then in condition at once to appeal to the next practicable quarter sessions. It is admitted that the next practicable quarter sessions is the one to which the appeal should be made, and that between the time when this valuation list was finally approved by the committee and the 2nd of July, the necessary period would have elapsed, and therefore the quarter sessions and the one to which the appeal should have been made.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J. and LOPES, J.)

REG. on the prosecution of THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE PARISH OF LEWISHAM v. THE LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

Metropolis Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 159 and 161—Rating—Exemption of property of a particular nature from the full rate levied—Particular parts of the parish to be described by metes and bounds—Equal pound rate.

The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company objected to the rate levied upon their property in L. parish on the ground that a district board under the 159th section of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 cannot exempt or order a less rate to be levied upon different portions of a parish not described or marked out by metes and bounds in the precept ordering such rate to be levied, which portions of the parish were in such precept described only as all "land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as wood land, orchard, market garden, hop, herb, flower, fruit, or nursery ground;" and that such rate being described in the precept as a general rate, but not being an equal pound rate, was bad under the 161st section of the said Act.

Held (following Howell v. The London Dock Company, 8 EU. & Bl. 212), that particular descriptions of property within a parish may, under the 159th section of the above Act, be relieved from the full rate as not being equally benefited with the rest of the parish by the expenditure of such rate.

THIS was a case stated by justices at quarter sessions under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11. The material paragraphs are the following:—

3. By sect. 159 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) it is enacted that,

Where it appears to any vestry or district board that all or any part of the expenses for defraying which any sum is by such vestry or board ordered to be levied, have or has been incurred for the special benefit of any particular part of their parish or district, or otherwise have or has not been incurred for the equal benefit of the whole of their parish or district, such vestry or board may by any such order direct the sum or sums necessary for defraying such expenses, or any part thereof, to be levied in such part, or exempt any part of such parish or district from the levy, or require a less rate to be levied thereon, as the circumstances of the case may require.

4. By the 161st section of the said Act it is enacted that

The overseers of the poor of every parish to whom any such order as aforesaid is issued, shall levy the amounts mentioned therein according to the exigency thereof, and shall for that purpose make separate equal pound rates upon their parish, or the part thereof upon which any sum specified in such order is required to be levied in respect of each sum thereby ordered to be levied; that is to say, a separate rate in respect of each sum ordered to be levied for defraying expenses connected with sewerage, to be called a sewers rate; a separate rate in respect of each sum ordered to be levied for defraying expenses of lighting (where a separate sum is ordered to be levied for defraying such expenses), to be called a lighting rate; and a separate rate in respect of each sum ordered to be levied for defraying other expenses of executing this Act, to be called a general rate; and shall make such respective rates of such amount in the pound on the annual value of the property rateable as will in their judgment, having regard to all circumstances, be sufficient to raise the sums specified in such order; and such rates shall be levied on the persons, and in respect of the property, by law rateable to the relief of the poor in the respective parishes, and shall be assessed on the net annual value of such property, ascertained by the rate for the time being for the relief of the poor.

6. The order or precept upon which the said rate so appealed against was levied was as follows:

The Board of Works for the Lewisham district constituted by the Metropolis Management Act 1855 in pursuance of the provisions of the said Act, and of the Acts for amending and extending the same, hereby order and require the guardians of the poor of the parish of Lewisham to levy within the said parish the sum of 11,524*l.* for the purpose of defraying the expenses already or hereafter to be incurred by the said board in the execution of the said Act or Acts, and to pay the said sum to the London and Westminster Bank, &c., &c. And it appearing to the said board that the expenses in respect of which the said sum of 11,524*l.* is required are not for the equal benefit of the said parish, the said board do further order and require that the rate or rates to be raised in pursuance of this present precept shall, as regards all such parts of the said parish as consist of land used as arable, meadow, or pasture land only, or as wood land, orchard, market garden, hop, herb, flower, fruit, or nursery ground, be assessed and levied in (the proportion of one-fourth part only of the net annual value of such land.

8. The parish of Lewisham is very extensive in area, containing in the aggregate about 5500 acres. Of this area a very considerable proportion is covered with houses; about 3000 acres are lands under cultivation, and fall under the classes of land mentioned in the precept. There is also land in the parish used in other ways, and rated at the higher rate. The 3000 acres do not lie together, but are scattered through the parish. The rateable value of the 3000 acres, according to the valuation list, amounts to about 11,000*l.* The total rateable value of the property in the parish amounts to 324,009*l.*

9. Throughout the said parish, all property, wheresoever situate, which consisted of land used as arable, meadow, or pasture land only, or as wood land, orchard, market garden, hop, herb, flower, fruit, or nursery ground, was rated or assessed in the rate at 2½*d.* in the pound, and all other property was rated or assessed at 10*d.* in the pound upon the net annual value of such property respectively, as ascertained by the rate for the time being for the relief of the poor.

10. It was contended on the part of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (1) that the said precept of the Lewisham District Board of Works was bad in law, inasmuch as the said district board have no power, under the 159th of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, or otherwise, to order the said rate to be levied in the manner directed by the said precept, and can only exempt or order a less rate to be levied upon any particular portion of a parish described and marked out by metes and bounds. (2) That the said rate was bad in law, inasmuch as it was not an equal pound rate as required by the Metropolis Management Act 1855, sect. 161.

The Court of Quarter Sessions dismissed the appeal.

Meadows White, Q.C. (Paine with him), for the guardians of the parish of Lewisham, maintained that the rate was good, and that while it was indisputably in the discretion of the district board of works to exempt local areas, it was not necessary to describe in the precept by metes and bounds those portions of a parish that were to be exempt or relieved from the full rate to be levied.

It was the intention of the Legislature that relief should be extended to those portions of a parish which do not participate equally with others in the expenditure of the rate to be levied; and here the district board have proceeded not on the ground that the portions relieved are of a different kind of property from the rest, but that a difference should be made in their favour as not participating equally in the benefits of such rate; and in coming to this decision the board have exercised a proper discretion. Howell v. The London Dock Company (8 Ell. & Bl. 212) is to the point and conclusive in this matter.

Oppenheim, for the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, contended that it was competent for the district board to exempt only areas of considerable extent, and not certain portions scattered over the parish, and such areas must be described by metes and bounds in the precept, and here the district board have not done so. Again the precept of the district board calls this a general rate, and under the 161st section of the Act such rate must be an equal pound rate; but the rate appealed against was not an equal pound rate; therefore, on these two grounds, the rate was bad. Howell v. The London Dock Company (ubi sup.) does not apply, and, if it did, it has been virtually overruled by the remarks made by Erle, J. in Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company (Ell. Bl. & Ell. 613).

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this appeal must be dismissed, and the order of sessions must be affirmed. I confess that, upon the first reading of sect. 159 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, I felt inclined to come to an opposite conclusion to that at which I have arrived; but this court is bound by its decision in Howell v. The London Dock Company. In that case the rate had been made uniformly on all the property of the dock company without any difference as to one portion deriving greater benefit from the expenditure of the rate than the other. The court there held that the district vestry should distinguish between the difference of benefits derived from such rate by the different kinds and classes of the property belonging to the company. In this case we think that, without distinguishing the local area and limit of each particular piece of agricultural or pasture land or of market garden or the like, the district board may in their discretion, under this 159th section, make a distinction between different portions of the parish or district on the ground that such portions would not benefit equally with others in the rate so levied. There is nothing in this case to make us distinguish it from Howell v. The London Dock Company, or override the latter case. The decision in that case is consonant with equity and justice. There have been countless opportunities for the Legislature to amend and alter that decision, but it has not thought fit so to do. We therefore, notwithstanding the remarks made upon that case by my brother Erle in Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company, cannot take upon ourselves to alter or override it.

LOPES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

Pharmacy Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121), ss. 1, 15
—Sale of poisons by corporation—Corporation liable to penalty—"Person" to include corporation.*Any corporation whereof the members are not all duly registered pharmaceutical chemists or chemists or druggists, which shall sell or keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or composed by the Pharmacy Act of 1868, although such business is managed by a duly registered chemist who is a member of the corporation.The defendants were a company registered under the Companies Acts 1862 and 1867. The object of the company was to purchase or acquire the trade or business of a wholesale and retail grocer and general warehouseman.W. M., who was not a duly registered chemist with-managing director. The business of the company included a department for the sale of drugs, and the meaning of the Pharmacy Acts. The business of the drug department was conducted by one H. E. L., a duly registered chemist, with two duly qualified assistants. H. E. L. was a partner in the company, but was paid by salary for superintending the drug department. An action was brought by plaintiffs to recover from defendants a penalty under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 121, for having sold poisons in contravention of the the intention of the Legislature was to exclude all persons other than the registered members of

That the word "person" in sections 1 and 15 of well as to a natural person, and therefore the defendants could be sued, and were liable to pay the penalty imposed by sect. 15 of that Act.THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision

Rep. 95; 29 L. J. N. S. 13, C. P.It was the intention of the Legislature that every person should be prevented from keeping an open a duly qualified chemist, but that intention could not possibly be carried out if a corporation is allowed to escape the penalties imposed by the Act.A. Wills, Q.C. (Finlay with him) for the defendants.—There are many passages in this Act where it cannot possibly be intended that the word "person" is to include a corporation. The word person does not naturally include a corporation at law. This may be a casus omissus. If the contention of the Attorney-General is correct, a corporation can never carry on the business of a chemist. That might apply to Apothecaries' Hall, but that surely was not the intention of the Legislature. 7 & 8 Geo. 4, s. 14, applies to certain defined cases. That is rather an argument to show that, except by Legislative provision, a corporation is not included in the word person.Lumley Smith in reply.Cur. adv. vult.April 25.—The following written judgments were delivered:COCKBURN, C.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Bloomsbury County Court in favour of the defendants in an action for a penalty under the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 121, for having sold poison and kept open shop for the sale of poisons in contravention of that Act. By the first section of the statute it is enacted that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell or keep open shop for retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons, or to assume or use the title

"chemist and druggist, or chemist or druggist, or pharmacist, or dispensing chemist or druggist in any part of Great Britain, unless such person shall be a pharmaceutical chemist or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of this Act, and be registered under this Act." And by the 15th section "any person who shall sell or keep an open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons, or who shall take, use, or exhibit the name or title of chemist and druggist, or chemist or druggist, not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, or chemist or druggist, or who shall take, use, or exhibit the name or title of pharmaceutical chemist, or pharmaceu-tist, not being a pharmaceutical chemist, shall, for every such offence, be liable to pay a penalty or sum of five pounds, and the same may be sued for, recovered, and dealt with in the manner provided by the Pharmacy Act for the recovery of penalties under that Act." By the Pharmacy Act, sect. 12, the penalty recoverable under that Act is to be recovered in England or Wales "by plaint under the provision of any Act in force for the more easy recovery of small debts and demands." The defendants are a company registered under the* Companies Acts 1862 and 1867 as a limited company, with a nominal capital of 10,000*l.*, divided into 1000 shares of 10*l.* each. Of these one William Mackness holds 560 shares fully paid up. Six persons (one of whom was Henry Edward Longmore) hold five shares with 2*l.* 10*s.* paid on each share. Three persons hold one share each with 2*l.* 10*s.* paid on each share. The remaining shares are unallotted. The defendants' company was registered on the 29th Jan. 1878, and was formed "To purchase or acquire the trade or business of a wholesale and retail grocer and general warehouseman," then carried on by William Mackness at 113, Tottenham Court-road. Mackness is the managing director of the company. He is not a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist within the meaning of the Pharmacy Act 1868. Henry Edward Longmore is a pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist within the meaning of the Act, but no other shareholder is so. The business of the company is carried on, as that of Mackness was before the company was formed, at 113, Tottenham-court-road, and includes, amongst other departments for the sale of various goods, a chemist's and druggist's shop or drug department, which is an open shop for the retailing, dispensing, and compounding poisons within the meaning of the Pharmacy Act 1868. Longmore, as has been stated, is and at the time of the sale of the poisons in question was a duly registered chemist and druggist within the Pharmacy Act 1868, and the business of the said drug department was conducted by him with the aid of two qualified assistants. He, with the two assistants, attended regularly to the drug department, and to nothing else. He and his assistants were the servants of the company, and were paid by salary or wages. Upon this state of facts the question presents itself whether the defendant company, as such, is amenable to the penal enactments of the statute. It was fully admitted on the argument, nor could it be contested, that if this had been an ordinary partnership, the individual partners, at all events such of them as were not qualified under the statute, would have incurred the penalties it imposes. The intention of the Legislature appears clearly to have been to prevent any shop or establishment existing for the sale of poisons except under the immediate superintendence and control of a duly qualified proprietor. It is not enough that the proprietor employs a qualified person to manage the business. The master must himself be duly qualified. Two parties could not combine to carry on the joint business of grocer and chemist, though the one attending to the latter department of the business might be a qualified chemist. There would be nothing to insure in such a case that in the absence of the qualified partner the other might not take upon himself to act in his stead, and thus the security against fatal mistakes in the dispensation of medicines which the statute was intended to insure might be seriously compromised. The defendants are therefore within the scope of this legislation, the case comes within the evil against which the statute was intended to provide a remedy. But they are said not to be within the statute as being an incorporated company; the main ground on which this contention rests being that the Act in question, in its prohibitory as well as its penal clauses, uses the term "person," a term which it is contended cannot be properly applied to a corporate body. The objection thus founded on the use of the word "person" in the penal clauses of the Act would seem at first sight to present some difficulty, but, when the scope and purpose of this legislation are taken into account, the difficulty does not appear to be insuperable. Reliance was placed by the Attorney-General in his argument in support of the appeal, on the enactment of the 14th section of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, that whenever any statute relating to any offence, whether punishable by indictment or summary conviction in describing the offender or the offence, uses words importing the singular number or the masculine gender only, it shall be understood to include several matters as well as one matter, several persons as well as one person, males as well as females, and bodies corporate as well as individuals, unless it be otherwise specially provided, or there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction. But that Act is expressly confined to proceedings on indictment or summary conviction, and therefore cannot apply here, where the proceeding is by civil action. It shows no doubt the disposition of the Legislature to include corporations under the general designation of person or individual in penal statutes. But the terms of the Act will not admit of its application to the present case. To solve the question we must therefore confine our attention to the statute itself on which this action is brought. That an incorporated company is within the mischief against which this legislation was directed is, I cannot help thinking, quite obvious. If a company, by reason of its being incorporated, is not within the provision of the Act and amenable to its penalties, and effect is to be given to the argument of Mr. Wills, it necessarily follows that such a company might openly carry on the business of chemists and druggists, and sell poison without a single member of the company, even the person employed to conduct this portion of their business, being qualified. The person actually selling the poisons might be amenable, and it was probably with the view to avoid this that in the present instance a qualified person was employed to manage this department of the defendants' business; but the company employing him would enjoy complete immunity. A person desiring to combine the business of a chemist and druggist with that of a grocer would have only to get one or two persons to join him, providing them with a share or two, as appears to have been done in the formation of this company, and so founding an incorporated company to set the statute at defiance. It cannot be supposed that the Legislature can have contemplated a result so entirely at variance with the policy and purpose of the Act, or intended to place incorporated companies on a different footing in this respect from that of ordinary partnerships or individuals. It is no doubt possible that, although joint-stock companies existed at the time this statute was passed, the formation of such companies for the purpose of continuing trades hitherto carried on singly, and among other things for that of superadding the business of the chemist and druggist to that of the grocer or provision merchant, may not have been present to the minds of those who framed and passed the statute. Still, if the case, though unforeseen, is within the mischief which the Legislature had in view, and the enactment is large enough to embrace it, without any forced or strained construction being put on the language of the Act, it is our duty to advance the remedy intended to be afforded. It is true that the term used in the 1st section of the Act is a "person," and that ordinarily speaking this word would not be applicable to a corporation. But when the meaning and effect of the enactment is looked at without too close an adherence to its precise phraseology, it amounts to no less than a general prohibition to every one not qualified according to the Act from dealing in poisons, or carrying on the business of a chemist and druggist. The fallacy of the argument urged on behalf of the defendants is that it assumes that the prohibition is addressed to individual persons. But the provision being universal must extend to all persons, whether acting in an individual or corporate capacity. The defendants, it is true, are thus infringing the law, are not acting in their individual capacity, and may not (but on this it is unnecessary to pronounce any opinion) be liable individually. But in their aggregate or corporate capacity they are breaking the law, and being in the latter capacity, as well as individually, within the prohibition, they must, if capable of being sued, be also amenable to the penalty, and must for this purpose be taken to be persons within the meaning of the statute. The fact so strenuously insisted on by Mr. Wills, that in other sections of the Act the word "person" is applicable to individual persons only, and not to a corporate body, only tends to show that the adoption of the business of chemist and druggist by incorporated companies like the present was not contemplated when the Act was passed. It by no means shows that the prohibition being general, and the mischief clearly within the statute, the company, though as such they may be incapable of complying with some of its requirements, as for instance to undergo examination under sect. 6, ought not to be held to be within the penal clauses of the Act, or should be allowed openly to break the law under the belief that they are beyond its reach. In the present case it so happens that a member of the company, who manages the chemical department of its business (Mr. Henry Edward Longmore), is a qualified chemist. But it is not as a member of the company that he so acts, but as the paid servant of the company. It is clear therefore that his being qualified will not exonerate the other members of the company who are not so. Nor would it be otherwise, even if it were as a member of the company that he so acted. So long as any of the company are disqualified the body is disqualified, and the one who, though himself qualified, acts for the body, becomes a party to their offence, and becomes liable conjointly with them. The qualified chemist, who, in partnership with a grocer, carried on the business of grocer and chemist, would be as liable to the statutory penalty as his unqualified partner. The County Court judge was therefore wrong in holding that because the chemical department of the defendants' business was managed by a qualified person the defendants were not liable to the penalty. Being thus of opinion that a company, though incorporated, is none the less within the prohibition of the statute, I come to the remaining question whether such a company is capable of being sued for the penalty provided by the 15th section. Upon this point the authorities referred to by the Attorney-General in his argument appear to me to afford a satisfactory answer, although it is true that a corporation cannot be indicted for treason or felony. It was established by the case of the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway Company (ubi sup.) that an incorporated company might be indicted for non-feasance in omitting to perform a duty imposed by statute such as that of making arches to connect lands severed by the defendants' railway. It was further held in Reg. v. The Great Northern of England Railway Company (9 Q. B. 315) that an incorporated company could be indicted for misfeasance as in cutting through and obstructing a highway, though they could not be indicted for treason or felony, or offences against the person. In the present instance we are dealing not with an indictment on information, but with an action in a civil court. Though the sum to be recovered is no doubt a penalty for the infraction of the statute, the means to be resorted to for its recovery are of a purely civil character. If a corporation can be indicted for misfeasance, I am wholly at a loss to see why it may not be proceeded against in a civil suit for the recovery of a penalty which it has incurred by disobedience to a statutory prohibition. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal must be allowed, the decision of the late judge of the County Court reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs.

MELLOX, J.—I have come with considerable hesitation to the conclusion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs, and that both questions submitted to us must be answered in their favour. I was for some time inclined to think that the circumstances of the defendants' case were not within the contemplation of Parliament when the Pharmacy Act 1868 was passed, and that, although clearly within the mischief intended to be provided against, words sufficiently comprehensive had not been used in framing the Act to include the acts of the defendants, and that consequently it became a casus omissus. A fuller consideration of the provisions of the Act 31 & 32 Vict. c. 121, has however brought me to the same conclusion as that expressed by my Lord Chief Justice in his judgment in this case. I think the great object of the Legislature was to prevent the sale of poisonous or dangerous drugs by persons not qualified by skill or experience to deal in such commodities. It, therefore, proposed to form into one association all persons who for the future should alone be deemed qualified to deal in the same, and who should be registered under the provisions of the Act which we are now considering. It accordingly provided for the interests of all chemists and druggists who had been in business as such previously to the passing of the Act; but with regard to the future it made careful provision for the examination and registration of all persons who should in future form the only qualified body of persons who should be permitted to keep open shop for the retailing or compounding of poisons; and I now think that the sections are really, when carefully considered, only the provisions regulating the steps which in future are to be taken by all persons who desire to obtain the privilege of keeping open shop and retailing, dispensing, or compounding the poisonous drugs in question, and who, upon being registered as pharmaceutical chemists, or chemists and druggists, within the provisions of the Act, will become qualified so to do. To incorporate such a society, and to give to its members in future the sole privilege of keeping open shop as chemists, or chemists and druggists, for the sale or dispensing or compounding poisons, rendered it necessary to prohibit all other persons, not so registered or qualified, from keeping open shop or retailing, dispensing, or compounding such drugs for sale, and from assuming the title of pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist; and therefore, whilst one set of sections are qualifying, and intended to regulate for the future the mode in which persons should become qualified as members of the association, and to provide for the government of the body incorporated, sections 1 and 15 of the Act which contain the prohibitory words, upon the meaning of which we have to decide, have an entirely distinct effect. The object of those sections is absolutely to prevent the danger assumed to be likely to arise to the public by keeping open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons by any persons not being qualified pharmaceutical chemists or chemists and druggists, and the intention and scope of those sections, and the general object of the Act, is absolutely to exclude, from the time of the passing of the Act, all persons other than the registered members of the Pharmaceutical Society from keeping open shop or retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons. Now, before the passing of the Act 1868 all persons, whether "natural persons" or "artificial persons," constituted by incorporation for trading purposes, might, either as individuals or as a corporation, have kept open shops and retailed, dispensed, or compounded poisons. It was essential, therefore, to the effectuating the objects of the Act, that all persons, whether natural or artificial, should for the future be prevented from dealing as before in the prohibited matters; and the cases cited by the Attorney-General in his argument show that an incorporated company may commit an offence either of non feissance or misfeissance, and may be punished by indictment for the same as if the Act had been done by a natural person. We may well, therefore, interpret the word person with sections 1 and 15 so as to include not only any natural person, but any artificial person created by the law, which would be capable of committing the offence referred to in the 15th section, and we are authorised upon the principle of decided cases to say not only that the "offence" has been committed by the defendants, but that they are liable to be punished for it under the provision of the 15th section.

REG. v. MILLEDGE AND OTHERS, Justices of Weymouth. (a)

Justice of the peace—Disqualification—Interest in matter to be adjudicated upon—Justice a member of urban sanitary authority—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 258.

The Local Board of Health for the borough of Weymouth instituted a prosecution under the Public Health Act 1875, against the appellants for a nuisance committed by them, and they were convicted on a summons by the justices sitting in petty sessions. Three members of the town council, and as such members of the urban sanitary authority, sat at the trial in their capacity as justices of the peace, and took part in the conviction of the appellants. The appellants moved for a certiorari to quash the conviction on the ground that three of the justices who adjudicated on the summons were members of the local authority that ordered the prosecution, and so disqualified because of their interest in the proceedings; and that therefore the conviction was bad.

Held, that the conviction was bad, as those justices who had taken part in the proceedings which led to the prosecution of the appellants were disqualified by their interest in the matter from sitting at the hearing of the summons.

THIS was a rule to show cause why a certiorari should not issue to bring up for the purpose of quashing it a conviction made by the justices for the borough of Weymouth sitting in petty sessions.

It appeared that there was an alleged nuisance committed by the appellants with reference to certain timber pounds; and a representation with respect to this nuisance was made to the Local Government Board, and they in turn communicated with the local urban sanitary authority of Weymouth, and desired them to abate the nuisance; and that they would approve of any measures undertaken in that behalf. Thereupon a meeting of the town council as the local urban sanitary authority of the borough was convened, and they passed a resolution that an inquiry should be made into the alleged nuisance, and a report made to them. On the receipt of that report they took out a summons against the appellants. Three members of the town council were justices, and sat on the bench when the summons was heard. The section on which the respondents relied was the 258th of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55).

No justice of the peace shall be deemed incapable of acting in cases arising under this Act by reason of his being a member of any local authority, or by reason of his being as one of several ratepayers or as one of any other class of persons liable in common with the others to contribute to or be benefited by any rate or fund, out of which any expenses incurred by such authority are under this Act to be defrayed.

Pitt Lewis showed cause.—The three magistrates were really not interested in the matter; they took no part in the discussion at the meeting at which proceedings against the appellants were directed to be taken. They had no animus against the appellants, but were performing a public duty; they could not help themselves; as members of the town council they had to carry out the directions of the Local Government Board. Again, they are not incapacitated from sitting as justices, because the 258th section of the 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55 provides for such a case as this. If the contention of the appellants were to stand, the effect would be that a town councillor who happened to be on the commission of the peace would be obliged to retire from the room whenever such a question as this came up for discussion.

Channell, in support of the rule, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—In this case it appears that three of the magistrates, who adjudicated upon the summons issued against the appellant, and convicted them, were members of the town council of Weymouth, and in virtue of that office members of the local sanitary authority for that borough, and so parties to the resolution to prosecute the appellants. They therefore assumed the double rôle of prosecutors and judges in their own cause. Mr. Pitt Lewis urged upon us that these gentlemen could not help prosecuting; the answer to that plea is, they were not obliged to sit at the hearing of the case; and there were plenty of magistrates whose services were available for the trial of the case, without having recourse to those who had participated in bringing about the matter on which they were called upon to pass their judgment. If the three gentlemen had not sat or taken any part in the hearing it would have been otherwise. In that case the provisions of the Public Health Act would apply. That enactment certainly does not warrant a person sitting as a judge in a cause in which he is a prosecutor. Although it may be that a man sitting as judge in a prosecution which he has ordered and arranged may not consciously feel prejudiced, but may even bring his mind unprejudiced and unbiassed, to consider the case impartially; yet the public inconvenience, questionable policy, and unseemliness of a prosecutor sitting as judge in his own cause, and its opposedness to all our received notions of right and wrong, and of justice and injustice, make us hold that this conviction should be quashed. The gentlemen in question need not have sat on the bench, or the urban sanitary authority might have allowed a private prosecution to have issued, but the latter did not so think fit, and the former did not refrain from sitting; therefore, for the reasons I have adduced, I think this conviction bad, and the rule for a certiorari must be made absolute.

MALTON URBAN SANITARY AUTHORITY (apps.) v. MALTON FARMERS' MANURE AND TRADING COMPANY (resps.). (a) Public Health Act 1875—Offensive trades—Nuisance—Injury to health.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 56), sect. 114, provides that the urban authority shall direct a complaint to be made before a justice where "any manufactory, building, or place used for any trade, business, process, or manufacture causing effluvia is certified . . . by their medical officer of health . . . to be a nuisance, or injurious to the health of any of the inhabitants of the district," and that "if it appears to the court that the business carried on by the person complained of is a nuisance, or causes any effluvia which is a nuisance or injurious to the health of any of the inhabitants of the district, and unless," &c. . . "the person so offending . . . shall be liable to a penalty," &c.

The respondents, whose business had been certified by the appellants' medical officer to be a nuisance, and who were charged under this section in respect of their manufactory of artificial manures, were proved to have caused offensive effluvia, which materially interfered with the comfort and enjoyment of the inhabitants in the streets, and penetrated into some of the houses. By one witness certain cases of nausea and vomiting were attributed to them; while evidence was, on the other hand, given that, though the effluvia might make sick persons worse, they would probably do no permanent injury to health.

Held, that the effluvia in question, being proved to interfere with the comfort and enjoyment of the inhabitants, constituted a "nuisance" within the meaning of the 114th section of the Act, and that they were moreover "injurious to health" within the meaning of that section.

Per Stephen, J.: It is not necessary, in order to bring a nuisance within this section, to prove injury to health.

The case of The Great Western Railway Company v. Bishop (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 550 and 41 L. J. N. S. 120, M. C.) considered.

CASE stated by justices of the East Riding division of the county of York, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

A complaint was preferred by the appellants against the respondents, under sect. 114 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), charging that the respondents, being the occupiers of a certain manufactory, building, or place for boiling, burning, or crushing bones, or used for a certain trade, business, process, or manufacture, causing effluvia, to wit, the process or manufacture of manures carried on by the respondents, within the appellants' district, did unlawfully carry on the said trade, business, process, or manufacture of manures, and of boiling, burning, or crushing bones, or some or one of such trades, businesses, processes, or manufactures, so as to be a nuisance, or so as to cause an effluvia which was a nuisance, or injurious to the health of the inhabitants of the said district, contrary to the Public Health Act 1875. Upon the hearing the complaint was dismissed, but without costs, subject to the statement of a case for the opinion of the court.

It was proved that the respondents were the occupiers of certain buildings, in which the process or manufacture of artificial manures (including bone manures and the dissolving of bones and coprolites with sulphuric acid, but not the boiling or burning of bones), was extensively carried on, and that during the process of manufacture, or whilst the hot product was being moved after manufacture, or from the storage of material, effluvia were thrown off in large quantities, a considerable portion of which escaped from the buildings, and had been from time to time on certain occasions (but not continuously), according to the direction of the wind, blown or carried into some parts of the town forming the appellants' district; and that numerous complaints had been made of a nuisance arising therefrom to the inhabitants. It was also proved that the medical officer of health for the district had certified to the appellants, under the provisions of the 114th section of the Public Health Act 1875, that the building or place occupied by the respondents, being used for the purposes aforesaid, and for the carrying on of a trade, business, process, or manufacture, causing effluvia, was a nuisance, and injurious to the health of the inhabitants of the district.

The evidence on behalf of the appellants showed that the effluvia was offensive, and had materially interfered with the comfort and enjoyment of the inhabitants in the streets of the town, and at the Malton station of the North-Eastern Railway Company (the works being situate about two hundred yards from the latter place), and that such effluvia penetrated into some of the houses within the said district, causing the inhabitants to close their windows; and in one or two instances nausea and vomiting were attributed to it. The appellants' principal medical witness did not think there was anything in the vapours to make the witness who attributed vomiting to them sick; but the medical officer of health adhered to the statement in his certificate that the works caused a nuisance and an effluvia which was injurious to health. Other medical men, however, also called by the appellants, whilst giving it as their opinion that the effluvia might make sick people worse and cause nausea, yet did not think any permanent injury to health would arise therefrom.

It was contended by the respondents that this was not a nuisance within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1875, because to be so it must be proved to be injurious to health; and that, as the medical evidence given on behalf of the appellants had failed to prove this, the justices had no summary jurisdiction in this case under the 114th section of the Public Health Act, and they relied on the case of The Great Western Railway Company v. Bishop (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 550; 41 L. J. N. S. 120, M. C.).

It was contended by the appellants that the justices had summary jurisdiction under sect. 114 if the business carried on was a nuisance, or caused effluvia which was a nuisance, and that it was not necessary to prove the same to be injurious to health.

The justices, on the above contention and evidence, without the respondents having called any witnesses, held that, although the appellants had proved a nuisance to exist in the ordinary sense of that word, yet under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1875, and on the authority of the case quoted, it was necessary to prove that the nuisance was moreover injurious to health; and, considering that this was not satisfactorily proved, they dismissed the complaint, but without costs; and at the instance of the appellants stated this case.

If the court should consider that it was not necessary for the appellants to prove that the nuisance caused by the effluvia was also injurious to the health of the inhabitants of the district; or, considering it necessary, should be of opinion that the appellants sufficiently proved the effluvia to be "injurious to health" within the meaning of the statute, the case was to be remitted to the justices for rehearing. If the court should be of a contrary opinion, the complaint should stand dismissed, and the decision of the justices be confirmed.

The 114th section of the Public Health Act of 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), so far as it is material to this case, is as follows:

Where any candle-house, melting-house, melting-place, or soap house, or any slaughter-house, or any building or place for boiling offal or blood, or for boiling, burning, or crushing bones, or any manufactory, building, or place used for any trade, business, process, or manufacture causing effluvia, is certified to any urban authority by their medical officer of health, or by any two legally qualified medical practitioners, or by any ten inhabitants of the district of such urban authority, to be a nuisance or injurious to the health of any of the inhabitants of the district, such urban authority shall direct complaint to be made before a justice, who may summon the person by or on whose behalf the trade so complained of is carried on to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction.

The court shall inquire into the complaint, and, if it appears to the court that the business carried on by the person complained of is a nuisance, or causes any effluvia which is a nuisance, or injurious to the health of any of the inhabitants of the district . . . the person so offending shall be liable to a penalty, &c.

Herschell, Q.U. for the appellants.—There are two questions to be considered: first, whether on the right construction of the Public Health Act the respondents are liable under it for any nuisance unless it be injurious to health; secondly, whether that only is rightly deemed injurious to health which makes people in good health permanently unwell. The group of sections commencing with the 91st and dealing with nuisances are distinct from the group which deals with offensive trades, the 112th and following. The first group deals with matters immediately affecting the health of people, and the word nuisance may well have there a somewhat different meaning to that attached to it in the sections relating to offensive trades, which have a distinct scope and object; and the nature of the matters with which these latter sections deal must regulate the interpretation of the word as used in them. It is clear that the nuisance complained of comes within the scope of these sections, and that the respondents are liable. The case of The Great Western Railway Company v. Bishop (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 550; 41 L. J. N. S. 120, M. C.), which will be cited for the respondents, would be in point if the question arose under the 91st section of the Act; but under the 114th I submit that it is irrelevant. (See Passy v. Oxford Local Board, in the Q. B. Div. reported in the Times, 8th May, 1879.) But, further, I say that it cannot be successfully contended that that alone is injurious to health which makes people who are well permanently ill, and that temporary nausea is of no account; effluvia which make sick people worse, as these are proved to do, must be considered injurious to health.

NUTTER v. ACCRINGTON LOCAL BOARD.

[Ct. of App.]

Oave, Q.C. for the respondents.—The decision of the magistrates was right on both grounds. The sections in question correspond to those in the Act of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, on which the case of The Great Western Railway Company v. Bishop (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 550; 41 L. J. N. S. 120, M. C.) was decided. The word nuisance cannot receive two meanings in the same Act of Parliament, when its collocation and the synonym with which it is coupled are the same. The scope of the Act must determine the limitation and construction to be put on the word. The ordinary power of proceeding by indictment for nuisance is not limited; the summary powers given by the Act are limited. Sects. 112 and 113 deal with the establishment of offensive trades or manufactures in the future; in sect. 114, which deals with those already established, the word "offensive" does not occur, nor does the word "nuisance" stand alone. The case of the railway company against Bishop, which has been cited, was decided in 1872. The framers of this Act, with that decision before them, have deliberately used similar language to that of the former statute. Why, if a different construction were intended, did they not employ different words, or give a different interpretation? Further, I submit that to be injurious to health a thing must be injurious to persons in an ordinary state of health. Everything which injuriously affects the health of an invalid cannot be deemed injurious to health.

Kelly, C.B.—We should be wrong to put such a construction on the statute as would put an undue restriction on traders carrying on useful businesses. But we must be governed by the words of the 114th section on which our decision must turn. Nothing can be clearer than that the statute meant to deal with trades of the same description as that complained of. Now, the words of sect. 114 are, "any of the inhabitants" of the district. The question is, whether this effluvia is a nuisance, or carried on so as to be injurious to the health of any of the inhabitants. It is evident, I think, that it is a nuisance and disagreeable to many of the inhabitants; and I think that it is clear that any effluvia caused by means of this kind that has the effect of making any persons who happen to be sick worse, as this is proved to do, comes within the terms of this section. The words of the Act are, "a nuisance, or injurious to the health of any of the inhabitants of the district." It is clear that the effluvia in question do seriously affect certain of the inhabitants of the district, and I hold that effluvia having such an effect are injurious to health. The case therefore must go back to the magistrates, with our directions to this effect.

Stephen, J.—There are two questions before us. The first is this: Was it necessary for the appellants to prove injury to health? I answer, no. It was sufficient to prove that this manufactory causing effluvia was so conducted as to be a nuisance, whether injurious to health or not. In other words, the question is whether the conjunction "or" is disjunctive or not—whether, that is, the expressions "nuisance" and "injurious to health," which are connected by it, are to be understood as equivalent terms or not. Though it is so interpreted sometimes, that is obviously not its literal meaning, and here it is not, in my opinion, its proper meaning, although by reference to the provisions of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, sect. 8, and the case of The Great Western Railway Company v. Bishop, which has been cited, it has been attempted to show that it is. The principle is stated in the judgment of Cockburn, C.J. in that case (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 552): "It is plain that the object was to protect the public health and private health of individuals living in towns, or in the neighbourhood of towns. I think that affords us a guiding principle by which to construe this Act, and that 'nuisance,' the general term used in the Act, must be taken to mean a nuisance affecting public health. We have then to say whether this is a nuisance of that description." Applying that principle here, "nuisance" in sect. 114 must mean any nuisance connected with the carrying on of an offensive trade which diminishes the comfort and enjoyment of life; and disagreeable smells are among the nuisances by these sections held in view and prescribed. I think, moreover, that this section is complete in itself; and this case comes within it, since the obvious effect of the processes described would be to create a bad effluvia, such as it is admitted would be a nuisance at common law. As to the second question, I think that the appellants proved that the nuisance was injurious to health within the fair meaning and construction of the statute. It was proved that it was such that sick persons might suffer from the smells, and I quite agree with the judgment of my lord on this point. It seems almost self-evident that that which makes sick persons worse must interfere with the general standard of health of people who are well. On both questions therefore our opinion is in favour of the appellants.

Case remitted accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Nov. 29 and Dec. 21, 1878.

(Before BRAMWELL, BRETT, and COTTON, L.JJ.)

NUTTER v. ACCRINGTON LOCAL BOARD. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Local board—Power to raise level of street—Right to compensation—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, ss. 2, 68, 144.

By the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) s. 68, all streets which were highways were vested in and were under the management and control of the local board of health.

By sect. 2 the word "street" applied to and included any highway (not being a turnpike road). By sect. 144 compensation was to be made to any persons sustaining damage by the exercise of the powers of the Act.

(a) Reported by P. B. HUTCHINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

4 I

Defendants, by agreement with the trustees of a turnpike road, took upon themselves the maintenance and repair of the footway only of the road; defendants raised the level of the footway, and thereby caused damage to the house and land of the plaintiff, which were adjacent.

Held, by Brett and Cotton, L.J.J. (Bramwell, L.J. dissenting), that this damage was the subject of compensation within sect. 144.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division reversed.

THE following case was stated by an arbitrator in an action on an award:—

1. The plaintiff was in Sept. 1864, and is now, the owner of a house and land in the town of Accrington, adjacent to a certain road called the Whalley-road.

2. The defendants became in 1857 the local board of health, and are the urban sanitary authority for the town and district of Accrington, under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, and the other Acts therewith incorporated.

3. The house and land of the plaintiff, and that part of the Whalley-road adjacent thereto, are within the district of the said local board.

4. By Act of Parliament of 29 Geo. 3, a turnpike trust was established which included the Whalley-road, part of which was within and part without the district of the Accrington Local Board, and such trust expired in 1874, up to which time toll-gates were maintained, and tolls taken at various parts of the road.

5. There has always, for fifty years at least, been a footway immediately adjacent to the plaintiff's premises, and previous to the establishment of the local board, the turnpike trustees had maintained, and from time to time repaired the footway and the carriage-way, both within and without the local board district, with the exception of the pavement within the local board district. The carriage-way adjacent to the plaintiff's property had not been paved at the time the footway was raised as hereinafter set forth.

6. After the establishment of a local board, and previous to the year 1871, by agreement between the local board and the turnpike trustees, the local board sometimes provided curb stones for the footpath of such part of the Whalley-road as was within their district, and the trustees put them in; and the trustees did everything that was done for the maintenance and repair of the carriage-way.

7. In the year 1864 the trustees communicated to the defendants their intention of erecting a toll-bar in another turnpike road in the township of Accrington subject to the same trust; and afterwards in Feb. 1865, the defendants, in order to induce the trustees not to erect such toll-bar, passed the following resolution, which was in due course communicated to the trustees, and accepted by them: "Resolved that the proposal made to a deputation from this board by the trustees of the turnpike road at their meeting of 15th Sept. last, to the following effect: 'That the local board should take upon themselves the future repair of such parts of the turnpike road within their district as are already and may be hereafter pitched with stone, and all such parts of the footpaths as are already or may hereafter be flagged at least a yard in width, and that other parts of the road or footpaths shall be continued to be repaired by the trust,' be accepted by this board."

8. That part of the footpath immediately adjoining the plaintiff's land was flagged more than a yard in width previous to 1864.

9. Previous to 1871 a further agreement had been entered into between the local board and the trustees, whereby, amongst other things, the trustees undertook to raise the level of the carriage-way at a part of the road immediately opposite the house and land of the plaintiff, and the defendants on their part undertook to raise the footpath to a corresponding height.

10. In or about the month of May 1871, in execution of the last-mentioned agreement, the trustees raised the level of the carriage-way opposite to the plaintiff's house and land; and the defendants raised the footpath to a corresponding height.

11. The plaintiff sustained damage within the meaning of sect. 144 of the Public Health Act 1848, by the raising of the footpath by the defendants, and such damage was the necessary and direct result of the raising of the footpath, and not of any negligence of the defendants in the execution of the work.

12. In Oct. 1874 proceedings against the defendants were commenced by the plaintiff to obtain compensation under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, and after all due preliminaries required by the Act were performed, were carried on ex parte by the plaintiff, and on the 19th Jan. 1875 an award was published whereby the defendants were ordered to pay to the plaintiff 112*l.* compensation for the damage she had sustained, and a further sum of 111*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* taxed costs.

13. The said award was in all respects a good and valid award, provided that the damage sustained by the plaintiff was a proper subject for arbitration and compensation within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1848, and the other Acts therewith incorporated.

14. Neither of the sums of 112*l.* and 111*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* have been paid by the defendants to the plaintiff.

15. That part of the Whalley-road which is adjacent to the plaintiff's house and land was at the time the footpath was raised as herein mentioned, and is, "a street," unless the court find (1) that it was a turnpike road; and (2) rule as a matter of law that a turnpike road is excepted from the definition of street within the true intent and meaning of the Public Health Act 1848, (a) and other

Sect. 2. "The word 'street' shall apply to and include any highway (not being a turnpike road) and any road, public bridge (not being a county bridge) lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage, within the limits of any district."

Sect. 68. "All present and future streets being, or which at any time become highways within any district, and the pavements, stones, and other materials thereof, and all buildings, implements, and other things provided for the purposes thereof by any surveyor of highways or by any person serving the office of surveyor of highways shall vest in and be under the management and control of the said local board of health, and the said local board shall from time to time cause all such streets to be levelled, paved, flagged, channelled, altered, or repaired, as and when occasion may require; and they may from time to time cause the soil of any such street to be raised, lowered, or altered as they may think fit, and place and keep in repair fences and posts for the safety of foot passengers."

Acts incorporated therewith. The questions for the opinion of the court are:

(1) Whether the claim of the plaintiff was a claim within the true intent and meaning of the Public Health Act 1848 and other Acts incorporated therewith; and (2) whether the arbitrator had authority to make such award, and whether the said award is good and binding upon the defendants.

Cour. adv. vult.

Dec. 21, 1878.—COTTON, L.J.—In this case an action was brought to enforce an award ascertaining the amount of compensation payable to the plaintiff in consequence of alterations which were made in a road near her house by the defendants, the Accrington Local Board of Health, and the question to be decided on this appeal is, whether the matters in respect of which the plaintiff claims compensation were done under the powers of the local board, so that compensation is payable to the plaintiff under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 144. An arrangement was entered into between the Accrington Local Board and the trustees of the turnpike road (the road on which the act of which the plaintiff complains was done) that the control of the road should be divided between them longitudinally, i.e., that the one body should retain the footpath and the other the carriage-way; and the defendants altered the level of the part of which they took charge. One point which has been raised is this, that, although by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 41, the local board had power to make arrangements with the turnpike trustees to take charge of a particular portion of the turnpike road, yet this power could not be exercised by one body taking the centre and the other the side of the road, but that one body must take a portion of the road up to a particular point, and the other the remainder. I cannot accede to this objection, for I am of opinion that it is not necessary, in order to constitute a valid exercise of the power given by sect. 41, that the local board and the turnpike trustees should divide dispute as to amount, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided by this Act."

Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 41: "It shall be lawful for any local board, by agreement with the trustees of any turnpike road or with any corporation or person liable to repair any street or road, or any part thereof . . . to take upon themselves the maintenance, repair, cleansing, or watering of any such street or road, or any part thereof . . . on such terms as the local board and the trustees or corporation or person or surveyor aforesaid may agree upon between themselves."

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) repeats all the above sections (by sect. 343), and re-enacts the same provisions; see sects. 4, 148, 149, 308.

the road between them by a line drawn across it at right angles to the centre line. I think they may divide the road in any reasonable way which they may think fit to adopt. But the real question to be decided is, whether the place where the alterations were made by the defendants was part of a street vested in them under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 68. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that this road was not a street within the meaning of that section, because by the interpretation clause of the same Act (in sect. 2) "the word 'street' shall apply to, and include any highway (not being a turnpike road)," &c. The contention was that, looking at the interpretation clause, and sect. 68, nothing can be a street within the meaning of sect. 68 which is also part of a turnpike road. In my opinion this is not so, for the interpretation clause in sect. 2 is not restrictive; it does not say that the word "street" shall be confined to any highway not being a turnpike road, but that it shall "apply to and include" any such highway. By that clause the meaning of the word "street" is enlarged, not restricted, and in my opinion that which in ordinary language, independently of the Act, would be a street, does not cease to be so by the provisions of the Act because it is part of a turnpike road. No doubt it is true that, independently of the interpretation clause, there might be other words in the Act sufficient to show that the provisions relating to streets could not apply to anything that is part of a turnpike road, even though it would otherwise be a street; but, in my opinion, none of the provisions of the Act are sufficient thus to restrict the effect of the enactments as to streets. Some little difficulty may possibly arise in consequence of the street (or some portion of it) over which the turnpike trustees have certain powers being vested in the local board under the statute; but I do not think that any inconvenience which may arise from this cause is sufficient to prevent the meaning which they would otherwise bear from being given to the words. It must be remembered that by a later Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 41) the trustees of the turnpike road and the local board were empowered to make arrangements as to the management and care of particular parts of the streets. I think that section was passed expressly for the purpose of preventing any difficulty which might have arisen under the earlier Act in consequence of a street which also formed part of a turnpike road being vested in the local board, while at the same time the turnpike trustees had certain powers over it under their Act. In my opinion, therefore, this was a street within the meaning of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 68, and the plaintiff is entitled to compensation under sect. 144. It was also contended that the amount of compensation awarded was excessive, but that is a matter with which we are not concerned here. We have only to decide whether the act complained of was done by the defendants under the powers given to them by statute; in my opinion it was, and the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed.

BRETT, L.J.—If the road in question had not been a turnpike road it would clearly have been within the definition of a street, and I think the fact of its being a turnpike road does not prevent its being a street. There does not seem to be any inconsistency in saying that a turnpike road is a street, either independently of the statute or within the meaning of the statute; this road therefore, being a street, was vested in the local authority to the extent stated in Ooverdale v. Charlton in this court (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 88; L. Rep. 4. Q. B. Div. 104). Whatever the obligation of the turnpike trustees might be as to keeping the roadway in repair, the local board might alter the road. They did alter it, and in so doing they assumed to exercise the powers of the Act, and in my opinion they were exercising them. I think therefore that any injury which may have been done to the plaintiff was the subject of compensation, and that compensation was properly awarded for it; I therefore agree with Cotton, L.J., that the judgment ought to be reversed.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—The question in this case turns upon the meaning of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 68, by which "all present and future streets" might be altered by the local board. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the roadway in question here is a street, for it is said that the word "street" in the interpretation clause in sect. 2 includes not only the highways, &c., there referred to, but everything which is a street; that the interpretation is not the whole of the meaning of the word "street," and therefore that a turnpike road is not necessarily excluded. The consequence would be that the interpretation clause is not exclusive. I quite agree with this. There is one interpretation clause which says that "words importing the singular number shall include the plural number, and that words importing the plural number shall include the singular number;" if that clause were taken to be exclusive, the words in the singular would never mean the singular, and the words in the plural would never mean the plural. This is, therefore, an additional interpretation. Then it is said that this is a street, and it is so, but it is also a turnpike road. Then it is necessary to look at sect. 68 to see if there is anything which will enable one to come to a conclusion as to what the Legislature intended. With the greatest respect for those who hold the contrary opinion, I cannot help thinking, on reading the words of the section, that it means, as the court below held, that a street which is also a turnpike road should not be included. Has the section taken away the management of the turnpike road from the turnpike trustees? I do not think that is intended. But it seems to me that it is speaking of those things with regard to which the management is transferred to the local board. It seems to me, therefore, that the words of sect. 68 show that a street which is also a turnpike road is not included in that section. The case is one on which I would rather not express a very confident opinion, especially after hearing the contrary opinions which have been expressed. There is one other remark. By sect. 117 of the same Act the local board were to be the surveyors of highways; that certainly did not include a turnpike road. I am therefore of opinion, on the question mainly argued, that the judgment was right, and ought to be affirmed. But there is another point, which I think is substantial. If the acts were done under the powers of the turnpike trustees, I cannot see how any action would lie against the trustees, or persons acting on their behalf. The trustees have power, under their Act of Parliament, to raise and alter the road, and it was held in Boulton v. Crowthor (2 B. & C. 703), that no action would lie against the trustees of a turnpike road for acts done bonâ fide and within their jurisdiction. I am inclined to think that, on principle, no action ought to be maintainable if the owner of property adjoining a highway is not the owner of the soil of the highway; I do not think that he has any right by law to have the road continued at a particular level. It may be inconvenient to him to have the road altered if he has built with reference to the level of the road; but it may be inconvenient to the public not to have the road altered. I am not clear, therefore, that there was not a more meritorious defence than was supposed in the court below. If so, there is no ground for saying that the defendants are continuing and maintaining a wrong, for, if the act was rightly done by the turnpike road trustees, the defendants were justified in maintaining it. I think the judgment ought to be affirmed, but, as the other members of the court are of a different opinion, it must be reversed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Tuesday, April 1, 1879.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J. and MELLOR, J.)

COLLINS v. THE VESTRY OF PADDINGTON. (a)

Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), sects. 125-127—Vestry, duty of, to remove rubbish—"Rubbish" and "refuse," what—Tots—Construction of contract.

A vestry is only bound under sects. 125 to 127 of the Metropolis Local Management Act to remove such things as are or might be injurious to the health of the inhabitants. The vestry of P. sold to the plaintiff "all the breeze, dust, cinders, ashes, dirt, offal, garbage, filth, and refuse, which shall be collected and received by them within the parish of P. during one year" to be collected by the vestry and delivered to plaintiff. During the collection the servants of the vestry appropriated various articles called "tots" which had been thrown into the dust-bins by the owners, in order to be got rid of. The plaintiff now claimed damages under his contract for the value of the tots so appropriated.

Held, that the plaintiff could not recover, as the terms of the contract applied only to such refuse as the vestry were bound to remove under the Act. That there was no duty cast upon the vestry to remove "tots," but only such things as might be injurious to health.

THIS was a special case stated by an arbitrator.

CASE.

1. On the 15th Feb. 1876 the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant, of which the following are the material portions:

Whereas the vestry have offered to sell and dispose of all the breeze, dust, cinders, ashes, dirt, offal, garbage, filth, and refuse, which shall be collected and received by them, their contractors, agents, and servants, within the parish of Paddington during the period of one year to be computed from the 25th day of March 1876 unto Edward

(a) Reported by A. H. POTTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Collins for the sum of sixpence for every cart load of such breeze, dust, cinders, ashes, dirt, offal, garbage, and refuse, and the said Edward Collins has accepted such offer, and agreed to purchase and take the said breeze, dust, cinders, ashes, dirt, offal, garbage, and refuse, at such price accordingly Now, therefore, these presents witness that the said vestry do hereby bargain and sell unto the said Edward Collins, his executors and administrators, all and every part of the said breeze, dust, cinders, ashes, dirt, offal, garbage, filth, and refuse, which shall and may during the period of twelve calendar months to be computed from the 25th day of March 1876 be collected, gathered, and received by the said vestry, or their contractors, servants, and agents, from all and every the houses and other premises situate and being in all and every of the roads, squares, streets, lanes, courts, mews, and other places within the said parish of Paddington. And the said vestry do hereby, as far as they lawfully can or may covenant with the said Edward Collins, his executors and administrators, that the said vestry will, at their own expense, deliver and deposit the said breeze, dust, cinders, ashes, dirt, offal, garbage, filth, and refuse in, to, or upon the brickfield belonging to the said Edward Collins, situate and being in Wood-lane, Shepherd's Bush in such quantities and on such days in every week (Sundays excepted), and at such seasonable times in the daytime as the said vestry may think fit.

2. The deed contained covenants on the part of the said Edward Collins for the payment of the amounts to become due in respect of the deliveries of dust, &c., the accounts to be adjusted on the footing of a payment by him of sixpence a load.

3. Either party is to be at liberty to refer to the contract itself, but it is not necessary to set out any more of it.

4. The manner in which the dust the subject of contract was collected by the vestry was as follows:

5. In each house or other premises to which this contract refers, there was a receptacle called a dust-bin, into which were put all the ordinary refuse of the house or premises. The vestry sent carts under the charge of their servants to collect the contents of these dust-bins. It was the duty of such servants of the defendants to take the contents of the dust-bins in baskets or otherwise out of the bins and put them into the carts sent by the vestry for the purpose of collection, and as soon as a cart was full to conduct it to the brick-field of the plaintiff in Wood-lane aforesaid.

6. The contents of the dust-bins consisted chiefly of cinders and ashes and the sweepings of houses, but they also contained a number of articles of more or less value thrown away by the occupiers of the houses or their servants or other members of their household and put into the dust-bin for the purpose of being taken away from the premises by the dust carts as refuse and got rid of. The dust heap accumulated in the brick-field would at some time or other be sifted in order to separate the cinders, breeze, and ashes, which are used in brick making. In the course of this process the articles in question, which in the business are known as "tots," are separated, and those of the same kind being collected together are saleable, and upon a large contract like the present the tots are of considerable value. The articles are of a very miscellaneous kind, but amongst the most valuable are broken white glass, bones, articles of iron, lead, and other metals, and knife handles.

7. Throughout the period covered by the contract, the servants of the vestry employed in collecting the contents of the bins were more or less in the habit of picking over the contents of the bins and abstracting portions of the more valuable articles, of putting them into sacks of their own and of selling the articles so abstracted for their own benefit. This process of selection was generally (though not exclusively) carried on upon the premises upon which they entered for the purpose of collecting the contents of the dust-bins, and in these instances the men so acting either took the articles in question from the dust-bin itself or from the baskets used for carrying the refuse from the bins to the carts or as the refuse was in the act of being transferred from the bin to the baskets. They also took such articles from the carts themselves when opportunity offered, and dealt with them in the same manner.

8. The question for the opinion of the court is: whether the plaintiff is entitled to damages for the abstraction under the circumstances mentioned of "tots" by the servants of the vestry.

By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120:

Sect. 125. It shall be lawful for every vestry, and they are hereby required to appoint and employ a sufficient number of persons for collecting and removing all dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth, and for the cleansing out and emptying of privies and cess-pools, sewers and drains within their parish.

Sect. 126. Any occupier of any house or land, or other person, who refuses or does not permit any soil, dirt, ashes or filth to be taken away by the scavengers shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding five pounds.

Sect. 127. All dirt, dust, night soil, ashes and rubbish collected as aforesaid shall be the property of such vestry, and such vestry shall have full power to sell and dispose of the same for the purposes of this Act as they shall think proper, and the person purchasing shall have full power to take, carry away, and dispose of the same, for his own use.

Croome (Digby Seymour, Q.C. with him) for the plaintiff.—Under the terms of this contract the plaintiff is entitled to recover for these tots—he was bound to remove all "rubbish" that was thrown into the dust-bins, which then became his property. The vestry had sold all "rubbish," and that would include any property abandoned by the owner as valueless; articles so abandoned were called "tots." They would therefore be included in the contract, and the plaintiff is entitled to have them or their value. Filbey v. Combe (2 M. and W. 677.)

Harrison, Q.C. (J. Robins with him).—The vestry have only contracted to sell that which by the terms of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, they were bound to collect, and by the sections of that Act they were only bound to collect such refuse as might be injurious to health; the word "rubbish" only applies to such things as are ejusdem generis, with soil, dirt, ashes and filth, with which it is connected both in the Act and in the contract:

Law v. Dodd, 1 Ex. 845, 10 L. T. Rep. O. S. 286.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Our judgment must be in favour of the defendants. In the first place it is necessary for us to consider what duty is imposed upon the vestry by the 125th, 126th, and 127th sections of the Metropolis Local Management Act. I think that what was intended by the Legislature will at once suggest itself to everyone's mind, since the sections do not refer to the convenience of each householder, but to sanitary considerations and sanitary considerations alone. They are to remove filth, garbage, and other things which are refuse in that sense, and which might be injurious to health, but because it is their statutory duty to collect and remove such refuse which finds its way properly into the dustbins, it by no means follows that they are bound to take away that which comes into the dust-bins improperly, and which is not within the scope of the Act. The words in the three sections to which I have referred are curiously changed, for in the first of the three they are "dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth." Now the word rubbish there gives us a key to what the Legislature meant; it clearly has no reference to anything of the kind which is the subject-matter of this discussion; but by rubbish in this section is meant anything of the same description as the words with which it is coupled, which apply to things that would be mischievous to remain in a house with a view to the sanitary conditions of that house, or of the neighbourhood, but not things which it would be merely convenient for the householder to get rid of. In the next section the word rubbish is omitted, which shows that ashes, and filth, and things ejusdem generis were alone contemplated by the Legislature. In the 127th section the words are "dirt, dust, night soil, ashes, and rubbish," where the word rubbish is again used in connection with words of a similar description to those in the preceding sections. The duty of the vestry therefore is to remove anything which might be injurious from a sanitary point of view. Now I think we must construe this contract in accordance with the duty cast on the vestry by the statute, and as co-extensive with that duty, and the words of the contract will bear that construction. When we look at the words in extenso we find they are "breeze, dust, cinders, ashes, dirt, offal, garbage, filth and refuse," but not one of these words is applicable to these "tots." Mr. Croome contends that they would be included in the term "refuse," but it seems to me that that word must be interpreted by those that have gone before, and by the duty it was evidently the intention of the Legislature to cast upon the vestry. I do not think that it is the duty of the vestry to take away everything which gets into the dust-bin; it may be very convenient to get rid of old shoes, bits of tin and broken bottles, but these are not things which the vestry are bound to remove. The scavenger may have no objection to take these things away and dispose of them on his own account, but in so doing he is not acting as a servant of the vestry, but to oblige the householder and for his own profit. It is not incumbent on the vestry to take them away, and they do not therefore, in my opinion, come within the terms of the contract.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have had very great difficulty in coming to a conclusion upon this point, but I think that the interpretation put upon this Act by my Lord is the only one we can safely adopt. If the plaintiff's contention were right, a dust-bin might become the receptacle for old shoes and broken bottles, and other articles of that description which it was clearly never contemplated that the vestry should be bound to remove. But no real difficulty arises in disposing of things of this nature, as the collectors are generally willing to take them and dispose of them for what they are worth. I can see no other method of interpreting this contract which so thoroughly reconciles all points at issue as that of my Lord. I do therefore ex animo adopt the views he propounds.

THE GUARDIANS OF THE CLUTTON UNION v. POINTING. (a)

Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) ss. 35, 39—New building—"Sufficient" privy accommodation—One privy for two houses.

The 35th section of the Public Health Act 1875 does not require a separate water-closet, earth-closet, or privy for every newly-built house.

The respondent had pulled down two cottages and entirely rebuilt them, erecting one new privy for the use of both cottages. He was charged under sect. 35 of the Public Health Act 1875, with not providing sufficient privy accommodation for one of the cottages.

The justices were of opinion that the accommodation was sufficient, and dismissed the information. The sessions confirmed this decision.

Held (upon appeal), that the justices were right, as sect. 35 of the Act had been sufficiently complied with.

THIS was a special case stated by the justices assembled at and for the Court of Quarter Sessions, in and for the county of Somerset, holden at Wells, on the 15th Oct. 1878.

1. The appellants are the guardians of the poor of the Clutton Union, being the local authority for the said union.

2. The respondent is a person who has caused two cottages within such district, which have been pulled down to the ground there, to be rebuilt.

3. The said two cottages are in the same ownership, and are rebuilt adjoining one another, and are semi-detached.

4. When the respondent rebuilt the said cottages an old privy in a garden at the back of the said cottages was discarded; such privy had hitherto been used in common by the occupiers of the said cottages.

5. The respondent on rebuilding the cottages, built a new privy to be used in common by the occupiers of both cottages on the spot indicated on the plan annexed hereto.

6. The two cottages are let to, and are occupied by different tenants—John Price occupying one and Charles Price the other, and each tenant has the right to use in common with the other tenant the new privy.

7. The new privy afforded, and is capable of affording, sufficient accommodation to the occupiers of the cottages, using the same in common as aforesaid.

8. The appellants summoned the respondent before the justices at petty sessions, on the complaint that he being the owner did cause to be rebuilt from the ground floor a certain house in the occupation of John Price, without a sufficient water-closet, earth closet, or privy, contrary to the provisions in that behalf of the Public Health Act 1875.

9. The complaint was dismissed by such justices, and thereupon an appeal was brought to quarter sessions.

10. The appellants contended (inter alia) that sect. 35 of the Public Health Act 1875 requires that every house pulled down to or below the ground floor shall have a separate sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy.

Q.B. Div.]

LEFTLY v. MONNINGTON.

[Ex. Div.]

11. The respondent, on the other hand, contended that the above section did not require him on rebuilding, as aforesaid, to provide a separate water-closet, earth-closet, or privy for each house, but that the requirements of the section had been met by providing sufficient accommodation in one privy for the use of the occupiers of the two houses.

The Court of Quarter Sessions dismissed the appeal with costs, subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division upon the above contentions.

If that of the appellant is right, then the order of sessions to be quashed.

By 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 35,

It shall not be lawful newly to erect any house, or to rebuild any house pulled down to or below the ground floor, without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and an ashpit furnished with proper doors and coverings. Any person who causes any house to be erected or rebuilt in contravention of this enactment shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

Sect. 36 :

If a house within the district of a local authority appears to such authority by the report of their surveyor or inspector of nuisances to be without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and an ashpit furnished with proper doors and coverings, the local authority shall, by written notice, require the owner or occupier of the house within a reasonable time therein specified to provide a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy . . . as the case may require. If such notice is not complied with, the authority may do the work and charge for it. Provided that where a water-closet, earth-closet, or privy has been, &c., used in common by the inmates of two or more houses, or if, in the opinion of the local authority, a water-closet, earth-closet, or privy may be so used, they need not require the same to be provided for each house.

Poole for the respondent.—The justices have determined that in this case there is sufficient accommodation. The 35th section of the Act is fully complied with. There is nothing in the section which requires that every house should have a separate privy or water-closet.

Charles, Q.C. (Vigor with him) for the appellants.—Sects. 35 and 36 must be read together. The local authority and they alone are to decide what accommodation is to be sufficient. [Cockburn, C.J.—The local authority is not introduced at all in sect. 35.] The 36th section explains the 35th, which must apply to a water-closet sufficient for each house, and therefore separate.

Cockburn, C.J.—I think the order of sessions which rejected this appeal must be affirmed, and the 35th and 36th sections of this Act are, in my opinion, entirely distinct, and with specific objects of an entirely different character. The 35th section relates to the building and rebuilding of houses without a sufficient water-closet or privy, and imposes a penalty for contravening the section, once and for all. If the justices find that there is not a sufficient water-closet accommodation they may impose a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*, and the builder cannot be charged again for that offence. In section 36 there is no reference to a penalty at all, but certain powers are given to the local authority which they may exercise, whether the owner has been fined or not, "if it appears to the local authority by the request of their surveyor that there is not sufficient water-closet accommodation. And if the owner neglects to provide such accommodation" the local authority may do the work themselves, and charge the owner with it. The two sections are entirely distinct, giving different powers; one relates to the act of building, the other to the condition of the premises. I cannot see my way to the conclusion that the Legislature intended that there must be a separate water-closet attached to each particular house. It would have been so easy to insert a word which would have given so obvious a meaning to the section, and finding no such word I feel bound to assume such a construction was not intended. The justices are of opinion that in this case there is sufficient water-closet accommodation, and as this is a penal clause which must be construed strictly, and into which, therefore, we cannot import words or a word which would considerably extend its operation, the decision of the justices must be affirmed.

LEFTLY v. MONNINGTON. (a)

Churchwarden — Vestryman — Bankruptcy of Churchwarden — Penalty — Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 2, 54.

Sect. 2 of this Act enacts that the vestry in every parish coming within its operation shall consist of a certain number of persons, qualified and elected as therein provided. . . . Also, that the incumbent and churchwardens of every such parish shall constitute a part of the vestry, and shall vote therein, in addition to the elected vestrymen.

*Sect. 54 enacts that in case any member of any vestry for any parish to which this Act applies be declared bankrupt . . . in every such case such person shall cease to be such member. . . . And any person who acts as a member of any such vestry, after ceasing to be such member, shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty of 50*l., which may be recovered by any person who may sue for the same in any of the Superior Courts of law, with full costs of suit.

The defendant was, on the 20th Aug. 1878, and for some months prior thereto, a churchwarden of the parish of Plumstead, and, by virtue of his office of churchwarden, and not otherwise, was a part of the vestry of the said parish.

On the 14th June 1878 the defendant was adjudged a bankrupt. On the 20th Aug. 1878 the defendant (being still a bankrupt) attended a meeting of the said vestry, and acted at such meeting by voting on a resolution submitted to the said meeting.

*Held, that the defendant was, by sect. 2, a part of the vestry, and, consequently, a member of it, and that by sect. 54 he ceased to be a member of it on being made bankrupt, and, as he had acted and voted at a meeting of the vestry after ceasing to be a member, he was liable to the penalty of 50*l.

*THIS was an action to recover a penalty of 50*l.* and full costs of suit, on the ground that the defen-* dant, after being adjudged a bankrupt, voted at a meeting of the parish of Plumstead contrary to the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act of 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), whereby, in accordance with the provisions of that Act, he became liable for the payment of such penalty, together with full costs of suit. A special case was stated by consent of the parties, in accordance with the provisions of the Judicature Acts. The case was as follows:

On the 20th Aug. 1878, and for some months prior thereto, the defendant was churchwarden of the parish of Plumstead, and by virtue of his office of churchwarden, and not otherwise, was a part of the vestry of the said parish.

On the 14th June 1878 the defendant was adjudged a bankrupt.

On the 20th Aug. 1878 the defendant attended a meeting of the said vestry, and acted at such meeting by voting on a resolution submitted to the said meeting.

The 2nd section of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 provides that the incumbent and churchwardens of each of the parishes mentioned in the schedules of the Act (of which Plumstead is one) shall constitute a part of the vestry, and vote therein, in addition to the elected vestrymen; and the 54th section of the said Act provides that any member of any vestry for any parish mentioned in the said schedules who shall be declared bankrupt shall thereupon cease to be such member, and shall, if he acts as a member of such vestry after ceasing to be such member as aforesaid, be liable to a penalty of 50*l.*, which may be recovered by any person who may sue for the same, with full costs of suit.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the defendant, being a part of the vestry only by virtue of his office of churchwarden, is liable, under the circumstances aforesaid, to pay to the plaintiff the penalty of 50*l.*, with full costs of suit.

Baylis, for the plaintiff, was stopped by the Court.

T. Willis Chitty for the defendant.—There are two classes of persons entitled to act and vote at meetings of the vestry, namely, elected members, who are required to have a certain property qualification, and ex officio members, such as the incumbent and churchwardens. The elected members only are subject to the penalty clause of sect.

54, and the Act could never have intended that the ex officio members should be subject to this penalty. The incumbent and churchwardens are placed in precisely the same position in this respect, and the Legislature could not have intended that every incumbent in the metropolis should be liable to this penalty. The churchwarden is ex officio a part, but not a member, of the vestry; and, therefore, is not within the operation of sect. 54.

KELLY, C.B.—It appears to me that, on a true construction of this Act, there can be no question about the point before us. Is it possible to contend that the incumbent and churchwardens, who, under sect. 2, become a "part" of the vestry, do not become "members" of it? It is clearly impossible; and, passing to sect. 54, we find that, if any member of any vestry for any parish mentioned in the schedules of this Act become bankrupt, he shall cease to be a member; and the section goes on to say that any person who acts as a member of such vestry after ceasing to be such member shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty of 50*l.*, which may be recovered by any person who may sue for the same, in any of the Superior Courts of law, with full costs of suit. It seems to me, therefore, that a churchwarden becomes a "part" of the vestry, and so a "member" of it, and, as such, liable to the penalty under sect. 54. Accordingly, the judgment must be for the plaintiff.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is exceedingly probable that, when this Act was passed, the Legislature did not contemplate what might happen to incumbents under certain possible circumstances. But, leaving this consideration aside altogether, the question here is, whether a man who is a part of the vestry, and who has a right to vote therein, is or is not a member thereof? A member of a vestry simply means a man who is a part of it and votes in it. This being so, we go on to sect. 54, which declares that any member of a vestry becoming bankrupt shall cease to be such member, and any person ceasing to be such member, and afterwards voting, shall be liable to certain consequences. I am, therefore, of opinion that our judgment in this case ought to be for the plaintiff.
